Mr. CONKLING. I hope you will.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. In lines 23 and 24 of section 3, I give notice that I will move to strike out the words "in a district in which such is now the practice."

Mr. CONKLING. That will help it, undoubtedly.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have no doubt the intention of the framers of this was to accomplish what we now propose to accomplish, and if you strike out those words you let all the Federal judges in all the States go back to the State jury-boxes if they choose. But I agree with the Senator from New York that those words, if left in, operate as a restriction, and in no State can the Federal judges go back to the State jury-boxes unless they are doing it now. If they are doing it now there is nothing to correct, and there is no use in passing any part of the law. If in all the States Federal jurors were taken from the State jury-boxes the law would be unnecessary. It is only because in my State and other States it is not done—that some regulation of law is necessary. The circuit judge who presides in my State presides over six States, and it is only because of the practice that has grown up there that this law is made necessary. If you put in words confining it to States that now indulge in this practice, you nullify the whole effect of the bill. I give notice that I shall move to strike out these words, because with these words I do not think the law is worth having.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. President, the Senator from New York said this was unconstitutional because it gave the power to the judge to make the appointment of commissioners. I read the statute which gave the judge of a district court the power to appoint his clerk; and if the Senator will turn to another section of the statutes in the very same language he will find that the judge of the circuit court has the power to appoint the clerk of that court:

A clerk shall be appointed for each circuit court by the circuit judge of the circuit.

Mr. CONKLING. For the court.

Mr. HEREFORD. I can find any number of instances. If the Senator will turn to section 4993, he will see the provision as to registers in bankruptcy. When I said the Chief-Justice had the appointment of registers in bankruptcy I was mistaken a little, though not much.

Mr. CONKLING. He recommended them.

Mr. HEREFORD. The power of appointment was with the district judge, so that each district judge had the power to appoint registers in bankruptcy on the recommendation and nomination of the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court. If that is not constitutional you have no clerk in any district or circuit court; there was no clerk to enter up a judgment; no witness that was sworn could be convicted of perjury, because there was no clerk to swear him, and so on.

But I do not rise for that, Mr. President, so much; I disagree with the Senator from New York and the Senator from Georgia both, and I think that the judges are right in their construction of the law, and that both the Senators are wrong, which I think is very plain. Nearly all the district judges of the United States, I believe, have held that they had the power to take their jurors as they saw fit. I asked the judge for my State the other day, since this matter was under discussion in the House, about it. Addressing him, I asked: "How do you select your jurors?" I have no complaint to make of our judge; I have no complaint to make of our district attorney; they are good and faithful officers. The judge said: "I tell my marshal to go and get me so many grand and so many petit jurors, and then the marshal selects whom he pleases." The Senator from Iowa said a moment ago, and said correctly, that throughout the whole West none of the judges pretended to obey this law. It is so throughout the West. He said so of his own State.

Mr. ALLISON. I stated that the judges, so far as I knew the practice in the Northwest, directed the drawing of the jurors in a different manner. I did not say they disobeyed the State law.

Mr. HEREFORD. They do not obey this national law, as the Senator said. He said they do not do it in his State. They do not do it in the South; they do not do it in my State. The judge in my State, of whom as I said before I have no complaint to make, directs his marshal to go and select a jury for him, and he goes out and selects anybody he pleases. I say this is a power that should be delegated to no man, and for that reason I am in favor of the repeal of this law and the enactment of the one before the Senate.

Why do I say that these judges are right? Are they all corrupt? No. The Senator from New York and the Senator from Georgia say that if these judges do not obey the State law in this respect they are subject to impeachment. I do not believe it. I think the law intended that the Federal judges should conform to the spirit of the statutes of the various States, and the law says they shall do it as far as practicable, and whether it be practicable depends on their judgment.

Here is the other section that makes this whole matter conclusive to my mind, and it is the section which the judges rely upon, and rely upon with confidence, to sustain them in their construction of this law. It is section 802, and it is under that they act:

SEC. 802. Jurors shall be returned from such parts of the district, from time to time, as the court shall direct, so as to be most favorable to an impartial trial, and so as not to incur an unnecessary expense, or unduly to burden the citizens of any part of the district with such services.

It is under section 802 that these judges say the discretion is invested in them how the juries shall be selected. Now, take my own State as an illustration to illustrate the correctness of the argument The whole State comprises one judicial district, with fifty-six counties in it. The judge, under section 802, has a right to have these jurors taken from one county, or a certain proportion from every county in the State. Suppose to-day that he wants three hundred petit jurors, he wants thirty-six grand jurors, three hundred and thirty-six in all; that would be about six to the county. He says to his marshal, "Go and get six good men from each one of the counties of this State." How is he going to select them? Can he follow the law of the State? No, you cannot put this judge and his clerk and his marshal all at the same time in every county of the State to select the six men out, nor can they travel all over the State at different times to draw these six men out.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will allow me, I will tell him how it is done in Massachusetts, and it seems to me it can be done so in every county in his State. The clerk of the court sends to the selectmen, that is, to the officers in each town all over the Commonwealth, to send so many jurors, three from this town, two from that town, four from the other town, and so on. They draw according to the State law out of the jury-box the proper number of names, and those names go to the United States court. What is to hinder that being done if it is a county officer who draws the jurors in a county?

Mr. HEREFORD. That would be the district court of the United States making these officers officers of the United States court. How does the United States judge know that these selectmen have sent to him the names out of their boxes? He knows nothing of the kind.

Mr. DAWES. Is the Senator aware that the Supreme Court have said that that is perfectly lawful, that although State officers cannot be compelled to perform that duty, yet if they perform it it is perfectly legal?

Mr. HEREFORD. I see nothing unlawful in it; and it only sustains my view of this case, because after these selectmen have sent names to the judge of the court or the clerk or marshal, as the case may be, and the judge selects them, he makes them his own selection or that of his marshal, and of course it is all correct.

The trouble is that there is no way to enforce section 800. Suppose these judges do not comply with the statute of the State, is that any ground for a challenge? No. It is a ground for challenge in the State court, because the statute of the State says so, and says if your jurors are not drawn so and so they are subject to challenge, and the whole array may be set aside; but there is nothing in the law of the United States that says if these jurors are not drawn in accordance with the statute of the State they are subject to challenge. The law of the State is not enforced for any such purpose, and for that reason I say that the Federal law on this subject should be amended not to leave the power of selecting the grand and petit jurors for the United States courts in the hands of any one man; and this committee in reporting this bill only carried out the recommendation of the late Attorney-General Pierrepont, who said:

There is no uniform system of obtaining jurors in the United States, and great abuses have sprung up, and much favoritism and corruption are complained of.

That is what we are complaining of now, that under the laws of the United States, in the language of Attorney-General Pierrepont, much corruption has sprung up, and we seek to amend the law in this way to stop that corruption. He says: "Great abuses have sprung up, and much favoritism and corruption are complained of." We wish to stop that, and we ask and invite the assistance of the Senators on the opposite side, in the language of your Attorney-General, to stop this favoritism, to stop this corruption, to change the law that allows it. He adds:

It is easy to provide a uniform mode of selecting jurors for the courts of the United States.

That is what we are demanding here; and further he says:

And I respectfully suggest that an act be passed to accomplish this result.

That is what we are trying to do. And the present Attorney-General says this:

My predecessors thought that a uniform method of drawing jurors for United States courts should be adopted for the whole country, and I add thereto my conviction of its propriety and usefulness.

So that we are invited by the present Administration through its Attorney-General, by the former Administration through its Attorney-General, to reform this jury law. They have invited us to do it. It is upon the recommendation of two Administrations that we are seeking to pass this very law, and we ought confidently to ask and expect the assistance of all the Senators on the other side to carry out the recommendations of two of their own Administrations.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I believe that there is an existing and essential public necessity for the reformation of the jury laws of this country with respect to the drawing of jurors in the Federal courts. My belief on this subject is drawn from experience in the Southern States. I can only express the views that I have to utter on this occasion with reference to my own experience and observation.

From the adoption of the act for the organization of the judiciary of the United States down to 1840 it was not found to be necessary to make any reformation or amendment of the jury law of this country. Indeed, the business of the Federal courts during that time had not grown to the immense magnitude that it now has; neither did that business cover the great number and variety of causes that are now subject to judicial consideration in those courts. In 1840, however, it was found to be necessary, in the opinion of Congress and, I dare say, of the judges, that there should be this amendment made in the law of 1789: that the judges of the different circuit courts and district courts might provide by rule for the adaptation of the manner of drawing jurors in the several courts to the laws and practice of the different States, because it was found that in the different States a variety of methods prevailed in regard to the selection of jurors, the various States having adopted different modes of accomplishing this important public purpose. Under the act of 1840 many of the courts of the United States did adopt rules, but these rules did not by adoption become laws. They were the mere rules of practice of each court, subject to its own discretion in the matter of their being adopted first, and afterward in the matter of being reversed or set aside. It was found under that practice, and it is now true, that the mere departure of one of the executive officers of the court from the rule of court in the drawing of a jury was not a matter of error upon which any party had a right to complain on appeal. It was always with the court to determine whether the action of its officers had been conformable to the requirements of its own rules, and no law was violated, but merely a rule of court, when an officer of the court refused or failed to draw a jury in conformity to those rules.

That was the way the matter stood and that is the way the matter stands now in legal contemplation. The judge of the circuit court or of a district court adopts rules applicable to the particular district for the drawing of a jury, and if the marshal and other officers of the court in drawing the jury violate these rules, when a party is put upon his trial and undertakes to make an exception or a challenge upon the ground that these rules of court have been violated, he has no legal remedy in the way of exception, on appeal, but he has to stand by the judgment of the court as a matter which rests entirely in its discretion.

It has been conceived by lawyers without reference to the particular matter that is before the Senate at this time, that it would be a very wise thing indeed to have some system of law under which a party who is on trial for his life or in reference to any other grave matter might have the right to take that exception, might have the right to come on that exception by appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and there have the question considered whether a lawful jury had been put upon him. I do not know any right that applies to an American citizen that is broader or deeper or stronger than that he shall have the right to inquire when put on trial before a jury of his country, whether or not that is a lawful jury, and to have that question decided by the Supreme Court. And whenever Congress undertakes to subvert the influence and power of the law in the protection of a right like this and to substitute in the place thereof a mere discretionary rule of court, Congress does not do its duty because it does not protect the essential rights of the citizen.

Hence, Mr. President, I think I have seen and I think the majority of the legal profession who have considered this question for years past have seen that there is a necessity for reformation in the laws of the United States as to the matter of drawing juries. The selecting of men to go upon juries and drawing juries after these men have been selected from that body, are matters that ought to be regulated by positive law, and these laws ought to be guarded with the utmost degree of caution and circumspection. This question has remained dormant, and would have slept perhaps without recognition of its importance but for the fact that during the war, in 1862, it became necessary in the opinion of the Congress of the United States that the subject of the qualifications of jurors as well as the manner of selecting them should undergo revision.

It was then considered by the Congress that it was necessary to impose additional grounds of disqualification upon jurors. The jury law enacted in 1862 was a part of the war machinery of this Government. It was intended by that law to prevent any man who was engaged in the rebellion or any man who sympathized with the rebellion from occupying a position in a Federal court which gave the right of judgment upon the rights of men, either civil or criminal. I do not complain of that law. I do not complain that the Government of the United States found itself necessitated perhaps, even in the non-seceding States, to adopt a system of jurisprudence which excluded at that time from the jury-box men who were known to be hostile to the Government of the United States; but my objection is to the continuance of that law, from a time of war, which it was intended to meet, to a time of peace to which it is utterly inapplicable.

It was altogether proper and right if it was constitutional that that disqualification should have been imposed upon all the jurors in the country at that time in view of the fact that there were then many prosecutions in the courts of the country in which the Government thought that it would be treated with extreme injustice if it did not impose upon all the citizens of the United States everywhere in all the States and Territories the disqualification which arose naturally out of the fact that the party might be in sympathy with the rebellion, aiding and abetting the arms of those who were engaged in that rebellion.

But, Mr. President, that was a law of very serious significance to men as well as the Government. That was a law of disfranchisement. That was a law which broke down natural rights—I say natural, I mean the rights secured by the laws and Constitution—of the people of the United States. What is a court of law in the United States—in all the States, and in the Federal Government, that has criminal jurisdiction, that has power to punish men for offenses? It is not a court composed simply of a judge selected by the President and confirmed by the Senate and sworn in office. That is not all of it. A court consists of a judge thus qualified and thus selected and a jury, and without the jury there can be no court. The jury is just as essentially a component part of the court as the judge. To the jury are intrusted duties and powers and functions as great in magnitude, as broad in their extent, as deep in their reach, and as powerful in their influence upon public justice as are confided to the judge. Our country has adopted the ancient common-law system of trial by jury. We have a right, a constitutional and inherent right to organize a court first by the selection of a judge to preside in the court and afterward by the selection of a jury qualified under the law to preside in the court. The jury is an independent body, has its powers and its functions just as distinct and independent as the court itself has. A great legal philosopher has written upon this subject and has defined to some extent the functions and uses and powers of a jury. I read from the writings of Jeremy Bentham:

> Of the functions exercised by the body of unlearned assessors, termed jurors or jurymen, the original intention as well as experienced use seems to be universally agreed as well as understood to be the serving as a check upon the power of the learned and experienced judge or judges under whose direction, or guidance at least, they have to act. In name, the decision pronounced in each cause, that decision at least to which the name of verdict is given, and in which not only the question of fact is decided upon, but a decision on the question of law (except in the particular case of a special verdict) is involved, is ascribed to them as if it were theirs alone; but, besides the power of sending the cause to a new trial before another jury, the effect of the power exercised by the professional judges is upon the whole so great, (the verdict having in no instance any effect until it be followed by a corresponding decision distinguished by the name of the judgment, the formation of which depends altogether on the professional part of the compound judicatory,) that a conception nearer to the truth will be formed by considering the main or principal power as in the hands of the judge, that of the jury serving as a check to his power, than by considering the principal power in the hands of the jury, that of the judge serving as a check to theirs.—Works of Jeremy Bentham, volume 5, page 67.

These two component parts of any judicatory in our country and in England are of equal and essential value, power, and authority, and though the judge may rule and control the jury, yet the jury is a powerful conservative element in every judgment that is to be pronounced and executed, with which we cannot dispense, unless we can get our consent to dispose of the real foundations of justice in this land.

Mr. President, we are very cautious about the selection of our judges, and we ought to be very anxious about them. The President of the United States is first consulted by a number of persons throughout a district or a circuit, and all information that can be possibly arrived at is sought for with a view to ascertain the peculiar qualifications of the person for pronouncing judgment, his knowledge of the law, his personal integrity, his standing in the community, what the people think of him as a man of judgment and uprightness; and after he is thus selected his name is brought to the Senate of the United States for confirmation, and we close the doors and shut out the world, and we enter into a full examination of all that belongs to the man relating to the exercise of the high functions of a judge, and after due deliberation we assent to his confirmation, and then he is appointed by the President and duly commissioned and sworn, and takes his place. And yet, after all this painstaking, after all this inquiry into character, ability, integrity, freedom from political bias and every other influence that might swerve him from the course of justice, he composes but one part of a court in this country.

How do the laws of the United States leave the other part of the court to be selected, that other part which is to pass upon life and liberty and character and property and all the other sacred things that belong to the American people—how is that part to be selected? Under the laws of the United States a marshal of the United States goes abroad in a district, which may comprise, as it does in my State, fifteen or twenty counties, and he selects according to his own private judgment or predilection the particular individuals to constitute this other part of that great tribunal. Who are they? Without saying more, it is enough to say that they are merely the men that this marshal may choose to select in his own unguarded, unguided, or unbridled discretion, to be assembled and impaneled and sworn to constitute the other part of this great judicatory.

At this point the difficulty arises. The question presented is whether or not there ought to be more care, more circumspection, more publicity, more non-partisanship, less influence of a personal and party character than is being exercised and has been exercised in the selection of this great tribunal? There is the question. It is that which the Senate has to deal with, and I maintain that there is no State in the American Union that has so imperfect a system of statutory enactments on the subject of the selection of juries as the United States has. There is not one State in the American Union whose statutes we could adopt out and out, without qualification or amendment, that would not present a better system for the selection of jurors than those that are provided under the statutes of the United States.

Ought this system to be improved? Is there any reason why the Congress of the United States should not engage in providing for the administration of justice in some sensible, fair, proper, and just way? Do we not hear of complaints coming up from all parts of the country which lead us to know that there is a general public demand for an improvement of the jury system of this country?

Mr. President, I admit as a matter of history that these complaints were not frequent, but were often felt and often urged in private, but they were not frequent as a matter of general public clamor until in 1862, and since that time the Government of the United States found itself necessitated to introduce political qualifications into the jury-box. I call them political qualifications. Perhaps Senators on the other side will differ with me. Senators on the other side will perhaps say that they were qualifications that depended upon the fact that a man in his sympathies was under the influence or control of the confederate view, and that, therefore, the disqualification was not one relating to his politics, but one relating to his crimes, and that he became criminal in the sense of the laws of the United States, became a convict under the laws of the United States, and, being a criminal and a convict under those laws, that was a disqualification which should forever shut him out from the jury-box. Grant that that is true; grant also that the Government was justifiable in taking that position; grant that there was no argument that could stand against it at the time or even now; yet since that time there has been universal amnesty; since that time there has been a wiping out by the proclamations of the Presidents of the United States of all crime, and those upon whom the direct shadow of the wing of condemnation hovered have been relieved by the Government of the United States under its Constitution, through its supreme Executive, by a universal amnesty. There remains none who are excepted—certainly none are excepted but those who are mentioned in the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, a small class reduced now to particular individuals that you can almost count on your ten fingers—all the rest have been set free by the pardon of the President. Every crime and every stigma that rested upon them has been wiped out; they stand to-day in the presence of all the laws of the United States as exempt from all right of challenge and from all degradation because of their having been engaged in the rebellion as any men who were engaged on the other side or in the armies of the other side, except in reference to one particular, and that is the right to sit in the jury-box.

But sections 820 and 821 of the Revised Statutes are denunciations of crime against every man in the Confederate States, no matter what his age might have been at the time of the war or of the secession of the several States, denunciations of crime against them from which they are unable to escape. Denunciations of judgment and penalty, conviction, and punishment against them stand to-day upon the statute-book, and if it be constitutional an absolute expulsion of every one of these men from the right of serving upon a jury.

Some Senators, not very recently, but frequently since I have had the honor to have a place upon this floor, have referred to this matter of serving on a jury with levity and have asked the question whether or not men were very anxious to perform the function and office of a juryman, whether they were candidates for such offices, whether or not these were offices to be sought for, favors to be prized, honors to be esteemed.

Mr. President, there is a double view of this question. There were about eight million white people in the South at the time of the rebellion, and that number has not fallen off, notwithstanding the losses during the war. I think it can be asserted as a universal truth that every man and woman in the Southern States participated in the rebellion to the extent that is denounced in sections 820 and 821 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. That may be a deplorable fact; nevertheless if you were to put the Book of God in the hands of those people and ask them to kiss it with an oath, they would tell you that was true. Then those who were under age and those who were over the age of twenty-one, and eligible to the jury-box, are all included within the denunciation of the statute. If you take a man of that class and put him upon his trial for any offense against the laws of the United States, or put his personal rights on trial on the civil side of the courts of the United States, that man looks around in vain among the jurors of the vicinage, everywhere, anywhere, he looks in vain among these people, and he says, "I find myself entitled under the Constitution of the United States to a fair and impartial trial by a jury of the vicinage; I find myself entitled as a man to a fair and impartial trial by a jury of the vicinage under the express provision of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, (something that was considered so important and so sacred that it was put into the form of an amendment and placed upon that instrument by way of emphasizing the right of an individual to have a trial like this;) and yet I find that all those people who know me, all those who are blood of my blood and flesh of my flesh and bone of my bone, are disfranchised from serving on the jury. They may have been young boys fifteen years of age when this struggle came, and the natural sympathies and emotions of their hearts may have led them to perform acts in the expression of their own inward convictions of duty, and at last, under the impulse of their affections, they have been led into a participation in this; and there are none of those who can preside as a part of this judicatory; there are none of those who can compose this court on my trial for my life, my character, my property, whatever it may be; they are excepted." Is not that citizen thus deprived of a fair and an impartial trial by a jury of the vicinage and of the district in which he lives?

It would seem to me, Mr. President, that any man who may stand fifty years from now upon this continent and look back to this day will be obliged to admit, after the heat and controversy of this great struggle has entirely faded from the recollection of living men, he would be obliged to say that man was deprived of a fair trial by an impartial jury of his own vicinage.

More than that. The balance of the population of the South consisted only of the African race and of those adventurers who came in there from the Northern States, or those good citizens, of whom I thank God there are a great many, who have come to settle among us in good faith and who are entirely welcome into our midst; but that is a small number. We have to throw ourselves upon the negro race for trial, and, in reference to the white race, unless we pick up the adventurers with those honorable men who have settled among us for the purposes of actual living and neighborship with ourselves, we have to take this sort of jury. Is not that man deprived of one of his rights under the Constitution of the United States?

At all events, the number is so reduced as that the marshal of the United States, if he chooses to do it, can select out of this small number those men whom he wants to fasten upon for the purpose of depriving that man of his rights or convicting him of crime. I maintain—and I venture to assert it before the Senate of the United States—that my right to sit on a jury is a right that belongs to me as an American citizen and it is my right until I am disqualified by some constitutional law. If I may be a Senator, I should be lawfully qualified as a juror. A young person who is eighteen years of age and will become a man in three years more, against whom there is a conviction, if you please, or a censure, or an accusation—I do not care what it may be—that will deprive him of the right to sit on all the juries of his State and of the United States is a man who comes into the possession of his faculties of manhood under a cloud and under a condemnation. Take the laws of the State of New York and let them provide that because a man shall commit certain offenses against society he shall be forever deprived of the right of sitting on a jury,—no fine, no imprisonment, no reference to his right to vote, but a statute that imposes upon a man the disqualification from sitting upon a jury as a punishment for crime, that man would feel and his family and friends would all feel that he had been degraded and disgraced for the balance of his life if a conviction of that sort rested upon him. You may just as well deny to a man the right to hold an office as to deny him the right to compose a part of an honorable tribunal for the trial of the rights of men, his neighbors, those by whom he may be surrounded. It is no paltry, mean, insignificant, or trifling right; it is a right of manhood, a right that belongs to a man because he is a citizen of the United States, and a right you cannot deprive him of by law without inflicting on him a serious calamity.

The act of 1862 is a law that deprives a man of a constitutional privilege, immunity, and right that belongs to him as a citizen of the United States. It is a bill of pains and penalties. When you conferred citizenship on the negro race in this country did you not at the same time confer upon them the right to sit upon juries? If you did not, then the Southern States have all been mistaken, because in consequence of that very particular principle all the Southern States have declared, through their judges and otherwise, that the negroes in that country being American citizens, and not otherwise disqualified, have the right to sit upon juries; and many a time have I argued cases before juries composed largely of negroes. I have argued cases before them involving thousands of dollars of property that depended upon the contents and construction of papers which the men upon the jury could not themselves read. I have been compelled to do this in obedience to the principle of law that the Constitution of the United States having conferred citizenship upon the negroes those that are twenty-one years of age and men of good character, freeholders or householders in my State not subject to challenge for favor or for cause, are competent jurors, and our cases have gone before them and we have had to submit to their verdicts.

Here is the influence of that principle. Here is the exemplification of American citizenship to which are attached certain rights and immunities which I think a State cannot deprive a man of. On that ground I do not believe there is a State in the American Union that can pass a valid law to exclude a man from the jury-box because he is a negro. Then these rights of which I speak are rights that belong to the very character, nature, and essence of American citizenship. They are of the same kind that were pronounced upon by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Cummings vs. The State of Missouri. Mr. Cummings, under the constitution of that State, was deprived of his right to preach as other men were disqualified from various other political and civil rights because they had been engaged either by participation actually or in sympathy with the rebellion. I will read from that decision:

> The disabilities created by the constitution of Missouri must be regarded as penalties; they constitute punishment.

And it is that particular view of this matter which I desire to call to the attention of the Senate, that the disabilities contained, as I insist, in sections 820 and 821 of the Revised Statutes are penalties, they are punishments:

> We do not agree with the counsel of Missouri that "to punish one is to deprive him of life, liberty, or property, and that to take from him anything less than these is no punishment at all." The learned counsel does not use these terms, life, liberty, and property, as comprehending every right known to the law. He does not include under liberty freedom from outrage on the feelings as well as restraints on the person. He does not include under property those estates which one may acquire in professions, though they are often the source of the highest emoluments and honors. The deprivation of any rights, civil or political, previously enjoyed may be punishment, the circumstances attending and the causes of the deprivation determining this fact. Disqualification from office may be punishment, as in cases of conviction upon impeachment. Disqualification from the pursuits of a lawful avocation, or from positions of trust, or from the privilege of appearing in the courts or acting as an executor, administrator, or guardian, may also, and often has been, imposed as punishment.—4 Wallace's Reports, 320.

The court then cite various British statutes which apply to subjects cognate to this, and they hold that the deprivation of any man by statute of a privilege, a right, an immunity, which before that time he enjoyed, is a deprivation which is unconstitutional because it has not been done by the judgment of a court but has been done merely by act of positive law—a bill of pains and penalties.

It is not necessary for the support of this bill that I should assume the position that these sections 820 and 821 of the Revised Statutes operate as penalties and punishment inflicted on men by act of Congress, and yet I do assume it. I do state that to be my belief, because I think that it is capable (if I had the time to do it) of absolute demonstration that when an act of Congress deprives a citizen of the United States forever of the right of sitting on a jury of his country, that act deprives him of a right and privilege in which he is personally interested, which belongs to his character and honor as a citizen, and a privilege also which those who are associated with him in society have a right to claim that he shall enjoy. These two sections are stricken down by this bill. One of them had been stricken down before. The Congress of the United States when it was thoroughly republican on both sides and when there was a republican President struck down section 820; but afterward it was resuscitated, it came to life again, its foul form crept back into the statute-book again, and there was in that act some base connivance of some man or some men that ought to shame them, whoever they may be, as long as recollection can recall their memory. Congress repealed the law, being disgusted with the thought of its being upon the statute-book. The very party that put it there repealed it, struck it out, and afterward by an act of fraudulent contrivance stuck it back in the statute-book and enforced it upon the people.

That is the situation in regard to that statute; and yet Senators get up here and defend it. As I understood the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to-day, he announced that his people would be abhorrent at the thought of that statute being stricken off the book. God save such a people if that be their condition!

Mr. President, in the debate that occurred on this bill on Saturday certain expressions were used by the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] and the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] in regard to this particular bill that I think are worthy of attention and consideration. The Senator from Maine said as follows, replying to a remark of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY:]

The Senator from Delaware thinks because in a gracious moment of clemency, after sufficient punishment had been inflicted, and the President had exercised the pardoning power, that that must be taken as proof of innocence. By no means. There are often a great many reasons, personal and political, for granting a pardon. There were a great many ku-klux prisoners taken out of the Albany penitentiary upon special representations to the late President of the United States, General Grant, that great good would result in the South, that a good condition of affairs would be brought about by such a display of executive clemency. Does the honorable Senator understand that in the opinion of General Grant he had any doubt whatever of the guilt of those men? Not at all.

Mr. CONKLING. Many of them pleaded guilty.

Mr. BLAINE. Many of them, the Senator from New York says, pleaded guilty. They were sent to the penitentiary by scores and shoals. Many besides those sent had nol pros. entered who would have been convicted had not official instruction gone from this city to show clemency. I have heard what the Senator from New York [Mr. KERNAN] says, bandied about on this floor and everywhere as a piece of political claptrap, that juries were corruptly drawn and convictions corruptly obtained in the South. I want the names—I want the names of twenty or ten or five or one such man, and if Senators cannot give it I hope it will be the end of all this talk about the necessity for the first time of inserting into the laws of the United States a provision that you shall have a man of well-known political character of the opposite political party to be stationed on the opposite side of a jury-box to the clerk of the United States court, and that they there shall agree to settle on political grounds what shall be the jury in the courts of the United States. It is the first time such a thing was ever attempted, and it is an absolute and deep disgrace to the statutes of the United States to put it there.

The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] said:

Now, Mr. President, I, too, have heard a great deal of talk about juries being packed in this State and in that State and in some other State; always I believe in the State from which the informant does not come. And I have heard how men have been convicted unrighteously, innocent men. That is a very rare occurrence. Such instances are very sparse in the whole volume of judicial annals in the most stormy, the most bloody, and the most barbarous times. I do not believe an instance, unless one so rare, so conspicuous as to be the exception which is said to prove all general rules, can be found of any such thing; and I am so venturesome as to do this: I will enter into this engagement with any Senator: If he will show me an instance in which in the national courts a jury has been packed, I will show him an instance in which the marshal is impeachable and indictable, or else I will show him an instance in which the State where that occurrence took place has been so heedless in devising jury laws that the dereliction is absolutely flagitious. Now I see my excellent friend from Indiana has risen.

Here the two Senators concur in expressing the opinion that all that has been said on the subject of packed juries and improper convictions is mere clap-trap gotten up for the purpose of doing what? Of influencing the Congress of the United States to pass some absurd law, some law that can have no meaning or efficacy in it, some law that disgraces, as these gentlemen say, the statute-books of the country. Mr. President, I take issue with these gentlemen upon that question, and I think I may safely affirm, so far as my State is concerned, that it is neither clap-trap nor a false alarm nor a false accusation, but that the business of packing juries in Alabama in the Federal courts has become a systematic business, and that false convictions have resulted as a matter of course from this state of affairs.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] undertakes to show that where cases can be pointed out by a Senator of false convictions, the records of the Attorney-General's Office when they are presented here will justify the convictions. I dare say the honorable Senator from Maine can easily do that, because in almost every case of false conviction of any consequence the moment the guilty parties have accomplished their purposes they flood the Attorney-General's Office with affidavits for the purpose of sustaining that conviction; but that is not the way to have a fair trial. The way to get a fair trial of such a question is to go among the people where these convictions have taken place and take the judgment and sentiment of the country in regard to matters of this kind. If a whole people believe that under the existing laws corruptions have crept in, whereby justice is perverted and innocence convicted and guilt discharged without punishment, the Congress of the United States should respect the sentiments and convictions of the people and act upon them in reference to the improvement of their laws, for it is the people after all that we are responsible to, and it is our duty to conform the laws of the United States so as to satisfy the people themselves that justice is administered in the courts.

The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] has ventured the suggestion that very few innocent men are convicted. I dare say the honorable gentleman is correct in that particular, and yet it is equally true, when communities speak out boldly and continuously in regard to the corruptions of the jury-box, and year after year these complaints are coming up to Congress and the different departments of the Government of the United States, that those people speak of things that they know and that they feel. False clamors do not arise among the people, especially in regard to the corruptions of the judiciary, unless they have some solid and substantial foundation in fact. The people of this country are reverential toward the judiciary, and they ought to be. I would always encourage a feeling of that kind; but, in spite of all that you can do and all that you can say, you cannot smother the tongue of reproach that thunders from the people when they find that the laws of the country have been systematically abused and their judicial functionaries have been systematically corrupted for the purpose of inflicting injustice and wrong upon honest men.

The honorable Senator from New York took the ground, as I understood him, that the laws of the United States, as they stand at present, adopting the laws of the different States in reference to the qualifications of jurors, are quite sufficient to meet the difficulties of the situation, and that the trouble is in the administration of the laws and not in the infirmity of the laws themselves. There I take issue with the honorable Senator. It is true that the laws of the States must guide the Federal courts in regard to the qualification of jurors, and also in the matter of selecting jurors, but the laws of the United States do not control the marshals of the United States in selecting from the body of the communities such men as they please to select for the purpose of being placed on the jury. In the State of Alabama from 1865, and perhaps from a date antecedent to that, down to about 1876, there was no rule for the selection of grand or petit jurors governing the marshals of the United States. An order was issued from the court that a jury should be impaneled, the law prescribing the number of men of which that jury should consist. The districts comprising some fourteen or fifteen counties each, covering a large breadth of country, were the area from which the marshal was to select the men to comprise the juries. He sat down in his office, or inquired of his friends in reference to those who might be proper jurors, and he assembled the number of men required in the order of the court, and he made a return of that as a venire to the court. There was no other selection made of jurors, and the parties were put immediately to the question of a challenge of the array, or a challenge for favor or for cause. If there is one State in the American Union that under the existing laws is liable to an abuse of this kind, then I would say it is the duty of Congress to correct the laws; and yet we hear from Senators that there are various States in which like looseness of practice prevails, and the marshals are left entirely to their own discretion in the selection of the jurors.

Now we can see, Mr. President, that it must depend very essentially, if not entirely, upon who is the marshal and upon his deputies whether we get fair juries or bad juries. All the rights of the people of this country are thus made to depend on the integrity of a set of men, the marshal and his deputies. I say that to leave the law of this country in that uncertain state, to leave the composition of one of these grand judicatories in the hands and at the discretion of a single man and his deputies, is to give him more power than belongs to any department of the American Government. It gives him power over life and death; it gives him power to decide upon a man's property rights and his character, and there is no restriction that you can impose upon him except the mere right of challenge—challenge for cause or challenge for favor.

Let me ask the lawyers on this floor how is a party to challenge the array when a jury is thus assembled? The marshal has picked men to suit himself. That was his right, his privilege. He has chosen men who have not good reputation in their neighborhood. How are you going to prove that? A challenge to the array is absolutely impossible under an order of the kind I have mentioned. Your only resort is a challenge for favor or a challenge for cause.

Now, I suggest to the Senate a difficulty in the application of the law of Alabama to the filling up of the petit and grand juries in the Federal courts in that State. It is that you have got some fifteen or it may be twenty counties—I forget the precise number of the counties—in a judicial district. In each county a list of jurors is prepared in the following manner: Biennially the sheriff of the county must make up a full and complete list of every householder and freeholder in his county who is a man over twenty-one years of age. He brings that list to the judge of probate, the sheriff, and the clerk of the circuit court; they canvass these names; they ascertain whether they are householders or freeholders and whether they are men of honest and fair character in their communities; these names are carefully rolled up and put into a box, and a lock is put upon it, and then at a certain day, twenty days preceding each circuit court, the same officials meet together and from that box they draw the number of petit jurors and grand jurors prescribed by the law to be summoned for the term, and they proceed to draw until they get the requisite number, and this list is the venire.

Now, do we not see that it is next to impossible for the Federal court at Montgomery to get from these boxes these jurors. Hence some other plan must be resorted to. The courts in their efforts to adapt their practice to the State statutes and the State requirements found that these statutes were in the way of the adoption of this system, and it was impossible to do it. The courts have thus been compelled to one of two resorts. The first is to leave the selection to the marshal, which has hitherto been done; and the next is to adopt rules of court to regulate the selection, which I have shown, so far as the right of individuals is concerned, are mere brutum fulmen. They are not laws, but mere rules of practice adopted by a particular court. It is very easy, after you have got a sufficient number of names together from which to select a jury, to go on and select it in accordance with the laws of the State; that is to say, that the marshal shall draw and the clerk shall record as each name shall be drawn from a box; but the difficulty is in getting the names into the box; the difficulty is not in getting an organization of the jury, but in reference to the manner in which the names are first to be placed in the box from which the jury is to be selected.

The disgraceful part of this bill, as it has been proclaimed to the world by the honorable Senator from New York and the honorable Senator from Maine, is that part of it which provides that two commissioners shall be appointed for the purpose of selecting the names to go into this box who shall be of opposing political parties. I believe there is no man who regrets more sincerely than I do the necessity of putting into the laws of the United States anything that relates to an inquiry as to a person's political principles as a matter upon which a court is to act; but we are legislating in regard to things as they are and not in regard to things as they ought to be. We are legislating now for the correction of evils pressing upon this country, which evils have not sprung from any improper conduct upon the part of the people, but evils that have sprung alone from the political bias and partisanship which has influenced the legislation of Congress itself.

I have adverted to the imposition in 1862 of political qualifications, or rather disqualifications, upon the juries of the country. That was the first time that politics found its way into the judiciary of the land. After the war, in 1865 and 1866 and 1867, for the first time the courts of the United States were given jurisdiction of political offenses. I am not complaining that your courts were then empowered to decide upon political offenses; it may have been necessary that it should have been; yet the fact is that that was the first time that any statute of the United States required a judge or a court of this country to pass upon a man's politics. When you undertook to extend the jurisdiction of the laws of the United States and the courts of the United States over the ballot-box, when you undertook to create a great number of political offenses with reference to the ballot-box, when you undertook to give your judges jurisdiction to try men for offenses which had hitherto been offenses only against the laws of the States, then it was, and as a part of that very system, a part without which that system would have been altogether imperfect, that you enacted a law such as section 2012 of the Revised Statutes. I will read that law:

> The court, when so opened by the judge, shall proceed to appoint and commission, from day to day and from time to time, and under the bond of the judge, and under the seal of the court, for each election district or voting precinct in such city or town, or for such election district or voting precinct in the congressional district, as may have applied in the manner hereinbefore prescribed, and to revoke, change, or renew such appointment from time to time, two citizens, residents of the city or town, or of the election district or voting precinct in the county or parish, who shall be of different political parties, and able to read and write the English language, and who shall be known and designated as supervisors of election.

The court shall be opened within a State and presided over by the circuit judge, if he can attend; if not, by a district judge to be designated by him; and upon an application made before that court it proceeds to the inquiry that is submitted to it. And the inquiry is of a judicial character, "to which political party does the man belong?" There we find the example set by the republican party when they had two-thirds majority in each House of Congress, and the President also, requiring the judges of the circuit court of the United States to open court in due form and call the parties before it, to hear petitions and applications for the appointment of an officer of the United States Government, which officer when appointed should have very high powers both ministerial and judicial, arbitrary powers indeed, and the court must inquire, according to this statute, as to which political party the man belonged. Thus the republican party laid down that basis of legislation out of which has grown the necessity for this bill, which bill, thus sprung from its natural ancestor, the honorable Senators from New York and Maine denominate as disgraceful. Whose disgrace is it? It is the disgrace of the parent and not of the child. It is the disgrace of the authors of these schemes and not of the men who have the correction of such evils in their hands. It is the disgrace of those who have put this foul blot and stain on the country and not of the men who have come now to legislate for the correction of the evils as they exist. There is where the disgrace rests, and not upon those who are trying to get rid of it.

Senators may talk about disgrace, they may elevate their noses to the heavens and declaim against the disgrace on the democratic party for bringing these things into the Senate, but the country will not allow them to forget that they are the authors and inventors of this evil. Because you have conferred upon your Federal courts jurisdiction of political offenses, because you have constrained your judges to go down into the strifes of the elections and there select the agencies of party to carry out their dirty schemes, because you have stained the ermine of the judiciary of this country with these foul stains and blots, we have felt ourselves compelled to come to the rescue and to adopt a system of legislation that we never would have thought of resorting to but for the necessity that you put us under to relieve the country from the influence of partisanship in the jury-box and upon the bench.

Mr. President, the judiciary of the United States is almost under the absolute control of the political power. The bench should be an independent department. It was the anchor of hope to those great men who ordained this system, and when they looked forward through the times of turbulence that might arise, as they must always arise in the administration of the affairs of a free government managed by the people, they looked to this judiciary as the strongest safeguard of the liberties of the people as well as of the States, but they evidently did not contemplate the time when their judges would be appointed merely with reference to their party and political affiliations, and when they would be required to subordinate themselves as party hacks to carry out the designs of politicians. And yet that time has arrived, or at all events, whether it has or not, the people of the United States believe that it has arrived, and that belief will be transmitted to posterity until it becomes crystallized into a fact of history; it will grow into the condemnation of this generation of men for having perverted the judiciary into a mere system of political machinery.

What is more common than to find the Chief-Justice of the United States and other judges put upon the bench because of services rendered to a political party. I have heard it intimated by the honorable Senator from Maine in debate not long since that Chief-Justice Taney had been put upon the bench because he favored particular measures of General Jackson's administration in regard to removing the public deposits. Is that so, or is it not so? If General Jackson put him on the bench for that purpose, although he placed a great jurist upon the bench, he committed a crime against his country and against posterity. I have heard it said that Chief-Justice Chase was put upon the bench because he had served his party faithfully and ably, and particularly in the devising of the scheme of the national banks and the legal-tender system during the war.

I have heard it said that Mr. Williams, of Oregon, had been tendered the place of Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States because he was a personal and intimate friend and a Cabinet officer of a President of the United States. I have heard it said, and I believe it to be true, that Caleb Cushing, who was a great man in the judiciary of this country, who had great renown as a jurist and I believe an unimpeachable character for honesty and uprightness, was rejected by the Senate of the United States because at some time or other he had expressed a sense of respect for Jefferson Davis, the president of the Confederate States. I have heard it stated, and the people believe it, that two judges of the Supreme Court of the United States were put on the bench because their opinions were known and it was understood that they would decide that legal-tenders were constitutional money. I have heard it said that certain judges of the Supreme Court of the United States were selected and placed upon the joint commission that was to decide the fate of this country in reference to the Presidency because they were known to be the firm and warm adherents of a certain political party and that they might be relied on for a certain sort of judgment. I have heard it said that Richard Busteed, of New York, was taken from New York and placed upon the bench in the South for a twofold purpose, one of which was to get rid of a man in the Army who was a malcontent and could not be controlled there, and the other because the confederate congress in a memorial that they had addressed to the people had denounced this man's appointment in advance as one that was likely to be made. I have heard that Mr. McLin, of Florida, was selected and sent to a Territory as judge of a territorial court to reward him for complicity in frauds in regard to the presidential election. I have heard that a man in North Carolina that was beaten for governor there was afterward transplanted to Florida and made a Federal judge, and since that time, in the opinion of the bar of that country and the people there, he has lost all restraint of conscience. I have heard of Durell and of Billings, and I have not heard of a case in which a judge has been promoted to the bench solely on account of his personal merits. Perhaps I ought not to speak of cases pending, and I will not; yet there are grounds of suspicion on the part of people of the United States that men are now being selected and put upon the bench of the United States because of their adherence to the partisan demands of a President or his party. This is why I say that the people of the United States believe, whether justly or not, that the judiciary of the United States is being corrupted; that it is being made a grand receptacle for pensioners and political hacks and broken-down men who cannot find anywhere else to go. When a man gets down in public estimation so that the people will not any longer sustain him, when he does some foul villainy, or at least the country believes that he does, which ought to consign him to the penitentiary instead of to the bench, he is put there as a pensioner on the country.

It is time, Mr. President and Senators, that we had looked to this question of the reformation of the judiciary of this land, and it is time that we had ceased to try to burden either the judges or the juries with any of those duties which lead them necessarily to the service of a party instead of the dispensation of justice. It is because you have compelled your judges to participate in elections, because you have thus widened out the area of Federal jurisdiction and have made the bench a political machine, that these troubles have come. That is the reason why we have now to legislate so that when we select men to be placed upon the juries of the country, we insist that there shall be one man of each party to make the selections, so that we shall be assured of fair play.

Now the challenge is again brought here from Senators and I am going to meet it, about packing juries. It is neither according to my taste nor my wishes to intrude such subjects on the Senate; but when Senators get up here and demand evidence of this kind, I congratulate myself that by going no further than the files of the Senate I have the proofs which the Senate itself has considered at one time or another, which show that these juries have been packed, corruptly packed, and I can assert in addition, systematically packed.

When the honorable Senator from Maine threw down this challenge and when the honorable Senator from New York did the same thing, and I found they were working so harmoniously together, reminding me of the peacocks that drew the chariot of Juno through the heavens in their harmony and in their marching together in beautiful array, I thought it was time to go to the files of the Senate where I knew I could go with safety and bring forward some evidence. They are not democrats that I am going to read from. All the witnesses I shall present are republicans. Shall I be asked to indorse their character? I hope not. I cannot do that. All I can say for them is that they are consistent members of the republican party and they served that party in all emergencies according to the best of their ability. I will read some affidavits that I find on the files of the Senate, beginning with an affidavit of Theodore Guesnard, jr.:

United States circuit court for the southern district of Alabama:

Personally appeared Theodore Guesnard, jr., a citizen of Mobile County, Alabama, who being duly sworn deposes and says, that it was a general rumor and talk on the streets, in city of Mobile, that the United States grand jury which was in session during the term of the United States circuit court at Mobile, Alabama, which was convened on the 2d day of January, 1878, had been packed in order to prevent true bills from being found by said grand jury against Lou H. Meyer and John J. Moulton, they both having been arrested on account of irregularities in the United States internal-revenue office at Mobile, and brought before a United States commissioner; that intimate friends of said Lou H. Meyer and Moulton had been chosen by the marshal and summoned to serve as talesmen on said grand jury, among whom was one Paul Ravises, a United States commissioner and shipping commissioner, and George E. Yarrington, who is also connected in some capacity in the internal-revenue office at Mobile; that it was generally considered that the two above-named jurors, especially, were placed on said grand jury to use their influence in preventing a true bill being found against said Meyer and Moulton; that it was a disgrace to the United States Government the way things were carried on by the marshal.

[SEAL.] HENRY S. SKAATS,

United States Commissioner, Southern District Alabama.

There is no proof in that, there is no evidence there at all, but it is the opinion of a republican in the city of Mobile in regard to matters that were transacted among the republicans in that city, and I give that for what it is worth. If there was nothing else but a prevailing opinion of this kind in the city of Mobile, it would be the duty of Congress to look at it and see whether there ought not to be some remedy by amendment of laws to correct this difficulty. But now I proceed further.

I read this affidavit of P. W. Smith for the purpose of showing to the Senate one instance in reference to the importance that is attached in that country to getting on a jury. The office of a juror, though it is laughed at and scouted by the honorable Senators on the other side, is one that is sought after by republicans in Alabama with as much avidity almost as senatorships are sought after by some gentlemen who come here. Three dollars a day through an average of some thirty or forty or fifty days, as the courts very often last that length of time, is a matter of very grave consideration with these men; and hence they go about and they electioneer and they use all manner of influence and make all manner of promises to get on the jury. If you want to select thirty or sixty of the best workers in a party to be found anywhere go to these men and tell them you will put them on the Federal juries and give them $3 a day and mileage from home and back, and you have secured all that you want on that point. Here is P. W. Smith. He makes an affidavit for the purpose of exonerating one of his friends from an accusation brought by a republican against him:

STATE OF ALABAMA,
Montgomery County:

Before me, J. W. Dimmick, circuit court commissioner of United States, personally appears P. W. Smith, who is known to me, and who, being sworn, says that after he had been selected as a juror in the United States district court at the November term, not knowing that he had been so selected, stated to Marshal Reid that if he would put him on the jury he would be able to pay Mrs. Reading (who is a sister-in law of said Reid) certain rents which he owed her. Said Reid replied that he could not put him on the jury on that account; that such a consideration could not enter into the selection of jurors. He also said that affiant was, in his opinion, competent and a good republican, and affiant supposed from what passed that he had already been selected. Affiant denies that there was any agreement whatever to the effect that he was to pay the rent due Mrs. Reading, or any other agreement whatever between affiant and the said Reid in reference to affiant's selection as a juror. Affiant says further that he has since paid $15 of the rent due by him to Mrs. Reading with his fees as a juror, but it was done voluntarily on his part, and without suggestion from said Reid. Affiant says further that the debt due Mrs. Reading amounted to only $15, which he was anxious to pay, and repeats that he paid the same freely of his own accord, and without the slightest intimation from said Reid that he should do so. Everything that passed in the said conversation in reference to payment of the rent came from affiant, and said Reid turned away abruptly as if the subject was unpleasant to him, and affiant regretted that he had alluded to it at all.

J. W. DIMMICK,

United States Commissioner in and for the Middle District of Alabama.

I have read that for the purpose of showing the Senate what importance is attached to the two requisites for a juror in Alabama, one that he should be a republican, and the other that he should be a friend of the marshal.

Now I will read the affidavit of George Cottin. George Cottin was for many years a deputy marshal of the United States, first during the administration of John Hardy, and afterward during the administration of General R. W. Healy, in the southern district of Alabama. I have attended that court frequently, and have always found Cottin there acting as a deputy marshal of the United States. He says:

Statement sworn to by George Cottin and Richard T. Payne, Mobile, Alabama.

1. At the term of the United States circuit court for southern district of Alabama, which was convened on the 2d day of January, 1878, at which term of said court a grand jury was impaneled by the marshal of said district. On the first day upon which the court was opened the list of grand jurors was called in open court and nineteen of the panel answered to their names, four were excused by the court from serving as grand jurors, and which left only fifteen of the regular panel. The panel not being full, the marshal asked the court for an order to summon grand jurors enough to fill the panel. Whereupon the court ordered five additional grand jurors to be summoned, and the marshal in short time had summoned the following five persons as grand jurors, as talesmen, to wit: Paul Ravisiss, a United States commissioner; George E. Yarrington, a United States deputy collector of internal revenue; T. J. Hicky, Augustus Boullement, and Thomas White.

2. On or about the 15th day of December, 1877, Lou H. Meyer, collector of internal revenue for the first collection district of Alabama—

And who, by the way, was the brother of the district attorney for the middle district of that State—

was arrested and brought before United States Commissioner H. S. Skaats on a charge of embezzling money belonging to the United States, and at the trial before said commissioner the case against said Lou H. Meyer was dismissed by said commissioner, there being no evidence to implicate said Meyer directly; but upon the evidence produced before said commissioner at said Meyer's trial, it was shown that John J. Moulton, a deputy collector under said Lou H. Meyer, was guilty of the charge upon which Lou H. Meyer had been arrested, whereupon an affidavit was made against said Moulton by H. A. Candee, first deputy and cashier under Lou H. Meyer, whereupon said Moulton was arrested and waived examination—

I call the attention of Senators to the name of that man, H. A. Candee, because I will read a letter from him presently—before United States Commissioner Skaats and gave bond in the sum of $1,000 to await the action of the grand jury at the December term of the circuit court, which convened on the 2d day of January, 1878.

3. Michael Lardner, Allen Alexander, George Robinson, R. T. Payne were all duly summoned as United States witnesses, and did appear and testify before said grand jury; and notwithstanding the positive proof which these witnesses had against Moulton there was no true bill found against said Moulton; which shows conclusively that the five talesmen above named, picked out by the marshal or his deputy, used their influence in the grand-jury room to prevent a true bill being found against said Meyer or Moulton.

4. George E. Yarrington, one of the five talesmen, who has been and is now connected with the office of the internal revenue at Mobile, made the complaints as a revenue officer against several parties for violations against the revenue laws, and was also a witness in certain cases in which he made the affidavits as such revenue officer before the United States commissioner; and the marshal or his deputy, knowing these facts, did summon said Yarrington as a grand juror as aforesaid, when really said Yarrington should have been a witness before said grand jury.

5. A few days previous to the arrest of said Lou H. Meyer, said John J. Moulton came to me, R. T. Payne, and offered me $100 if I would not make an affidavit against said Lou H. Meyer before a United States commissioner, which I refused to take, and did, after said offer was made, make an affidavit against said Meyer, upon which he was arrested.

Personally appeared before me, Henry S. Skaats, a United States commissioner for the southern district of Alabama, George Cottin and R. T. Payne, who, both being duly sworn, say that the above statement is true to the best of their knowledge and belief.

That may be said not to be "positive proof" of the fact there alleged. George Robinson goes on to give some of the facts upon which this prosecution was based. I read his affidavit:

Personally appeared George Robinson, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says: That on or about the 20th day of October, 1877, one Dominick Querine called affiant into his place of business and showed him lithograph receipt signed "Lou H. Meyer, collector," which said Dominick Querine had received on the 1st day of May, 1877, from the internal-revenue office, for $30, that $30 being the tax for retailing liquor and tobacco for the year commencing May 1, 1877, and ending May 1, 1878. This receipt Dominick Querine informed affiant had been given to him in lieu of the regular tax-stamp or license, the said Querine having been informed at the revenue office that they had no stamp or license on hand, and that they would send him the stamp or license as soon as they received them from the Department at Washington.

Affiant further says that Dominick Querine applied at the revenue office several times for his license, and was repeatedly told that they had not yet received any.

Affiant further says that he told Querine that he had better get his license from the revenue office or he might be indicted by the United States grand jury; whereupon said Dominick Querine, in November, 1877, again applied to the revenue office and received his license, the face showing that he had paid $30 and only six coupons attached, whereas there should have been twelve coupons attached to said license, as said Dominick Querine had paid $30 for said license, the revenue office thereby defrauding the United States Government out of the money collected from said Dominick Querine for the first six months, viz: May, June, July, August, September, and October, 1877; for which six months coupons should not have been detached from the license which he received from the revenue office in the month of November, as in fact the coupons for the first six months had been detached from said license.

GEORGE ROBINSON.

[SEAL.] HENRY S. SKAATS,

United States Commissioner Southern District of Alabama.

There can be no doubt that these men whose testimony I have now laid before the Senate believed that this crime had been committed, and they were there for the purpose of proving it upon these parties. Here is another affidavit of this man Richard T. Payne:

Personally appeared Richard T. Payne, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says: That on or about the 15th day of December, 1877, he swore out an affidavit against Lou H. Meyer, collector of internal revenue for the first collection district of Alabama, for embezzlement of public money of the United States, before Henry S. Skaats, United States commissioner; that before swearing out the affidavit one John J. Moulton, who at the time was a deputy collector under Lou H. Meyer, came to affiant and offered him $100 if he, affiant, would not make an affidavit against Lou H. Meyer, which offer affiant refused to accept, and did make an affidavit against said Lou H. Meyer, who was arrested and tried before Henry S. Skaats, a United States commissioner.

Affiant further says that upon the trial of said Meyer before said commissioner, one Harry A. Candee, who was at the time and is still chief deputy collector and cashier under Lou H. Meyer, and who also was summoned as a witness against Lou H. Meyer, and who did not appear on the first day of the trial with the books from the revenue office, said books being required as evidence before the commissioner. The commissioner thereupon ordered Lou H. Meyer to produce said books; whereupon said Lou H. Meyer and Terry Lawrence, another of Lou H. Meyer's deputies, went to the revenue office and searched for said books, and told said commissioner that the books were not to be found in the office.

Affiant further says that on the day after, the case still being on trial, H. A. Candee came into court, called Lou H. Meyer aside, and told him that the books had been altered the previous night, which was during the trial of said case. Affiant further says that it was in the case of Dominick Querine that he had Lou H. Meyer arrested. Affiant further says that he reported the case while acting as deputy marshal, that fact being told to me officially as deputy marshal by worthy citizens.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 7th day of March, A. D. 1878.

HENRY S. SKAATS,

United States Commissioner, Southern District of Alabama.

The officer put in charge of that grand jury on that occasion was a man against whom there was then pending in that court an indictment for a felony, and he remained in charge of that grand jury until within two days before his trial came up.

Here is an affidavit of Mr. George Cottin, proving an original letter written by H. A. Candee, deputy of the United States internal revenue collector, to his friend, Mr. Robert James, who then lived in Eutaw, Greene County, Alabama. Mr. James was also a deputy internal-revenue collector. After speaking of some other business, he says:

Now, you speak of the leak, did you not know all about John Moulton's scrape? I thought you did, or would have written you. Well, Mike Lardner got track of one of the stamps that John fixed, and Lou's name—being signed thereto, thought he had L., and had him arrested, but of course it was pinned on John—

That is Meyer's name—

That is Moulton—

but F. A.—

That is Frank Anderson—

managed to fix the grand jury so that they failed to indict.

There is a letter from Candee, whose connection has been shown with this very matter by the affidavits of these men—an original letter by Candee, written to one of his friends, in which he says expressly Frank Anderson managed to fix the grand jury so as to keep Moulton from being indicted.

I will not detain the Senate by reading further evidence on that proposition. These affidavits establish the fact, I think as clearly as it ought to be expected to be established on an occasion of this kind, drawn from the files of the Senate of the United States. The accusation is here under oath. It shows a particular reason for the packing of this grand jury, and the men by whom it was packed, and the manner in which it was done.

Now, I beg leave to say in addition to this that it has been my observation in both grand and petit juries in the State of Alabama, that it is a rare instance of the assemblage of either one that there is not a number of Federal officials upon it. It is the commonest thing to find the Federal officials, particularly those who are connected with the revenue service and the administration of justice, deputy marshals and men like that, upon the Federal grand juries in that State. The very persistence in making such draughts of jurymen as this would of itself cast suspicion on any jury in the mind of an honest and fair-minded man.

Mr. President, this system of drawing grand juries and petit juries, but particularly grand juries, in my State had gone on until Judge Woods arrived at a knowledge of the fact that some steps had to be taken for the purpose of correcting this evil. The United States marshals had gone out and summoned just such men as they pleased, and in consequence of the summoning of these men they prevented indictments being found against the worst marauders in the Treasury, and secured indictments against men for mere political offenses, many of them offenses not described in any law, merely hatched up in the fancy of an enterprising district attorney.

There was a case of a man in the middle district of Alabama who had for several years been deputy collector of internal revenue. There was a gentleman in my State by the name of William H. Smith, who used to be its governor, a republican, and I will take occasion to express my opinion of him, that he is a man of honor and probity. It came to the knowledge of Governor Smith, papers came into his hand to show that this deputy internal-revenue collector had been in the habit of issuing stamps or licenses for the sale of manufactured tobacco at retail, which I believe cost $5. He would put on the margin of his stamp-book that a certain license was issued to a man on a certain day to retail manufactured tobacco for which he had received $5, and he would interline in the body of the stamp which he gave, "spirituous liquors," which was $25, and upon every issue of stamps of this kind that man would make $20. These papers came into the possession of Governor Smith. He brought them to this city and put them into the hands of Mr. Raum, and Mr. Raum sent them to the district attorney of the middle district of Alabama. A grand jury was summoned there upon which there were five collectors and deputy collectors of the United States, and of course no bill was found. At the next term of the court there was no grand jury summoned for the alleged want of funds. At the next term of the court, when the statute of limitations had worked a bar, a grand jury was summoned, and Judge Woods made an order granting the venire.

Here the collector of internal revenue of the United States reports to Mr. Raum that the deputy marshals are in connivance with illicit distillers and the illicit traders in whisky and tobacco. And the marshal or his deputies stock the grand jury, and prevent this man from being indicted.

Here is the evidence before the Senate. Not only so, but this marshal of the United States appoints as his deputies two men, one of the name of Williford and the other is named Randolph, both of whom were indicted in the Federal courts of the United States, and the indictment was standing there at the time of his appointing these deputies, for the offense of embezzling the money of the United States. Those are the men who go out and select the juries.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
CIRCUIT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES,
MIDDLE DISTRICT OF ALABAMA,
May Term, 1875.

The grand jurors of the United States elected, impaneled, sworn, and charged to inquire for the body of said middle district of Alabama, upon their oaths present that before finding this indictment, and in said middle district of Alabama, to wit, in the county of ——, George B. Randolph and John D. Williford, being then and there duly appointed deputy marshals of the United States for the middle district of Alabama, and acting as such deputy marshals, did accept from E. M. Barnes and J. W. Murray the sum of $125 and a verbal or written promise to pay $125 additional, with the interest, to have their action or decision relative to certain personal property seized under legal process by them as deputy United States marshals, influenced thereby, contrary to the form of the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the United States.

N. S. MCAFEE,

United States District Attorney.

With this indictment pending against these two men they were appointed deputy marshals. Of course any defrauder or embezzler, any man who had defrauded the Government of the United States while in office there could not be held to trial while these men had the picking of the grand juries. Here are the affidavits of these two citizens named in this indictment and three others proving the crime of these men, that after they had seized a man's property in one case and an old woman's property in the other case, they demanded money for consenting to its release, and the money was paid to them and they gave a receipt in one case and in the other failed to give it; and these men were by the marshal of the United States appointed as his deputies. That is the sort of men we have to select juries.

There is another thing in this same connection. The Senate of the United States would scarcely believe unless they should have the report of some committee sent to investigate the matter, the frauds and outrages that have been perpetrated upon the people in that country through another class of officers, the United States commissioners, who are in connivance with the United States district attorney and the marshal, who keep their offices in the same room, and who scheme and enterprise against the people of that State for the purpose of robbing them and robbing the Government of the United States, but more particularly the Government of the United States.

I will first show what a man named Hunter has been doing, and after that I will read some affidavits in regard to his doings, so that the Senate may know in part what goes on in those offices, and whether or not the marshals of the United States are the men who ought to be permitted to take in hand and to execute according to their own will and pleasure this great and serious matter of the filling up of the courts of this country with jurors.

Now, this man Hunter, a district commissioner, employed a patent affidavit maker, a man who would sit by his side and make affidavits against anybody, men that he never saw, men in reference to whose offenses he could not know anything. I hold here now a copy of his docket, commencing at case 319, December 23, 1877, and ending with case 569, on the 6th day of March, 1878, in which for the offenses here described he caused the arrest of one hundred and three people, twenty-eight additional arrested on capias, and eighty warrants issued for others who were not found, making in all one hundred and eighty-three cases that one commissioner of the United States at the city of Montgomery brought against the people of that district. The counties of Lowndes, Randolph, Talladega, Tallapoosa, Dallas, Coosa, Barbour, Clay, Crenshaw, Shelby, Montgomery, Butler, Cleburne were the counties to which his process run, all over the wide extent of the middle district of Alabama.

Mr. President, there is scarcely a county in all that middle district that has not got its local United States commissioners; but this man, seated at Montgomery in the office of the United States marshal, issued his warrants to be sent out all over the country, and accompanying every warrant would be from two to three deputies. They go out and make the arrests, and when a man offered to go before the United States commissioner of the county and enter into bond for their appearance he refused to take the recognizance, refused to have the cause heard, but dragged the party to Montgomery, put him in jail for the purpose of getting jail fees whether he was innocent or not. That was not enough for him, but he got the assistance of the district attorney of the United States in the southern district of Alabama, and he there had himself appointed a commissioner of the United States for the southern district, thus, contrary to the very terms of the statute, holding the office of commissioner in the middle district and in the southern district. He would sit at Montgomery and issue his warrants into the southern district of Alabama, and the expenses are here charged against the Government of the United States.

The marshal of the United States gets about two-thirds of the fees in each one of these cases and the commissioners of the United States get about one-third; and I think when I read the statistics of the accounts here that the Senate will be surprised at the extent to which these men have depredated upon the Treasury of the United States.

Here is Hunter's account for the year ending June 30, 1877. In these criminal proceedings, to say nothing of the perquisites of the civil branches of his office, he was allowed for that year $1,462.40. For the year ending June 30, 1878, he was allowed $2,211.75. From July 1, 1878, to December 10, 1878, the court certified an account for him of $2,058.85, on account of services rendered in the middle district of Alabama, and an additional account of $135 for the southern district of Alabama; making the total, in less than two and a half years, of fees charged against the Government of the United States on account of these criminal proceedings of $5,868, by a single commissioner situated in the city of Montgomery.

Mr. President, I have not referred to the reports of the Attorney-General to see the convictions that took place during that same period of time, but they are quite easy of access, and the number is very small compared with the number of arrests. I would say now, as I remember it, that not one-tenth of the men that were then arrested were convicted. Indeed, the men that were arrested were oftener than otherwise discharged when brought before the commissioner, but their discharge did not lessen the expense. Take that sum of $5,868 and multiply it by three, (and it is subject to at least that degree of multiplication,) and you have got about $20,000 that that one court, held by one commissioner, cost the Government of the United States.

I wish to read an affidavit of Augustus Stephens. The only difficulty about Stephens is that he is a negro:

STATE OF ALABAMA,
Randolph County:

Augustus Stephens, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he is a citizen of the State of Alabama, residing in the county of Randolph, and that in the month of January, 1877, affiant was arrested, on a charge of violating the revenue laws of the United States, by a deputy United States marshal, holding office under George Turner, United States marshal for the middle and southern districts of Alabama; that said deputy marshal denied affiant the right to make a bond before the United States commissioner residing in Randolph County, and carried affiant to the city of Montgomery, about one hundred miles distant from the residence of affiant, and affiant was there tried before a United States commissioner residing in that city and bound over to answer an indictment for illicit distilling and placed in jail in default of a bond, where he remained until about the next term of the United States district and circuit court for the middle district of Alabama, when affiant succeeded in making a bond for his appearance to answer an indictment. Affiant further desposes and says that he attended three terms of said court before he was informed that the grand jury had found no indictment against him, and when informed that there was no indictment against affiant, said George Turner demanded of affiant the sum of $10 as an attorney's fee due to said Turner and threatened to put affiant in jail if he did not pay it, whereupon affiant paid to said Turner the sum of $10 as an attorney's fee, and was permitted to return to his home in Randolph County.

Affiant further deposes and says that when arrested by said United States deputy marshal he, affiant, offered to waive an examination and make a bond before the United States commissioner residing in the county of Randolph, and the said United States deputy marshal refused to allow affiant to do so.

WILLIAM E. CONNELLY,
United States Commissioner, Middle District of Alabama.

Here is the deposition of Richard R. Pace. He deposes and says:

That about the 10th of March, 1878, he was arrested by Thomas Offut, a deputy marshal under George Turner, marshal for the middle and southern districts of Alabama; that said arrest was made under a warrant issued by W. H. Hunter, United States commissioner, who resides in the city of Montgomery, and that the affidavit upon which said warrant was issued was made by Samuel Grace, a colored man. Affiant further deposes and says that he (affiant) resides in the county of Randolph, in the State of Alabama, and resided therein at the time of said arrest; that when arrested, said Offut proposed to take affiant to the city of Montgomery, one hundred miles distant from the residence of affiant, for an examination before Commissioner Hunter, and affiant, rather than be put to the trouble of going to Montgomery, proposed to one Jost, a deputy marshal accompanying said Offut, to waive an examination and make a bond before W. E. Connelly, United States commissioner, residing in said county of Randolph, to answer an indictment, and said Jost refused to allow affiant to do so, and carried affiant to the city of Montgomery before Commissioner Hunter. When affiant went before Commissioner Hunter he was told by Hunter that the person who made the affidavit against affiant upon which the warrant was issued said that he (affiant) was "the wrong man." Said Hunter said to affiant at the same time and place, referring to the witness who made the affidavit, as follows: "This witness against you says that you are not the man, that he does not know you." Said Hunter also at said time and place said that there were two other witnesses against affiant who were absent, and that he (Hunter) would require affiant to make a bond to answer an indictment, and if said absent witnesses did not know something about the commission of the offense charged against affiant, that he (Hunter) would write to affiant and so inform him, and that if he (Hunter) should so inform affiant that he (affiant) need not come to court to answer an indictment. Wherefore affiant made a bond before said Hunter to answer an indictment for selling spirituous liquors without license. Affiant further deposes and says that he never saw the person who made the affidavit upon which said warrant was issued until he (affiant) saw him in Commissioner Hunter's office in the city of Montgomery; and affiant further swears that he was never at the place where he was charged in said affidavit with selling whisky.

R. R. PACE.

Here is an affidavit of John Blake, a man whom I happen to know. I suppose there is not a more orderly and worthy citizen in my State, a common, plain, farming man, but a man of the highest character in his country, and a man who I am quite sure never had anything to do with retailing whisky or selling whisky or giving it away, a man of moral and temperate habits in all respects. Mr. Blake says:

That on or about the 31st day of January, A. D. 1878, he was, near his own residence, arrested by one Oliver, deputy United States marshal for the middle district of Alabama, under and by virtue of a warrant of arrest for retailing spirituous liquors without license, issued by one William H. Hunter, a United States commissioner residing at Montgomery, in said middle district. Affiant further states that after he was arrested, and before he left the county of Randolph under such arrest, he asked the said marshal to allow him to make a bond for his appearance before the next United States circuit court for said district; that notwithstanding there were at the time two United States commissioners duly authorized to take bail residing near him, viz: William J. Ware, who resides about six miles from him, in Clay County, and William E. Connelly, who resides about eleven miles from him, in Randolph County, Alabama, affiant residing near the boundary-line between said counties, said marshal saying at the time said request was made, "If I do not carry you to Montgomery, Hunter will kick me out of office." And affiant further states that he was thus compelled at considerable personal expense to go to Montgomery, Alabama, as a prisoner, and also at his entire expense return home; and he also states that he is a merchant and a farmer, having in his employ and under his supervision twenty-five men; that his time and attention was very much needed in looking after his store and farming business and providing for the men under his employ, most of whom have families. Affiant further states that when he arrived at Montgomery he was informed by said Hunter and said marshal that he was not the man, "we will mark it the wrong man and say no more about it." Affiant further states that he has lived in the neighborhood where he now resides thirty-one years, and that no other man by his name has during that time lived in that neighborhood. Affiant further states he is now fifty-one years old, and that he has never since he has been from under the control of his father bought or sold spirituous or vinous liquors in any quantity. Affiant further states that he is wholly unable to account for his arrest except upon the hypothesis that said Hunter and said marshal resort to making such arrests for the purpose of making fees for themselves out of the Government, and he respectfully requests that their conduct be inquired into.

JOHN BLAKE.

Sworn and subscribed before me this 7th day of February, A. D. 1878.

WILLIAM E. CONNELLY,
United States Commissioner Middle District of Alabama.

That affidavit was made for the purpose of impressing the district court of the United States, but instead of making any impression upon it, it only provided for Mr. Hunter an appointment in the southern district of Alabama where he did not reside; he at that time holding the office of commissioner for the middle district of Alabama, as I have remarked, in direct contravention of the statutes.

Now, we have seen what has been going on there, at least one glimpse of it, drawn from the files of the Senate, evidence that has been before the Senate, evidence that may be disputed; I do not know. The evidence of some of these men I know cannot be broken down for want of character; I am sure of that; but whether disputed or not, it shows a state of affairs with which the marshal of the United States, to say the least of it, is in connivance, and of which he has knowledge, which ought to put the Government of the United States upon its guard in intrusting to him the power of organizing the courts of the country, drawing juries as he has drawn juries, either in person or by his deputies, for the purpose of enabling men to rob this Government at their will and pleasure.

These subjects to which I have referred are not political. If I were to go into the political phase of this question the case would be very much stronger than it is; but inasmuch as this subject is one of acrimonious debate everywhere, I have thought it was my duty to myself as well as to the Senate that I should not undertake to volunteer any personal statements, and that I would only go so far as to show the Senate by evidence in its own files of the existence of wrongs and frauds and corruptions that the law of the country ought to remove.

I have detained the Senate much longer than I expected to have done. I have not had the opportunity to read all the papers I intended to have read, but that makes no difference. I brought this subject to the attention of the Senate with a view of showing the Senate that the existing laws are not sufficient to protect the jury-box against the intrusion of bad men, and that there ought to be legislation here for the purpose of correcting these laws. Whether we have fallen upon the right measures of legislation is a matter of debate; it certainly ought to be so until we arrive at the best result. I am entirely satisfied with the bill as it has been brought in. Like the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from New York, I would never have been satisfied to have put into a bill in reference to the selection of juries or any other question to come before a court the feature of a decision upon a man's political tenets or the party to which he belongs; but in doing this we have felt ourselves constrained to do what we were compelled by the existing state of the law to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS.) The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALLACE. I move to amend section 2 by adding at the end thereof these words:

Except as provided for in section 3732 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. BLAINE. Has the Senator the section of the Revised Statutes before him to let the Senate know just what that means?

Mr. WALLACE. Section 3732 excepts from the general provisions of the statutes in regard to contracts to be made by the Departments, the War and Navy Departments in certain particulars, and as this section as it stands, if adopted, would repeal that exception, the purpose is to allow that exception to stand as it exists in the Revised Statutes.

Mr. BLAINE. When was that discovery made?

Mr. WALLACE. It has been understood for some length of time, I believe.

Mr. BLAINE. How long?

Mr. WALLACE. I was conversant with the fact when we were discussing the bill on Saturday. I presume the Senator was.

Mr. BLAINE. It was not discovered until after the bill had been matured and reported and discussed everywhere, however?

Mr. WALLACE. It was discovered as quick as the bill came to the Senate, I presume.

Mr. BLAINE. I understand the honorable Senator, then, to admit that one very large rock has been struck on, and that the thing would have rifted and been wrecked on that particular point. Is the Senator quite sure now that some other hidden rocks are not around?

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator has propounded questions to me again and again while this bill has been under consideration. I have only to answer to him that his view of there being hidden rocks in the way is not one that is very serious to us. This bill came to us from the House. In order to remove all questions in regard to the subject-matter of the Revised Statutes as they stand, the amendment that I have suggested is deemed wise and I propose it to the Senate. Certainly the Senator from Maine will not object to it.

Mr. BLAINE. It is warranted now with these amendments? The honorable Senator warrants the bill to be water-tight in all its compartments?

Mr. WALLACE. I am neither a guarantor nor an indorser.

Mr. BLAINE. I see the Senator is still afraid to underwrite it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE. In section 3, line 19, I now move to strike out the words "of good standing." Those words occur in the section twice.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROLLINS. I presume there will be no objection to putting on this bill an amendment which was proposed by me to the legislative bill on Friday last. A question of order was then raised on the amendment which I proposed providing for an appropriation of $150,000 to pay judgments of the Court of Claims. I suppose upon this bill the point of order will not be raised. I therefore move to amend the bill by inserting, after line 22 of section 1, the words:

For payment of judgments of the Court of Claims $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. WALLACE. I raise the point of order upon this amendment that under Rule 27 it is not in order, as it does not come from a standing committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. ROLLINS. What is the point of order?

Mr. WALLACE. The point of order is that the amendment is not moved by the direction of a standing committee of the body.

Mr. ROLLINS. It was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WALLACE. It was referred to the committee, but has not come back.

Mr. ROLLINS. It has not come back, it is true; but——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is not in order. Unless there is an appeal from the decision of the Chair, the question is not debatable.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Was the amendment recommended by the head of a Department?

Mr. ROLLINS. I wish the Senator from Pennsylvania would withdraw the point of order and let the question be taken on the merits of the amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania read the rule under which he raises the point of order?

Mr. ROLLINS. Let the rule be read.

Mr. WALLACE. I understand the Chair to have ruled the point. Several Senators have had the opportunity to appeal. If the Senator from New Hampshire desires to have the rule read, I will read it; but I am out of order in doing so.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I think that the amendment is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Having ruled upon the question proposed the Chair cannot now submit it to the Senate without an appeal being taken from his decision. The Chair would be glad to have the unanimous consent of the Senate to submit the question of order to the judgment of the Senate in order that the Senate may decide the question.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Nobody appeals.

Mr. KERNAN. This point has been so ruled on every amendment liable to the objection. I tried to get in an amendment at the last Congress and it was ruled out on this ground. Do not let us lose any time now in debating such matters.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Is the question debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No debate is in order unless the question is submitted to the Senate on an appeal taken.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. If an appeal is taken and the question is debatable, I should like to say a few words.

Mr. ROLLINS. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. ROLLINS. May I state a simple fact in reference to this proposition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is in order.

Mr. ROLLINS. I merely wish to state that there have already been judgments rendered by the Court of Claims during the present session to the amount of $60,000.

Mr. KERNAN. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will state his point of order.

Mr. KERNAN. As I understand, on an appeal the merits of the proposed amendment are not in order. The Senator is proceeding, as I understand him, to argue the merits of his amendment. I suppose he must confine himself to the question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question of order is the only open question now before the Senate.

Mr. ROLLINS. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the twenty-eighth rule.

Mr. WALLACE. I raised the point of order under Rule 27, which contains these words:

No amendment shall be received to any general appropriation bill, the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session; or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate; or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments.

The amendment does not come from a committee. Certainly it is in direct contradiction of Rule 27.

Mr. ROLLINS. I supposed there was some way to present in order such an amendment as this to the Senate for consideration on an appropriation bill. I supposed there was some way by which the result sought could be accomplished, some way in which payment of the judgments of the Court of Claims could be provided for. I did not suppose it would be necessary in order to commence this, which seems to me to be repudiation, by ruling out a motion to amend an appropriation bill, and thus prevent the appropriation of money necessary to meet these judgments. But if that course is necessary I shall have to submit, and so will all other good citizens; but it does not seem to me to be necessary; and I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that it would be better to allow the question to be taken upon the merits of the case and not allow this motion to amend to be ruled out thus upon a point of order.

I dislike to appeal from the decision of the Chair; I dislike to persist in that appeal; but I do hope my friend, the Senator from Pennsylvania, will withdraw his point of order.

No citizen of my State that I know of is interested to the amount of one penny in this appropriation; I understand that some citizens of Texas are interested, and also citizens of other States; they are gentlemen unknown to me; but I think it highly proper and right that an expenditure of money to this extent should be made at this time.

I hope, therefore, that the objections to this amendment will be withdrawn, at any rate that the point of order made by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be withdrawn so as to allow Senators to vote directly upon the merits of the proposition, and to say whether they are in favor of making appropriations to pay these judgments of the Court of Claims. The Secretary of the Treasury, as we all know, has said that it will require $150,000. Judgments to the amount of $60,000 have already been rendered since our session began, and the money, $125,000, which was appropriated at the last session has, as I understand, all been used up; it has all been spent, and there is none to meet the judgments that will hereafter be rendered in this court.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. When were these judgments rendered?

Mr. ROLLINS. I have a list of them, and I will present it. I know it is not in order in discussing the question of order to go into the merits of the case, but perhaps it will be well to have the list go into the RECORD. I present this list, certified by the clerk of the court:

Platte M. Thorne	$558 33
Josiah G. Macy	340 29
Reginald Fendall	345 76
Hans Lawson	5,605 38

Williams S. Schrewsbury	$6,861 26
Timothy E. Ellsworth	11,954 73
Samuel McKeever	3,762 60
Thomas R. Lovetts, administrator	6,435 80
Charles M. and Irvine M. Taylor	2,929 50
William A. Saylor	12,990 45
John Murphy's administrator	2,501 86
Henry S. Dale	3,484 93
W. E. Gibbs	750 00

Judgments have been rendered in the above causes by the Court of Claims during the present term of 1878 in favor of said claimants for the respective amounts set opposite, and in which up to this date no appeals to the Supreme Court have been filed. The Court of Claims is still in session,

[SEAL.] JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk, Court of Claims.

JUNE 14, 1879.

Why is it necessary that the Congress of the United States now——

Mr. KERNAN. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will state his point of order.

Mr. KERNAN. I cannot see how it happens that the Senator can make an argument in favor of the payment of these judgments while this question of order is pending.

Mr. ROLLINS. I admit that it was not strictly in order.

Mr. KERNAN. I am only in favor of the rules being applied to each of us alike.

Mr. ROLLINS. But allow me to say that I do not often occupy the attention of the Senate upon this or any other question. I think that if the talking time was divided up between the various States there would be a large amount due the State of New Hampshire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire offers an amendment at the end of line 22, section 1, making an additional appropriation. The Chair decides that the amendment is not in order, not having been presented under any one of the conditions mentioned in Rule 27. From this decision the Senator from New Hampshire appeals, and the question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. ROLLINS. If the Senator from Pennsylvania insists on the point of order, of course I withdraw the appeal. I do not want to be lacking in courtesy to the Presiding Officer.

Mr. WALLACE. This bill is for judicial expenses. The amendment is not germane to the bill, and I cannot withdraw the point of order.

Mr. ROLLINS. This is to pay the judgments of the Court of Claims.

["Order!"]

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Is an amendment now in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The usual practice, the Chair understands, has been to act on the amendments made in Committee of the Whole, after which the bill is open to amendment in the Senate. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole?

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Beginning at line 25 of section 3 with the word "in," I move to strike out the words "in a district in which such is now the practice." The clause now reads:

> But nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any judge in a district in which such is now the practice from ordering the names of jurors to be drawn from the boxes used by the State authorities in selecting jurors in the highest courts of the State.

I move to strike out the words "in a district in which such is now the practice;" so that the clause will read:

> But nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any judge from ordering the names of jurors to be drawn from the boxes used by the State authorities, &c.

If the amendment is not adopted and the section passes as it is, of course those States in which the Federal courts have abandoned the practice of drawing jurors qualified by the State laws cannot return to that practice. It is now the law, and the section as it stands would change the law in that respect and be very unjust to those States in which such is not the practice. I wish to put all the States on an equal footing. Let the Federal judges in any State and in all the States, if they choose, go back to the practice of drawing juries from the boxes authorized by the State authorities. I therefore move to strike out those words.

Mr. WALLACE. The effect of this amendment is to allow the Federal judges to use in every district the State boxes for selecting jurors. The purpose of the statute is to make a Federal system; it is to make a homogeneous system, and this is an exception that is proposed to be stricken out. As to those cases that now exist, where the practice is to draw from the State boxes, it is allowed to continue. There is not an opinion from the Federal judges anywhere in which they do not set forth the necessity of having their own officials to draw jurors. Our purpose, it seems to me, in administering the Federal law ought to be to get an honest Federal system, and not to leave a system that may tip up when republicans have the control of a State and tip down when the democrats have the control of it. The Federal judges being republicans and the State authorities being democratic there will be still the same difficulty and see-sawing between them. The only safe rule is the rule of making the Federal jurisdiction complete and entire, and this is an exception for the sake of preserving those cases that are now in existence.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I understand that under this bill it is permitted in the States where the State boxes are now drawn from by the Federal officers, that that practice shall remain. I do not know in my section of the country any State where it is the custom to draw the list of Federal jurors from the State boxes.

Mr. KERNAN. It prevails in New York.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. This very bill does not establish a uniform system, because it makes an exception in this very particular itself and allows the Federal judges to order jurors to be drawn from the State jury-boxes where under the laws of the State that is now permitted to be done. In what States is that permitted?

Mr. WALLACE. I confess I cannot answer the Senator. I know of no State, unless it is the State of Connecticut and perhaps some other of the New England States, where such a practice does prevail now. It does not prevail in the State of Pennsylvania. I do not think it prevails in the State of New York; indeed, I know it does not.

Mr. KERNAN. In the State of New York in the northern district the marshal and clerk of the court draw the jurors from the State boxes.

Mr. WALLACE. It is not the case in the city of New York.

Mr. KERNAN. They do so from the box kept in the county where the circuit or district court meets. I know it in my own practice, and I have just inquired of the late district attorney who recently went out of office, and he said it was always done. He was here just now.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. In my State up to December, 1872, the practice had always been to draw the jurors from the boxes of the State. Not manually to draw the jurors from the boxes of the State; but the clerk of the Federal court by direction of the Federal judge sent to the clerks of the different county courts for lists of jurors in the State boxes, and he put those names in the Federal box. This was to comply with the statute which said that the qualifications of the jurors in the State courts should be the qualifications of jurors in the Federal courts. That practice was departed from in Georgia in 1872. That is the very thing we complain of. The judges at any time can annul the order they passed in 1872 and go back to the old practice, which would give entire satisfaction. If this bill passes without the amendment, I suppose they cannot do that; and you actually prohibit them from doing it, because they are not doing it now; and so far from granting a remedy in my State, you absolutely prevent the judges from granting a remedy. Therefore I am in favor of the amendment, and without the amendment I think the bill will not be so very acceptable to any one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CARPENTER. I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia. I would be delighted to join with the lawyers of this body at any proper time in constructing a jury system for the Federal courts. It is a want that has existed for a long time. There is no such thing as a jury trial in any Federal court that I know of. In our country it is a trial by the marshal and the clerk, who can convict any man they please or acquit any man they please by packing a jury. Our whole system of criminal jurisprudence is a disgrace to this nation. I am speaking, of course, of the Federal courts.

The theory adopted now for compensating district attorneys is simply a scandal; it is offering a bribe to them to produce convictions. We pay district attorneys I believe about $250 a year salary, and then we pay them so much for every fellow they can convict and a smaller sum for an acquittal. In other words, they are bribed to convict a man if they possibly can. A district attorney who prosecutes for the Government, who stands between the law and the alleged criminal, ought to be as impartial as the judge on the bench. He should have no more inducement to convict a man than to acquit him; and we ought to fix a salary for these officers graded or scaled according to the amount of business and the importance of the station in different districts of the country, and let the officer have no more in case of conviction than he has in case of acquittal. We ought to have some provision that would give defendants who are convicted in criminal cases a chance to be heard on writ of error. In the celebrated case of the Commonwealth vs. Porter decided by the supreme court of Massachusetts, where Judge Shaw delivered the opinion of the court, I recall his language; I quote it only from memory not having read it for two or three years. He said in every well-constructed system for administering criminal justice there will be after the trial at nisi prius an opportunity for the defendant to be heard on exceptions before the court in banc. No doubt he said truly, and no doubt we have no perfect system for administering criminal justice. A man may be sentenced to be hanged for murder by a district judge in Oregon by a judgment notoriously erroneous; and yet, strange to say, there is no way in our country, no way whatever, to reverse that judgment. A man may come to the Supreme Court of the United States to try the title to his farm if it be of the value of $5,000; but if it be nothing but his life that is at stake, no writ of error shall be allowed, no appellate court shall hear an exception, no writ of error shall be issued under any circumstance. All that is simply disgraceful.

During the six years that I was in the Senate I tried constantly to procure some bill that would establish a uniform system for drawing juries; but the Judiciary Committee as it was constructed at that time took this view of the subject, that the only office of Congress was to keep the law just as it always had been, and nothing whatever could be accomplished. It is impossible here this evening, it is impossible in the hurry and heat of this special session, to do anything decent, compared with the importance of this subject; and the reason why I regret the passage of this bill (as I suppose of course it is to pass) is that it is thought to be a partial remedy; and if it shall prove so it will stand so far in the way of anything like a complete remedy to be accomplished hereafter.

If the lawyers of the Senate would consent to let this matter stand over until the next session, and direct the Judiciary Committee to mature and report some plan on the subject commensurate with its importance and complete in all its details, I should be delighted, because I think that would work a relief that ought to be given by Congress. This will do nothing; and the delay until next December would not do a great harm. We have suffered this inconvenience sixty years and we could certainly stand it six months' more, and then have a deliberate examination of the subject and a complete remedy devised to meet the case. That I would be delighed to see.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, I have no reply to make to the argument of the Senator from Wisconsin. His views are very proper, but this subject seems to me to be one of very wide difference. Is it possible that we propose to put into the Federal jury-box men who are not citizens of the United States, and that we propose to do that now? If this amendment prevails that results; for in many of the States the jurors of the State are men who are qualified electors; and in the State of Wisconsin and the State of Kansas a qualified elector is a man fit to go in the jury-box. Qualified electors there are not always citizens of the United States.

Mr. EATON. Not what? Not citizens of the United States?

Mr. WALLACE. They are unnaturalized.

Mr. EATON. And yet they vote there?

Mr. WALLACE. Yet they vote; and that is true, I believe, of the State of Georgia; that a man who is unnaturalized may vote. There if a man of foreign birth has declared his intentions he may vote. It is the law in Alabama, it is the law in Indiana, and it is the law in many other States of this Union.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. None but citizens go in the jury-box.

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator may be correct. As to that, the State of Georgia is perhaps an exception in that respect; but you see we travel into a very wide field. Are we prepared now to make a provision that men shall go into the jury-box under the State law who are not naturalized citizens of the United States? It seems to me we ought to make a system that is harmonious, which reaches the thing in every section of the country, that only puts into the jury-box men who are citizens of the United States.

Mr. CARPENTER. Take the State of Wisconsin for instance; we have a large population there that have not obtained what we call familiarly their second papers, are not full citizens of the United States. They are citizens of the State of Wisconsin; they vote for members of Congress; they vote for the members of the Legislature that elect Senators. What is the objection to trusting those men in the jury-box? Would not the Senator from Pennsylvania, if he had a friend on trial in Wisconsin, rather have him tried before a jury selected from the jury-box of the State without regard to Federal citizenship, than to take his chances of having his friend tried before a jury packed by a Federal marshal?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I concur with everything the Senator from Wisconsin has said and I would say further that the argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania would be just as good against the law as it now stands. Take section 800, which says the qualifications of jurors in the Federal courts shall be like the qualifications of jurors in the State courts, and take the very exception he has here. He allows the States now where there is that practice to continue that practice. Why do you wish to discriminate? Why not make the rule general and if the Federal court in another State desires to use the State box why not permit it to do so? Where is the impropriety of it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.]

The amendment was agreed to—ayes 25, noes not counted.

Mr. HOUSTON. Before I vote upon the bill I desire to give what I consider the proper construction to one branch of the second section—I shall not occupy any length of time—I mean that part of the bill which declares that no liability shall be incurred until an appropriation is made. The colloquy of Saturday between the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Maine seemed to leave the impression that the bill as presented proposed to defeat the appointment of special deputy marshals by the marshals who have the power under the law to appoint them. My own construction is that the bill as it stands does not interfere at all with the appointment of deputy marshals. It is true it says no liability shall be incurred for the payment of money until an appropriation shall be made therefor.

Then the question arises how can you make an appointment without a liability, because this law if passed says there shall be no liability for the payment of money or compensation. It does not repeal the law that authorized the appointment of special deputies, and not repealing the law it does not interfere with the power to appoint, in my judgment, and so not interfering with the power to appoint it does not run in conflict with the opinions of a certain gentleman officially taking charge of these things constitutionally after we pass upon them. To use the expression in his previous veto messages this does not interfere with the appointment, because it does not touch the law, does not propose to repeal it, but only says that the Government shall not be liable for the fees of those officers if they shall be appointed, till an appropriation is made by Congress for their payment.

Mr. BLAINE. If the honorable Senator will permit me a question, it does not create any obligation on the part of future Congresses to make that appropriation?

Mr. HOUSTON. It is too late to get into a controversy.

Mr. BLAINE. That is not much of a controversy—that one question.

Mr. HOUSTON. You have asked a question. Just hold still, if you please, until I answer. It is too late in the day for me to accept a controversy with any Senator, much less the Senator from Maine, who seems almost to desire to live upon such colloquies. I think it does not create an obligation upon the Congress of the United States to pay it in the future, but it can pay it if it sees fit to do so. It can at any time repeal this law and pay it if it sees fit.

Mr. BLAINE. Then, venturing even to incur fresh censure if not liability from the honorable Senator's criticism, his law comes to this, that there shall be no appropriation made now, there shall be no liability incurred for a future Congress to make it; but we do not assume to say that no future Congress shall make it. The honorable Senator is generous; he is willing to say that we will not prohibit a future Congress from making an appropriation. That is generous!

Mr. HOUSTON. As a matter of course we cannot say sensibly that a future Congress shall not pay it; and if we were to say that a future Congress shall not pay it, it would be just as competent for them to do it as if we said they shall.

Mr. BLAINE. I thought it a remarkable admission to get out of the Senator that this Congress graciously advises that this will not operate as a restraint on future Congresses if they choose to make an appropriation! I say that is a generous admission, and it is something that is worth while for the honorable Senator, after his long and illustrious services in previous Congresses, to come here and advise us that if future Congresses choose to make this appropriation they will not find any prohibition absolutely inhibitory on them growing out of the legislation which is proposed here to-day.

Mr. HOUSTON. Of course I would not have said anything about the power of future Congresses to pay if the Senator had not brought it up himself. I supposed that everybody understood that.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama for a little information concerning this provision in another regard. Suppose the United States should be invaded from Canada after this Senate shall adjourn—the country will be safe as long as it remains in session, of course—but suppose an invasion should take place after our adjournment, what then? This bill reads:

> And no Department or officer of the Government shall, during said fiscal year, make any contract or incur any liability for the future payment of money until an appropriation sufficient to meet such contract or pay such liability shall have first been made by law.

I want to know if the President of the United States could call out the militia of any State to repel that invasion?

Mr. KERNAN. A proviso has been put on covering the Army and Navy by reference to a particular section of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. CARPENTER. I am asking for information. If this has been cured from the way it stands in the text, I should like to know it.

Mr. WALLACE. We have added in committee to the section, "except as provided for in section 3732 of the Revised Statutes," which allows the War and Navy Departments to make contracts for clothing and transportation.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then I understand from the Senator from Pennsylvania this bill has been so amended as to allow the War and Navy Departments to incur expenses in certain cases.

Mr. WALLACE. It allows the Revised Statutes to stand as they are, under which those Departments are authorized to incur expense for clothing and transportation.

Mr. CARPENTER. It will not be illegal, then, even after this Congress adjourns, for the President to repel an actual invasion.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the bill pass?

Mr. CARPENTER. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON,] who is absent. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. BELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired on all political questions with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MORRILL, (when Mr. EDMUNDS's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] is paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] If he were present, my colleague would vote "nay" and the Senator from Ohio would vote "yea."

Mr. FERRY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] Were he here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I wish to state the pair between the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.] The Senator from Kentucky, if here, would vote "yea" and the Senator from Iowa would vote "nay."

Mr. HEREFORD, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] who has been called home. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. DAWES, (when Mr. HOAR'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. HOAR] if he were not paired would vote "nay."

Mr. WITHERS, (when Mr. JOHNSTON'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON] if present would vote "yea." He is paired on political questions with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.]

Mr. WITHERS, (when Mr. KIRKWOOD'S name was called.) I will state that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] is paired with myself. If present, he would probably vote "nay."

Mr. MCPHERSON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. MCMILLAN.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when Mr. PADDOCK'S name was called.) The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY.] The Senator from Nebraska, if present, would vote "nay," and the Senator from Tennessee I have no doubt would vote "yea."

Mr. PLATT, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH.] If he were present, I should vote "nay," and I presume he would vote "yea."

Mr. ROLLINS, (when Mr. SAUNDERS'S name was called.) The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. SAUNDERS] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] If the Senator from Nebraska were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, (when Mr. TELLER'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. TELLER] is paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] My colleague, if he were here and not paired, would vote "nay."

Mr. WALLACE, (when Mr. VOORHEES'S name was called.) The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] is paired with the Senator from California, [Mr. BOOTH.]

Mr. GROOME, (when Mr. WHYTE'S name was called.] My colleague's [Mr. WHYTE] pair has been already announced. I will announce in addition that if he were present he would vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. THURMAN. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. BLAINE. My colleague [Mr. HAMLIN] is paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. GROVER.] If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. FARLEY] is paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] The Senator from California, if here, would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Bayard,	Garland,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Call,	Groome,	Kernan,	Slater,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Vance,
Coke,	Harris,	McDonald,	Vest,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Maxey,	Walker,
Davis of Illinois,	Houston,	Morgan,	Wallace.
Eaton,	Jonas,	Pendleton,

NAYS—15.

Blaine,	Cameron of Wis.,	Dawes,	Morrill,
Bruce,	Carpenter,	Hill of Colorado,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Chandler,	Ingalls,	Windom.
Cameron of Pa.,	Conkling,	Logan,

ABSENT—34.

Allison,	Ferry,	Kirkwood,	Sharon,
Anthony,	Gordon,	McMillan,	Teller,
Bailey,	Grover,	McPherson,	Thurman,
Beck,	Hamlin,	Paddock,	Voorhees,
Bell,	Hereford,	Platt,	Whyte,
Booth,	Hoar,	Plumb,	Williams,
Butler,	Johnston,	Randolph,	Withers.
Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,
Farley,	Kellogg,	Saunders,

So the bill was passed.

CHANGES OF THE SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. WALLACE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the fourth amendment of the Senate to the House Resolution No. 1, entitled "Joint resolution to repeal certain clauses in the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1879," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective House as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to said House amendment amended as follows:

In lieu of the sum named in the paragraph "To pay the widow and heirs of Hon. Rush Clark, deceased, to be distributed in the proportion prescribed by the law of descent of the State of Iowa" insert "$6,000;" and in lieu of the sum named in the paragraph "To pay the widow of Hon. Gustave Schleicher, deceased," &c., insert "$6,000;" and strike out from said paragraph the words "two years' salary."

And the House agree to the same.

WM. W. EATON,
WM. A. WALLACE,
W. B. ALLISON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JNO. D. C. ATKINS,
THOS. R. COBB,
JOS. R. HAWLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WALLACE. This is the joint resolution as it passed the Senate, except that it reduces the amount appropriated to the representatives of the deceased members of Congress named from $10,000 to $6,000 each.

Mr. HOUSTON. I should like to ask the Senator who has charge of this matter if the appropriation referred to is usual, or whether this is the first case of the character?

Mr. WALLACE. It is the first case of the kind, I believe, in which the representatives of a member who had not been sworn have been paid. The House voted to pay the representatives of Mr. Schleicher, who was the member I referred to, $10,000. Mr. Clark had been sworn and performed part of his duty in this Congress. Mr. Schleicher was elected to this Congress, but was not sworn; and I believe this is the first instance of that character.

Mr. HOUSTON. Do I understand the Senator to say that it is only the first case of that class of cases? Am I to understand the Senator to say that if a Member or a Senator dies immediately after being sworn in it has been the custom heretofore to pay his representatives for the residue of his term?

Mr. WALLACE. That is as I understand it. That has been the practice.

Mr. HOUSTON. I should like to have the Senator name a single case of the kind where the deceased member's representatives ever have been paid for the unexpired portion of the term.

Mr. WALLACE. So far as the case of Mr. Clark is concerned there have been quite a number of precedents; I cannot particularize them now; but the members of the committee of conference on the part of the House named several cases of that description. As to the case of Mr. Schleicher, there are no precedents for such a case as his. It is the first instance in which a member who had not been sworn in died before the Congress commenced and his representatives were voted any pay.

Mr. HOUSTON. As I understand, that makes no difference. The law requires that up to the time of the death of the member he shall have pay. That is the law. Therefore it does not make any difference whether he has been sworn in or whether he has not been sworn in. If anything should keep him away from the place where Congress was in session, or if his death should occur between the 4th of March and the first Monday in December, because then there is ordinarily no session at the beginning of a Congress during that time, the case would be different; but I do not think there are any precedents for an allowance of this kind. I leave it, however, to Senators, to their own construction and wishes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

CHINESE RESIDENTS AND VISITORS.

Mr. SLATER. I desire to give notice that to-morrow I will call up the bill (S. No. 622) regulating intercourse with the subjects of the Chinese Empire visiting or residing in the United States, and for other purposes, for the purpose of submitting some remarks upon it.

Mr. CONKLING. After the morning hour?

Mr. SLATER. In the morning hour.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WITHERS. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2175) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONKLING. That is with a view of having it the unfinished business for the morning, I suppose.

Mr. WITHERS. That is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WITHERS. I move now that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at seven o'clock and six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 16, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at sixteen minutes past twelve o'clock. This being Monday, the first business in order is the call of States and Territories, commencing with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to appropriate committees, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider. Under this call joint resolutions and memorials of State and territorial Legislatures are in order. Under this call, also, resolutions calling upon the Executive Departments for information will be in order for reference to appropriate committees.

EXTRA PAY FOR HOUSE FIREMEN.

Mr. MURCH introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 100) allowing extra compensation to the firemen employed for heating and ventilating the House for extra work; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Accounts.

ALBERT S. TWITCHELL.

Mr. FARR introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2286) for the relief of Albert S. Twitchell, postmaster at Gorham, New Hampshire; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

WILLIAM H. LEWIS.

Mr. CRAPO introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2287) for the relief of William H. Lewis; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

NATURALIZATION.

Mr. COX introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2288) to protect certificates of naturalization; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CONGER. Let the bill be read at length.

The bill was read at length, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

MICHAEL HAYES.

Mr. COX also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2289) authorizing the Secretary of War to remove the charge of desertion against Michael Hayes, late private Company I, Twenty-sixth Pennsylvania Infantry Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WILLIAM BOWMAN.

Mr. SAMFORD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2297) to prohibit the hoarding of money in the United States Treasury and to prohibit the increase of the interest-bearing debt of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CONGER. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] asks the reference of this bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. CONGER. I think it should go to the Committee of Ways and Means. I do not see anything about banking or currency in it.

Mr. SAMFORD. I have no objection to the reference of the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The bill was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

ARSENAL AND BARRACKS, BATON ROUGE, LOUISIANA.

Mr. ACKLEN. I present a resolution and memorial of the constitutional convention of the State of Louisiana, relative to the arsenal and barracks property at Baton Rouge, Louisiana.

Mr. CONGER. That does not come within the rule; it is not a resolution of a State Legislature.

The SPEAKER. It is a resolution of the constitutional convention now sitting in the State of Louisiana; but it does not come technically within the terms of the rule.

Mr. ACKLEN. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] object on that ground? If he does, I will present the document through the petition-box.

Mr. CONGER. I think perhaps that would be the better way.

Mr. ACKLEN. Very good.

TENURE OF OFFICE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. FINLEY introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 101) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now recognize gentlemen who were not present when their States were called.

Mr. WISE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2311) to fix the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. ELAM. I present, Mr. Speaker, a series of resolutions adopted by the constitutional convention of Louisiana, memorializing Congress to pass a bill introduced by me at the beginning of this session, and also at the last session of Congress, for the purpose of dividing the State of Louisiana into two judicial districts, and ask they be referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. ACKLEN. I presented those resolutions some time ago, and on objection they were sent to the petition-box. I now raise the question that resolutions of a constitutional convention are entitled to come in under Rule 130, and I refer to that part of the rule which reads: "And on said call, joint resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures, for printing and reference, may be introduced." A constitutional convention is the highest law-making power of a State. It ranks higher than the Legislature of a State. It is formed on the same principles as the Legislature of the State is formed. It is above the legislative and senatorial representatives. And therefore I think that, although the Legislature might not as the lesser power include the constitutional convention, yet the constitutional convention as the greater power would include the Legislature.

The SPEAKER. The constitutional convention of a State is called for a particular object, to amend the constitution of the State, and what the convention agrees upon has generally to be submitted to a vote of the people before it goes into effect, and is a body with high powers. But the terms of the rule will govern the Chair. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

130. All the States and Territories shall be called for bills on leave and resolutions every Monday during each session of Congress; and, if necessary to secure the object on said days, all resolutions which shall give rise to debate shall lie over for discussion, under the rules of the House already established; and the whole of said days shall be appropriated to bills on leave and resolutions, until all the States and Territories are called through. And the Speaker shall first call the States and Territories for bills on leave; and all bills so introduced during the first hour after the Journal is read shall be referred, without debate, to their appropriate committees: Provided, however, That a bill so introduced and referred, and all bills at any time introduced by unanimous consent and referred, shall not be brought back into the House upon a motion to reconsider. And on said call, joint resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures for printing and reference may be introduced.

The SPEAKER. In case the point is made the Chair must be governed by the rule, which speaks only of joint resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures.

Mr. ACKLEN. Is the point of order made?

The SPEAKER. The point of order was made heretofore this morning when the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ACKLEN] himself presented resolutions of the constitutional convention of his State. It has not been made in this instance. The Chair thinks it is respectful to allow these petitions to come in, and that is the reason why he recognizes now the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELAM] to renew the presentation of petitions from a constitutional convention; but if the objection is made, the Chair has no volition except to decide in accordance with the terms of the rule.

Mr. CONGER. We have got the ruling of the Chair in this matter, which is all I desired. I withdraw the point of order, having no objection to these particular resolutions being introduced. I only desired that we might know what is authorized by the rule.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ACKLEN] had better present the resolutions of the constitutional convention of his State which he desired to introduce some time ago, the gentleman from Michigan having now withdrawn the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw the point of order in this particular case. There may be others in which I may insist upon it.

Mr. ACKLEN presented resolutions of the constitutional convention of Louisiana relative to the judicial districts of that State; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ARSENAL, ETC., AT BATON ROUGE.

Mr. ACKLEN also presented resolutions of the constitutional convention of Louisiana, relative to the arsenal and barracks property at Baton Rouge; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LOUISIANA JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

INTERNAL-REVENUE STAMPS.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2317) to amend section 3425 of the Revised Statutes at Large, authorizing the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to deliver stamps without prepayment thereof; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN FLETCHER.

Mr. COBB introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2318) for the relief of John Fletcher; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

POST-OFFICE AT VINCENNES, INDIANA.

Mr. COBB also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2319) authorizing the purchase of a parcel of ground with the buildings thereon, for a post-office in the city of Vincennes, Knox County, Indiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR NORTHERN LOUISIANA.

Mr. GIBSON presented a memorial of the people of Louisiana, by the constitutional convention of that State, in favor of the re-establishment of a United States district court for Northern Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

UNITED STATES MILITARY BARRACKS AT BATON ROUGE, LOUISIANA.

Mr. GIBSON also presented memorial and petition of the constitutional convention of Louisiana, praying that the military barracks be turned over to the use and occupation of the Louisiana State University; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

LIEUTENANT W. H. COLLINGS.

Mr. OSMER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2320) for the relief of Lieutenant W. H. Collings, late of the Fourteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, now of the county of Venango, State of Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MRS. DELLA BENNER.

DANIEL EDWARDS.

Mr. KING introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2322) for the relief of Daniel Edwards, a resident of the city of New Orleans, Louisiana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

WILLIAM F. WALSH.

Mr. KING also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2323) for the relief of William F. Walsh, a citizen of New Orleans, Louisiana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

MRS. ANN SHEELY.

Mr. KING also introduced a bill (H. R No. 2324) for the relief of Mrs. Ann Sheely, of Concordia Parish, in the State of Louisiana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

RAILROAD GRANT TO DAKOTA.

Mr. BENNETT introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2325) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and a branch road in the Territory of Dakota; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 1478) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to negotiate for the purchase at private sale, or, if necessary, procure by condemnation, a site for a post-office in the city of Baltimore, State of Maryland.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. MULLER indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. CARPENTER, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Railways and Canals was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2016) to ratify and confirm an appropriation made by the county of Humboldt, in the State of Iowa, of the swamp and overflowed lands situated within the boundaries of the said county to aid in the construction of a railroad in said county, and the same was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

OSAGE TRUST AND DIMINISHED RESERVE LANDS.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I move to suspend the rules and pass a bill for the relief of settlers upon the Osage trust and diminished reserve lands in Kansas, and for other purposes. It is a modification of a motion I made on Monday last, and I will state that the bill as now presented is unanimously approved by the Committee on Public Lands.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill for the relief of settlers upon the Osage trust and diminished reserve lands in Kansas, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That all actual settlers under existing laws upon the Osage Indian trust and diminished reserve lands in Kansas (any failure to comply with such existing laws notwithstanding) shall be allowed sixty days after a day to be fixed by public notice by advertisement in two newspapers in each of the proper land districts, which day shall not be less than ninety days after the passage of this act, within which to make proof of their claims, and to pay one-fourth the purchase-price thereof, and the said parties shall pay the balance of said purchase-price in three equal annual installments thereafter: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent an earlier payment of the whole or any installment of said purchase-money as aforesaid. And if default be made by any settler in the payment of any portion or installment at the time it becomes due under the foregoing provisions, his entire claim, and any money he may have paid thereon, shall be forfeited, and the land shall, after proper notice, be offered for sale according to the terms hereinafter prescribed, unless before the day fixed for such offering, the whole amount of purchase-money shall be paid by such claimant, so as to entitle him to receive his patent for the tract embracing his claim.

SEC. 2. That all the said Indian lands remaining unsold and unappropriated, and not embraced in the claims provided for in section 1 of this act, shall be subject to disposal to actual settlers only, having the qualifications of pre-emptors on the public lands. Such settlers shall make due application to the register with proof of settlement and qualifications as aforesaid; and, upon payment of not less than one-fourth the purchase price, shall be permitted to enter not exceeding one quarter section each, the balance to be paid in three equal annual installments, with like penalties, liabilities, and restrictions as to default and forfeiture as provided in section 1 of this act.

SEC. 3. All lands upon which such default has continued for ninety days shall be placed upon a list, and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the same to be duly proclaimed for sale in the manner prescribed for the offering of the public lands, but not exceeding one quarter section shall be sold to any one purchaser at a price not less than the price fixed by law; but all lands upon which such default shall be made shall be offered for sale by advertisement of not less than thirty days in two newspapers in the proper land districts respectively, and, unless the purchase price be fully paid before the day named in the notice, shall be sold for cash to the highest bidder at not less than the price fixed by law; and all such lands subject to unpaid overdue installments shall be so offered once every year. And if any of said lands shall remain unsold after the offering as aforesaid, they shall be subject to private entry, for cash, in tracts not exceeding one quarter section by one purchaser.

SEC. 4. After the payment of the first installment, as hereinafter provided for, such lands shall be subject to taxation according to the laws of the State of Kansas, as other lands are or may be in said State: Provided, That no sale of any such lands for taxes shall operate to deprive the United States of said lands, or any part of the purchase price thereof; but if default be made in any installment of the purchase price as aforesaid, such tax-sale purchaser, or his or her legal representatives, may, upon the day fixed for the public sale, and after such default has become final, under the foregoing provisions, pay so much of said purchase price as may remain unpaid, and shall thereupon be entitled to receive a patent for the same as though he had made due settlement thereon: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to deprive or impair the right of the settler of the right of redemption under the revenue laws of the State of Kansas.

SEC. 5. That the register and the receiver shall be allowed the same fees and commissions as are allowed by law for the disposal of the public lands; and the net proceeds of the sales and disposals, after deducting the expenses of such disposals, shall be deposited to the credit of the proper Indian fund as provided by existing laws; and the Secretary of the Interior shall make all rules and regulations necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

SEC. 6. That nothing in this act shall be construed to interfere in any manner with the operation of the town-site laws as applicable to these lands: Provided, That all claims for entry under said statutes shall be proved up and fully paid for before the day fixed for the commencement of the public sales provided for in section 3 of this act.

The question was taken upon the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill; and upon a division there were—ayes 55, noes 14.

Mr. REAGAN. That is a long bill and a very important one, and I must raise the point of order that no quorum has voted.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. This bill has been unanimously approved by two Committees on Public Lands of this House.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order upon a motion to suspend the rules. No quorum having voted, the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. RYAN, and the gentleman from Texas, Mr. REAGAN, to act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 113, noes 2.

Mr. REAGAN, (one of the tellers.) I will not insist upon the point of order that no quorum has voted.

No further count being called for, the rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the bill (H. R. No. 2326) was passed.

HOMESTEAD SETTLERS.

Mr. WASHBURN. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to move to suspend the rules so as to discharge that committee from the further consideration of House bill No. 2165, to amend section 2297 of title 32 of the Revised Statutes, relating to homestead settlers, and to pass the bill at this time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section No. 2297 of title No. 32 be amended by adding thereto the following proviso, namely: Provided, That the settler shall be allowed twelve months from the date of filing in which to commence his residence on said land.

The question was taken, and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to move to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the sub-committee of the Committee on Commerce, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives adopted on the 4th instant on the subject of the commercial relations of the country, &c., have leave to sit at such times and places as shall seem to them expedient during the recess of Congress, to administer oaths and take testimony, and to employ a clerk and stenographer at a fair compensation; and for the purposes aforesaid the sum of $2,500 be, and is hereby, appropriated to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives for the use of said committee on the requisition of the chairman, whose receipts shall be a good and sufficient voucher therefor.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let the resolution be read to which reference is made.

The SPEAKER. It is not at the Clerk's desk.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 54, noes 53.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE AT ELECTIONS.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Committee of Elections, to which was referred House bill No. 2131, to regulate the stations of soldiers during elections, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report back as a substitute therefor the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk; and I move that the rules be suspended and the substitute bill passed.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to prohibit military interference at elections.

Whereas the presence of troops at the polls is contrary to the spirit of our institutions and the traditions of our people and tends to destroy the freedom of elections: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall not be lawful to bring to or employ at any place where a general or special election is being held in a State any part of the Army or Navy of the United States as a police force to keep the peace at the polls.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask how this matter comes from the Committee of Elections?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has been instructed by the committee to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point that this matter has never been referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman is mistaken. A bill on this subject was referred to our committee, and this is a substitute which the committee instructed me to seek to have passed under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. CONGER. We all desire to vote upon the question; but I want it to come regularly before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have an opportunity to vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that the bill be again read.

The Clerk again read the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 111, nays 82, not voting 93; as follows:

Mr. WASHBURN. My colleague, Mr. DUNNELL, is paired with Mr. PHELPS.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I am paired with Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. If he were present, I should vote "no," and I presume that he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. WHITE. I am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. THOMAS TURNER. I do not know how he would vote if present, but if he were here, I should take great pleasure in voting "no."

Mr. HUNTON. My colleague, Mr. CABELL, who is absent by leave of the House, is paired with Mr. BOYD, of Illinois.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. CARLISLE is paired with Mr. MILLER. If present, Mr. CARLISLE would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. COFFROTH. My colleague, Mr. BELTZHOOVER, is absent by leave of the House, and is paired.

Mr. REED. My colleague, Mr. KNOTT, is paired with Mr. CALKINS, of Indiana.

Mr. BUCKNER. I am paired with Mr. CHITTENDEN, of New York. If he were present, I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. WARNER. My colleague, Mr. DICKEY, is paired with Mr. BARLOW, of Vermont.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. My colleague, Mr. KETCHAM, who is absent on account of sickness, is paired with Mr. SMITH, of New Jersey.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. UPSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1734) to authorize the Secretary of War to use certain moneys appropriated by act of Congress approved March 4, 1879, "for the protection of the high sand-banks on the Chippewa River," in the completion and protection of improvements in and near the mouth of said Chippewa River.

An act (H. R. No. 2263) supplemental to "an act to establish post-routes."

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN LOUISIANA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the secretary of the constitutional convention of the State of Louisiana, inclosing a memorial adopted by that body praying the establishment of a United States district court for the northern portion of that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MILITARY BARRACKS, ETC., AT BATON ROUGE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the secretary of the constitutional convention of the State of Louisiana, inclosing a memorial of that body praying that the military barracks, arsenal, and grounds in the city of Baton Rouge be donated to the State of Louisiana for the use and occupation of the Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BARRACKS IN SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to the bill (H. R. No. 2021) vesting the title to the United States barracks in Savannah, Georgia, in the corporation of the said city.

The SPEAKER. This communication will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CONGER. Should it not go the Committee on Military Affairs?

The SPEAKER. The letter commences in these terms:

The Secretary of War has the honor to state for the information of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, in reply to a communication from the chairman of said committee.

The communication would seem properly to belong to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CONGER. It does not seem to me to be quite right that other committees than the Committee on Military Affairs should undertake to dispose of military posts and barracks of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The bill to which the communication has reference is now with the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The communication was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HUNTON. The hour of two o'clock having arrived I claim the floor for the Committee for the District of Columbia. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NEAL.]

The SPEAKER. Is there not a bill coming over as unfinished from the last day on which the Committee for the District of Columbia reported?

Mr. HUNTON. That was passed by with the understanding that it was not to be taken up again this session.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 5) relative to certain accepted drafts and other papers in the Department of State.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION OF WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. NEAL, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2327) to authorize the renewal of a loan therein named by the joint stock company of the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington; which was read a first and second time.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read. It proposes to amend the act approved July 3, 1876, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled an act to incorporate the joint stock company of the Young Men's Chistian Association of Washington, District of Columbia, approved March 2, 1867," so as to authorize the renewal of the loan therein named or to make a new loan at a lower rate of interest, the proceeds to be used exclusively in payment of the existing loan, and to enable the said stock company to make and secure such loan. All the provisions of the above-recited act are extended and made applicable therefor.

Mr. NEAL. I ask the Clerk to read for the information of the House the law which it is proposed to amend.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the joint stock company of the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington," approved March 2, 1867.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act entitled "An act to incorporate the joint stock company of the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington," approved March 2, 1867, be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows, namely:

SECTION 1. That the joint stock company of the Young Men's Christian Association be, and it is hereby, authorized and empowered to borrow, on the security of the real estate now owned by it in square numbered 407 in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, not exceeding the sum of $33,000, at a lawful rate of interest, for the purpose of paying off the debt now due from said joint stock company to the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company.

SEC. 2. That in order to secure the amount authorized to be borrowed by the preceding section, the said joint stock company is hereby authorized to execute and deliver its note for the amount borrowed, under authority of this act, bearing such lawful rate of interest, and payable at such time, principal and interest, as may be agreed upon between it and the persons from whom it may borrow such money; and to secure the payment of such note and interest to convey said property to two trustees in fee simple, with power in said trustees, or the survivor of them, to sell said property at public auction in case of default made in the payment of said note, or any installment of interest due thereon, upon such terms and after such notice by advertisement as the said trustees, or the survivor of them, may deem best for the interest of all parties concerned, and to convey the same to the purchaser in fee simple.

SEC. 3. That the rents and revenues derived from said property shall be retained by the board of directors of said joint stock company and applied to the payment of the indebtedness hereby authorized, and shall not be applied to the payment of interest on the capital stock of said corporation until said indebtedness is fully paid.

SEC. 4. That nothing herein contained shall be construed as authorizing said joint stock company to encumber said real estate for any other purpose or in any other manner.

Approved, July 3, 1876.

Mr. NEAL. For the information of the House I will state that the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington, incorporated by an act of Congress, erected what is known as Lincoln Hall in this city. In 1876 they had a floating indebtedness of $33,000. The act which has just been read was passed to enable them to fund their indebtedness and authorize them to negotiate a loan and to secure the same by a deed of trust on their property. They made that loan and there is now past due the sum of $6,000, which the rents have not been sufficient to enable them to pay off. The property is liable to be sold at any moment, and they ask the authority of Congress to renew that loan or make another to take up the indebtedness, that the property may not be sacrificed. I can see no possible objection to it; the committee did not; and I hope the House will pass the bill without a dissenting voice.

Mr. STEELE. Does this bill make any appropriation on the part of the United States?

Mr. NEAL. None whatever. The bill simply authorizes the trustees of this institution to renew the loan which they were allowed to make by the former act.

Mr. SPARKS. As I understand, the object of this act is to authorize this company to refund their old indebtedness in a new loan?

Mr. NEAL. That is all.

Mr. SPARKS. Not to exceed the old indebtedness?

Mr. NEAL. They are simply to take up the old loan, and the new loan will probably not be so large, because the rents have paid off part of the indebtedness. They will refund also at a lower rate of interest. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NEAL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHURCHES OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with the recommendation that it be passed, the bill (H. R. No. 1369) to relieve the churches of the District of Columbia and to clear the title of the trustees to such property.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of an act of Congress entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874, as was construed to authorize the commissioners of the District to set aside former exemptions from taxation of church property which was actually held and used for the purpose of divine worship, and to enforce a tax upon such property, be, and is hereby, repealed; and the title to such property is hereby declared to vest in the trustees, or such other persons as held the title to the same at the time of the passage of the act of 1874, or their successors in interest, notwithstanding the sale of such property for non-payment of taxes.

SEC. 2. That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they hereby are, authorized and required to refund to the trustees or other proper officers of such church or churches as have paid the taxes assessed against them under the act of June 20, 1874, such sums respectively as were paid by each upon property actually held and used for the purpose of divine worship.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. The act of June 20, 1874, referred to in the first section of this bill, provided in its fourth section as follows:

That, for the support of the government of the District of Columbia and maintaining the credit thereof for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, there shall be levied upon the real estate in said District, except that belonging to the United States and to the District of Columbia, the following taxes, namely.

The District commissioners considered that section to impose upon them the duty to tax the churches of the District, understanding that they were not included in the term charitable and educational institutions. The churches, both before the passage of this act and since its passage, have been exempted by a general law from taxation. The churches of the District, with the exception of three or four, considered the construction by the commissioners as erroneous, and the imposition of the tax as illegal, and they therefore declined to pay it, and, with the exception of two or three, all the churches were sold for taxes and bought by the District of Columbia. Some three or four churches paid the taxes, and the act of March 3, 1877, now in force, provides:

SEC. 8. That the property exempt from taxation under this act shall be the following, and no other, namely: First, the Corcoran Art Building, free public library buildings, churches, the Soldiers' Home, and grounds actually occupied by such buildings; secondly, houses for the reformation of offenders, almshouses, buildings belonging to institutions of purely public charity, conducted without charge to inmates, profit, or income; cemeteries dedicated and used solely for burial purposes and without private income or profit; but if any portion of any such building, house, grounds, or cemetery so in terms excepted is larger than is absolutely required and actually used for its legitimate purpose and none other, or is used to secure a rent or income, or for any business purpose, such portion of the same, or a sum equal in value to such portion, shall be taxed against the owner of said building or grounds.

This imposition of taxes is entirely exceptional in the history of the District, and I have no idea that Congress intended at the time the act was passed to include the churches in the terms of the tax bill. An act for the relief of the churches has already passed both Houses of Congress at different times, but has failed to become a law for want of action on the part of the other branch of Congress.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand this bill to relate to the taxes for a single year only.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. For a single year only.

Mr. BLOUNT. On all other occasions they have been exempted.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. That is it exactly.

Mr. SPARKS. The bill covers the church property; that is, the lots and the buildings used for church purposes.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. It refers to property held and actually used for the purposes of divine worship.

Mr. SPARKS. I believe there is no civilized country which taxes churches.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SLEMONS, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 298) to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims is hereby extended to, and it shall have exclusive original legal and equitable jurisdiction of, all claims now existing against the District of Columbia, including auditor, board of audit, sewer certificates, measurements, and other evidence of indebtedness covered by contracts made since February 21, 1871, and all outstanding written obligations of the levy court of said District. Said court shall have the same power, proceed in the same manner, and be governed by the same rules, in respect to the mode of hearing, adjudication, and determination of said claims, as it now has in relation to the adjudication of claims against the United States. When the trial of any claim against the District of Columbia, prosecuted under the provisions of this act, involves the taking and stating of a long account, or the making of measurements or computations involving the services of engineers, said court shall have power to award a reference to a competent referee to take and state such account, or to the engineer commissioner of the District to make and report such measurements and computations; and said referee or engineer shall report to the court the evidence taken by him for the information of said court, and shall be allowed such compensation for his services as the court may determine, to be paid on the order of the court, in money, as judgments are herein required to be paid.

SEC. 2. All such claims against the District of Columbia shall, in the first instance, be prosecuted before the Court of Claims, in the same manner and subject to the same rules as claims against the United States are prosecuted therein, or to such other rules as the court shall prescribe. In any case in which the amount in controversy exceeds $20,000, if before trial either party requests in writing a finding of facts by the court, there shall be the same right of appeal, either by the District of Columbia or by the claimant, and subject to the same rules and regulations, as are prescribed by law for appeals on behalf of the United States or claimants against the United States from the judgments of the Court of Claims: Provided, That the prosecution of all such claims shall be commenced in the Court of Claims by the filing of the petition of the claimant, as required by the rules and practice of said court, within six months from the passage of this act; and all such claims against the District of Columbia now existing, and not so filed within said time, shall be forever barred, except in cases of claims owned and held by persons under legal disabilities, in which case such claims shall be in like manner barred unless commenced as aforesaid within six months after the expiration of such disability: Provided That all certificates, measurements, or other evidence of indebtedness, in the custody of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, shall be deposited with the Court of Claims, upon the application of any claimant. When the validity of a number of claims depends substantially upon a like state of facts, they may be brought before the court in one petition in which all parties are joined, and may be tried together under such rules as the court may prescribe, and such judgments may be entered therein as the court may determine; and cases of like kind may be consolidated and tried together whenever the court so orders.

SEC. 3. The Attorney-General of the United States shall have authority, and it shall be his duty, to defend the District of Columbia against all claims against said District of Columbia prosecuted in said Court of Claims, and on appeal, in like manner as he is now by law required to defend the United States in said court, with the same power to interpose counter claims and offsets against claims, and with like power of appeal as in cases against the United States tried in said court.

SEC. 4. All laws now in force relating to prosecutions of claims against the United States in the Court of Claims shall apply, as far as applicable, to the prosecution, practice, hearing, and determination of claims against the District of Columbia authorized to be prosecuted under the provisions of this act: Provided, That motions for new trials shall be made by either party within twenty days after the rendition of any judgment: And provided further, That in the trial of such cases no person shall be excluded as a witness because he or she is a party to or interested in the issue tried: And provided, That in all cases when such Court of Claims shall give judgment in favor of any claimant, said court shall find and determine whether the terms of the contract under which such claim shall have originated required the payment therefor in lawful money or in 3.65 bonds; and the judgment shall direct the payment in accordance with the facts so found.

SEC. 5. If no appeal be taken from the judgment and determination of the Court of Claims in cases provided for in this act within the term limited by law for appealing from the judgments of said court, and in all cases of final judgments by the Court of Claims, or on appeal by the Supreme Court where the same are affirmed in favor of the claimant, the sum due thereby shall be paid, as hereinafter provided, by the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, if the same be payable in money, and if paid in 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia, the same shall be issued: Provided, That no payment shall be made in money or in bonds except upon the presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury of a copy of said judgment certified by the clerk of the Court of Claims, and signed by the chief-justice, or, in his absence, by the presiding judge of said court: And provided further, That all moneys paid by the Treasurer of the United States on any judgment or judgments rendered by the Court of Claims under the provisions of this act shall be charged by the Treasurer of the United States against the District of Columbia; and said Treasurer of the United States shall reimburse the United States Treasury for such payments out of any money in the Treasury belonging to the District of Columbia not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 6. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to demand of the sinking-fund commissioner of the District of Columbia so many of the 3.65 bonds as may be necessary for the payment of the judgments adjudged to be payable in said bonds; and said sinking-fund commissioner is hereby directed to issue and deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of 3.65 bonds required to satisfy the awards payable in such bonds and no more, which bonds shall be received by said claimants at par in payment of such claims, and shall bear date February 1, 1879, and mature at the same time as other bonds of this issue; and the gross amount of such bonds heretofore and hereafter issued shall not exceed in the aggregate $15,000,000; and all claims based upon contracts, in writing, by the terms of which such bonds, that is to say "3.65 bonds," were to be received in lieu of lawful money, for which the board of audit issued certificates, or for which such certificates should have been issued, under the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, shall bear interest not exceeding the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum from the time such certificate or claim became due and payable. Said court shall allow interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum upon all claims not payable in such 3.65 bonds from the maturity thereof.

SEC. 7. In all cases prosecuted under the provisions of this act it shall be the duty of the claimant, after the commencement of said actions, to prosecute them in said court diligently; and after any issue of law or of fact shall be joined in any case, the Attorney-General shall have power to place the same on the trial calendar of said court for trial; and in all cases when any case has been reached in its order on the calendar, and the trial thereof has been unreasonably delayed by the claimant, the said court may, on motion of the Attorney-General, on notice to the claimant, or his counsel, attorney, or solicitor, dismiss said claim; and such dismissal or final judgment on any claim shall be a conclusive bar against any further prosecution of such claim before any court or tribunal whatsoever: Provided, That in the event that the 3.65 bonds provided to be issued herein as aforesaid should reach said sum of $15,000,000 before all the judgments rendered by said Court of Claims, payable in such 3.65 bonds, have been paid or satisfied, then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to pay in money to the owner of any such judgment an amount equal to the market value of such bonds at the date of such judgment: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the judgments hereinbefore provided from time to time as they may be presented as in this act also provided.

Mr. SAMFORD. I make the point of order upon that bill that it contains an appropriation and makes a tax and a charge upon the people, and must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, in the chair.) Wherein does the bill make an appropriation?

Mr. SAMFORD. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay about a million dollars.

Mr. BLOUNT. Further than that, it provides for taking out of the Treasury the money to pay all judgments that may be rendered. They do not come back to Congress, but under this legislation the Secretary of the Treasury would be authorized to pay them from time to time, and that clearly comes under the Rule 112.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to say in regard to this point of order that it seems to me the bill is not subject to it, because there is no appropriation contained in it of any money or property belonging to the United States Government. The judgments, if obtained, are to be paid in the bonds of the District of Columbia, and there is nothing said in any part of the bill in regard to the appropriation of money or property of the United States to pay these debts.

Mr. BLOUNT. The same thing might be said in regard to the Indian trust fund, that it does not belong to the Federal Government, and yet it has always been held that where there was a bill touching that fund it was subject to this rule.

Mr. HUNTON. Where money has been set aside, as in the case of the Indian trust fund, it is not the property of the Government.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not say it is the property of the Government, but I say that it has uniformly been held in this House, that it is in the Treasury of the United States, and it cannot be taken out without an appropriation.

Mr. HUNTON. But this money is not in the Treasury and never was.

Mr. BLOUNT. My understanding of the bill is that it provides for the payment hereafter of these judgments.

Mr. HUNTON. I can explain that to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.] The bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay these judgments in bonds of the District of Columbia, because the Secretary of the Treasury is the treasurer of the District of Columbia, and therefore these judgments must be paid by the bonds of the District passing through the hands of the treasurer of the District of Columbia, who is the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Allow me to correct the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON.] The Treasurer of the United States, and not the Secretary of the Treasury, is the treasurer of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLOUNT. That does not alter the question at all as to the appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read Rule 112.

The Clerk read as follows:

All proceedings touching appropriations of money, and all bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall be first discussed in a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. SAMFORD. I would call the attention of the Chair to Rule 110, which is as follows:

No motion or proposition for a tax or charge upon the people shall be discussed the day on which it is made or offered, and every such proposition shall receive its first discussion in a Committee of the Whole House.

Now, although I am not familiar with the proper construction of the rules of this House, it seems to me that under either of the rules referred to, Rule 110 and Rule 112, this bill would be obnoxious to a point of order. It certainly makes a charge upon the people. In addition to making the Government liable to costs in the event of a failure to resist successfully these claims, it makes the Government in any event liable to the payment of the interest on these bonds, if it does not indeed make the Government liable for the whole principal of the bonds.

One construction placed on the act of June 20, 1874, makes the Government responsible for the principal of all these 3.65 per cent. bonds. The commissioners of the District of Columbia in their report to Congress have put that construction upon the act. As I am not in favor of that construction, I perhaps would not agree that it was a proper one. But I do consider that it is exceedingly questionable whether those interested in the matter may not put that construction upon it. If gentlemen will read the debates in 1876, when any further issuance of these bonds was prohibited, they will find that it was conceded by some that the Goverment was liable in the first instance for these bonds, and it was conceded by all that the Government was liable as a guarantor of the bonds. It seems to me clearly that this bill is liable to a point of order.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I desire through the Chair to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] with a view to understanding this point of order. As a premise thereto I will state what I deem to be the purpose of the bill upon a hasty reading of it. Under existing law, the act of 1874, $15,000,000 of 3.65 bonds are in the hands of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, the interest upon which is guaranteed by the United States. The act of 1874 having been passed to enable the District commissioners to discharge certain duties to claimants against the District, and the bonds being in their hands for that purpose, difficulties have grown out of it, in reference to which appeals have been made to the courts of the District, to the commissioners of the District, and to Congress.

Mr. SAMFORD. Allow me one moment. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] makes a mistake. There are not fifteen millions of the bonds of the District in the hands of anybody. The law of 1874 never authorized the issuance of fifteen millions of those bonds, or of any amount, but left that blank. But under that law the commissioners have issued something like $13,000,000 of 3.65 bonds. It is only in this bill, now introduced, that the amount of fifteen millions is first mentioned.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I was coming to that. Looking at this bill I find that section 6 provides that "the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to demand of the sinking-fund commissioners of the District of Columbia so many of the 3.65 bonds authorized by act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, and acts amendatory thereof, as may be necessary for the payments of the judgments," &c. Now, it appears to me that upon the face of the bill (and this is what I am driving at) there is in the hands of the sinking-fund commissioners certain bonds of the District. This bill seeks to set apart of those bonds as much as may be necessary to pay claimants, but not out of any other fund or from any other source. If that be so, then I think the point of order does not lie against this bill, because it does not involve the Treasury of the Government in the payment of any amount.

Mr. HUNTON. Not at all; only the District of Columbia.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Now, I would desire the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] to state, if there is an appropriation or a draught on the public Treasury, wherein it is to be found in this bill.

Mr. HUNTON. It is not in the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS. I ask the Clerk to read Rule 112.

The Clerk read as follows:

All proceedings touching appropriations of money and all bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall be first discussed in a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. STEPHENS. The point of order first rests upon that rule; and I think the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] who has just taken his seat, has shown conclusively that this bill does not in any way involve the appropriation of money from the Treasury of the United States. He has said very well, better than I could have said it, what I intended to say. I now ask the Clerk to read Rule 110.

The Clerk read as follows:

No motion or proposition for a tax or charge upon the people shall be discussed the day on which it is made or offered, and every such proposition shall receive its first discussion in a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. STEPHENS. That is the rule upon which the gentleman from Alabama founds his point of order. Now, most clearly, Mr. Speaker, the point cannot lie under Rule 112; and it seems to me just as clear that it cannot be sustained under Rule 110. This is no proposition for a tax——

Mr. SAMFORD. My friend will allow me to say that perhaps the point would lie under Rule 112, in this way: the United States Government is responsible for the payment of at least one-half of the interest on these bonds. The act of 1878 providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia declares that the United States Government shall pay one-half of the expenses of the District of Columbia, including the interest upon these 3.65 bonds.

Mr. STEPHENS. I see the point; and my answer is that when we come to pay any money under the provisions of the act to which the gentleman refers, the bill proposing to make such payment will have to go to the Committee of the Whole. But this bill does not increase the liability of the United States Government at all. It has nothing to do with an appropriation.

Mr. SAMFORD. If the proposition would be obnoxious to Rule 112 when we come to pay the money, is it not liable to Rule 110 when we are making the charge?

Mr. STEPHENS. We are not now making any charge. This has nothing to do with taxation. It does not unsettle any of the principles heretofore established by law. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the point of order is clearly not well taken, and that there can be no objection to the House acting on this bill.

Mr. HUNTON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is debate in order upon the point of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Strictly speaking, it might not be; but the Chair prefers to hear some discussion upon the point of order before deciding.

Mr. HUNTON. I think that within reasonable limits debate on the point of order ought to be allowed; but I hope that my friends here will bear in mind that the Committee for the District of Columbia has only one day in the course of a month for its business, and if the day be consumed in a discussion of this kind, it is practically lost.

Mr. BUCKNER. I will accept the admonition of my friend from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON,] and occupy very little time on the point of order. I agree with him fully. It seems to me clear beyond doubt that this bill is not liable to the point of order upon either of the grounds urged. It does not appropriate one dollar to anybody; it does not commit the Government of the United States to any liability. When we talk about an appropriation we mean an appropriation from the Treasury of the United States. The Speaker the other day went a bow-shot beyond any decision previously made, in holding that a bill proposing merely to take money out of the contingent fund of the House must be first considered in the Committee of the Whole. That decision, I undertake to say, has never been sustained by this House, and I think it clearly erroneous.

Here is a proposition to do what? It is a proposition that the District of Columbia shall issue bonds of a certain character; and because under some law as to the other 3.65 bonds already issued, it has been held that the Government of the United States is bound, or because we have agreed that the General Government shall pay a certain proportion of the interest or the principal of those bonds, it is held that these bonds are to be a charge against the Treasury. Why, sir, it has always been held that in order to come within the rule a bill must be in form an appropriation out of the Treasury, and not merely contemplate that money may be subsequently appropriated to carry it into effect. That has been the distinction. Now this bill does not propose to take a dollar out of the Treasury of the United States, either directly or indirectly. Hence I say it is clearly not within the operation of the rule.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that Rule 110 applies not merely to an appropriation bill, but to any "motion or proposition for a tax or charge upon the people." I confess that I do not understand the effect of this bill, for I have not had time to look into it; but I perceive on glancing at section 5 that upon a judgment being obtained payment shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury. That, of course, fixes a charge somewhere. It provides means for ascertaining a liability and fixing a charge. Now whether that charge is against the general Treasury or against the District of Columbia the charge is fixed. We have witnessed enough in the past in connection with these subjects to awaken our interest, and we should not let bills of this character pass without due inquiry.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] whether it has not been held heretofore in rulings of the Chair that it makes no difference whether the money to be taken out of the Treasury belongs to the Government itself or is there in trust? Has it not been held that if the money has once gone into the Treasury, a bill proposing to take it out is subject to this point of order?

Mr. HUNTON. But this money never has been in the Treasury, and this bill does not propose to take it out.

Mr. REAGAN. But these bonds of the District of Columbia are guaranteed to be paid by the General Government.

Mr. HUNTON. That is another law.

Mr. SAMFORD. These bonds are required to be dated August, 1875, and the very moment they are issued and placed in the hands of the claimants a back interest for three years becomes due upon them, for which the Government of the United States is liable. I understand the rulings of the Speaker have uniformly covered all such cases and required them to go for their first consideration to the Committee of the Whole. It seems to me the Committee for the District of Columbia, having all these things before them all the time, ought to be able to tell us whether this is a charge in whole or in part upon the Federal Treasury. We are entitled to that sort of information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Texas refer to the ruling to which he alludes?

Mr. REAGAN. I only speak from memory and from hearing the uniform ruling of the Speaker in reference to the current business of the House. I have never known one case where a charge or liability was created that was not required under the point of order to be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I wish to reply to a statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee and reiterated by the gentleman from Missouri, that clearly this bill did not come within the limits of Rule 112; that it made no appropriation, but only provided that bonds already in the hands of the sinking-fund commissioner should be issued. That is not the fact. There are no bonds in the hands of the sinking-fund commissioner for issue in this direction, and none can be issued except by the direct and express provisions of this act. I will call the gentleman's attention to section 6, line 7:

And said sinking-fund commissioner is hereby directed to issue and deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of 3.65 bonds required to satisfy this act.

The act of June, 1864, authorizing the issue of 3.65 bonds limited the amount to the audited claims passed by the board of audit, and when that limit was reached the power of the sinking-fund commissioner was exhausted. Not only that, but by a subsequent act of Congress the sinking-fund commissioner was expressly required not to issue any other bonds under the provisions of that act. The board of audit was abolished, and the power of the sinking-fund commissioner to issue bonds was restricted—was taken away from him. So that there is no power to issue 3.65 bonds except as granted by the sixth section of this act. Further, the United States, if they have not guaranteed these bonds, certainly have to pay a portion of the interest due upon them. I think the point of order ought to be sustained.

Mr. SLEMONS. I ask that this question of order be decided. We are ready to proceed with the consideration of the bill in the House or in committee, as it may be decided to be sent to the committee or considered in the House. We do not, however, want the whole evening wasted on the point of order. If the Chair decides it must go to the committee we will go into committee and consider it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to decide the question, but would much prefer to hear the question discussed.

Mr. HUNTON. The only objection to any further discussion of the point of order is that it will exhaust the limited time for the consideration of the District business. The District has but this one day in the month, and it will not have in all probability any further time during the present session. Under the discussion, therefore, of the point of order it must necessarily result in defeating this bill and others which are behind it.

Mr. COX. It is no fault of mine, sir, members have discussed the merits of measures on points of order; the custom has grown up in that respect, and I desire simply to confine my remarks to the point of order. What is the reason of this rule? The reason of the rule is that all moneys, all lands, all that involves anything of value that may be taken from the Treasury of the United States shall have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole; that there may be full and mature discussion, not under the strict rules of the House, but under the looser and larger rules of the Committee of the Whole. That is the reason of the rule. Why does not that rule apply to a case of this kind where we are to issue bonds upon which interest at once goes from the Treasury—at once, not merely incidental involvement of expense, but actual payment of three years of arrears.

What does the rule which has been quoted mean? "Where a bill may incidentally involve expense, but does not directly require an appropriation, it does not necessarily go to the Committee of the Whole." That is the decision of Speaker Kerr, quoted from Journal, first session Forty-fourth Congress, page 1333. That does not reach this case; I have sent for it to examine it. This is a direct appropriation of money as near as anything can be; not an incidental involvement of expense, but it is a direct involvement of expense. It takes the money directly from the Treasury and the people's representatives have the right under the rules to the fullest discussion of the question in the Committee of the Whole. If I had the Journal to which reference is made in this Digest, I think I could make some discrimination as to this mere excerpt from the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read an extract from the Manual.

The Clerk read as follows:

Where a bill may incidentally involve expense but does not directly require an appropriation it does not necessarily go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has caused to be read an extract from the decision delivered by Speaker pro tempore Sayler, first session, Forty-fourth Congress. That decision would seem to imply that where a bill incidentally involves expense, but does not directly require appropriation of money, it does not necessarily go to the Committee of the Whole. In that decision attention was called to the fact that the word in the rule was "requiring," not "involving," and it was held that the "mere fact that the bill may in some incidental or remote way involve expense, or that in some form or other to carry out its provisions expense may be incurred, and even necessarily incurred, by additional legislation, cannot bring it within the rule." This decision was upon appeal to the House sustained by yeas 158, nays 24, and until reversed by the House is binding on the present occupant of the chair.

If this were an original proposition and the present occupant of the chair were governed alone by his own judgment, his decision on it might be different from the one which he now renders. But he feels the question has already been decided; and upon the established precedents he is of opinion the bill should not go to the Committee of the Whole. There is no direct appropriation in the bill; and it only incidentally and contingently involves an appropriation. Rule 110, which was cited by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SAMFORD,] the Chair understands has heretofore been held to relate only to questions of revenue. On reading the rule the present occupant of the chair comes to the same conclusion. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. SLEMONS. I ask unanimous consent that the bill as proposed to be amended by the committee be considered as a substitute for the original bill, and that it be read and considered by sections for amendment as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HUNTON. Under the five-minute rule.

Mr. SAMFORD. I do not agree to its being considered under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Arkansas, and the bill will be read by sections for amendment.

The substitute (H. R. No. 2328) was read a first and second time, and the Clerk proceeded to read it by sections for amendment.

The first section was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims is hereby extended to, and it shall have exclusive original legal and equitable jurisdiction of, all claims now existing against the District of Columbia, arising out of contracts and not barred by any act of Congress or failure to comply with the requirements of any act of Congress, including certificates of auditor and of board of audit, sewer certificates, sewer taxes, measurements, and other evidence of indebtedness covered by contracts made since February 21, 1871, and all outstanding written obligations of the levy court of said District. Said Court of Claims shall have the same power, proceed in the same manner, and be governed by the same rules, in respect to the mode of hearing, adjudication, and determination of said claims, as it now has in relation to the adjudication of claims against the United States. When the trial of any claim against the District of Columbia, prosecuted under the provisions of this act, involves the taking and stating of a long account or the making of measurements or computations involving the services of engineers, said court shall have power to award a reference to a competent referee to take and state such account, or to the engineer commissioner of the District to make and report such measurements and computations; and said referee or engineer shall report to the court the evidence taken by him for the information of said court; and any such referee shall be allowed such compensation for his services as the court may determine, not exceeding $10 per day for time actually employed, to be paid on the order of the court in money.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. SAMFORD. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. Are we proceeding under the five-minute rule?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAMFORD. I made an objection to the proposition that the bill should be considered under the five-minute rule, but I am informed the Chair did not hear me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman state that he rose to make his objection?

Mr. SAMFORD. Yes, sir. I understand it requires unanimous consent, and I objected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama states that he made his objection in time, and the Chair accepts his statement.

Mr. HUNTON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Alabama whether he desires the entire bill to be considered without limitation of debate; because, if he does, that is an end to the bill. If he wants for himself more time to express his views on the bill than he can have in a five-minute speech I have no objection to his time being extended. But I am sure the gentleman from Alabama does not wish to kill the bill by consumption of time in a discussion of it.

Mr. SAMFORD. That is not my object.

Mr. HUNTON. If the gentleman will indicate how much time he wants I think no one will object to his having whatever time he deems reasonable; but I hope the five-minute arrangement will not be disturbed except in that respect.

Mr. SAMFORD. I made the objection at the suggestion of several friends. I do not know that I desire to speak myself. But I think gentlemen in the discussion of this bill should not be confined to the narrow limits prescribed by the five-minute rule. I have no idea, however, that any one wants to kill the bill by lengthy debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. General debate will be permitted until it is cut off by the previous question. The Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER.]

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 13, after the word "District," insert the following:

Provided, That said Court of Claims shall not take jurisdiction of any claim against the District of Columbia which was not presented to the board of audit under the provisions of the act of June 20, 1874, and of March 3, 1875, excepting such claims as have arisen out of contracts made by the District commissioners since the passage of said act of June 20, 1874.

Mr. BUCKNER. There are a number of claims due by the District of Columbia which ought to be paid in some way, by the District or by the Government or by somebody else. But the objection I have to this bill is that it opens the door to a great many claims that ought to have been presented and that the law required to have been presented before the board of audit under the act of 1874, when the District government was changed.

Mr. HENKLE. I would suggest to my friend from Missouri that this bill expressly rules out those claims. It says:

Not barred by any act of Congress or failure to comply with the requirements of any act of Congress.

Mr. BUCKNER. If that be so, then the amendment I offer only makes that thing clear. Under the act of 1874 all these claims which originated when the District had a governor and a territorial government, were required to be presented to the board of audit—in the first place within ninety days, the time being extended afterward up to the 4th of July, 1875. Every one who had a claim against the District was required to present it before that board of audit, and upon that the board was to act.

The board of audit went on and acted on these claims to the amount of $13,700,000, or rather they acted on the claims which they thought were within the purview of that statute of 1874. But at the time they went out of office there were certificates already issued by the board of audit amounting to three-quarters of a million dollars that had not been converted into 3.65 bonds, and that were just as much entitled to be constituted a portion of the 3.65 debt of the District as the obligations that were so converted.

In addition to that, the District commissioners had authorized work to go on, improperly and illegally as I hold, and as the House has seemed to hold, and I think there can be no doubt about it. Parties went on and supplied the District commissioners with labor and material, and claims originating in that way amount to two or three hundred thousand dollars more; making with the other amount, in round numbers, one million or one million one hundred thousand dollars, the persons who held those claims having just as much right to be paid as those who hold the 3.65 debt. As I could show also by the report made by the District commissioners, there were claims known as sewer certificates, which were also provided for in this bill. And there are claims which the parties say were not presented to the board of audit. Now, after this lapse of time, I say these parties have no rights, either against Congress or the District of Columbia; certainly not against Congress. These claims which were not presented amount only to $100,000. The parties had an opportunity for three years to present their claims. And the objection I make to the bill is that provision should be made for parties who did not come under the act of 1874. The object of my amendment is to exclude them, while those who are entitled to be paid should be included in the provisions of this bill.

The amendment provides that the court shall not take jurisdiction of any claims that were required to be presented to the board of audit under the first act, within ninety days after public notice had been given. That act was extended by the act of March 3, 1875, to the 4th of July of that year. Now, at this late day, this bill as I understand it provides that claims not then presented shall not be allowed, but I want to make it sure by my amendment.

Mr. HUNTON. The necessity for the passage of the bill under consideration arises from the following state of facts, and I beg leave to state here and now for the information of the House that this bill is substantially the bill which has at least on one occasion passed this House without a division. The only difference between this bill and the bill of a former session is that this bill is more strictly guarded so as to protect the interests of the District of Columbia than the one that passed the House at the last session.

Under the previous government of the District of Columbia there were large contracts entered into and a large indebtedness incurred by the District of Columbia in repairing the streets, &c., in this city.

In 1874 Congress passed a law establishing a board of audit, whose duty it was to audit all those claims against the District of Columbia, and when audited and passed upon favorably by the board of audit that board was directed to pay in 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia the amount found to be due to the creditors by the board of audit. That board of audit went on for some time in passing upon these claims, and complaint was made to this House or to the Senate that the board of audit was allowing claims improperly, and that some of the claims allowed by the board of audit were fraudulent and ought not to have been paid, and thereupon the two Houses of Congress, in the alarm consequent on that information, suspended the functions of that board and abolished it.

Now when that law suspending and abolishing the power of the board of audit was passed the board had passed upon a majority of the claims against the District government and issued, in 3.65 bonds, the sum of thirteen million seven hundred and some odd thousand dollars. It was found that when that board went out of existence there were other claims against the District of Columbia, as honest and just and the payment of which was as obligatory on the District government as any of those that had been paid in 3.65 bonds, and so this condition of affairs arose: that some of the creditors of the District of Columbia have been paid and some claims as just and equitable against the District of Columbia as those which have been paid were left unaudited and unpaid by the board.

The board of audit was abolished, I believe, in 1876, and from that day to this these creditors, most of whom I undertake to say are as honest creditors as ever existed under the government of the District of Columbia, have been knocking at the doors of both Houses of Congress and asking some mode, they care not what, by which their claims may be passed upon; and if found just and proper, that the Government of the United States would furnish some machinery by which the District of Columbia may be authorized to pay these debts.

It certainly does not seem right to me, however it may appear to other gentlemen on this floor, that one class of creditors, no more honest or more entitled to payment than the others, shall be paid; that out of this mass of creditors against the District of Columbia a certain portion shall be paid and others cut off by suspending the functions of the board of audit and supplying nothing in its stead.

It seems to me that it is the bounden duty of the two Houses of Congress to pass some law by which the equity and justice of these claims may be passed upon, and that those which are found to be equitable and just shall be paid.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HUNTON. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. What is the estimated amount of the claims which have not been audited?

Mr. HUNTON. I meant to come to that before sitting down, and I will do it now. As I stated a short while since, this board of audit audited claims amounting to $13,700,000, and then their functions ceased. According to the report of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, which I had before me a moment ago, all the outstanding claims of every description, arising from contracts, or from whatever source they may arise, will fall little short of $15,000,000, and this bill limits the Court of Claims to the sum of $15,000,000. They cannot exceed it under any circumstances.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then the outstanding claims amount to between $1,000,000 and $2,000,000?

Mr. HUNTON. About $1,100,000 or $1,200,000.

Mr. BUCKNER. If my friend will allow me, I will read from the report of the commissioners:

Claims allowed by the board of audit for which certificates were issued but not converted into 3.65 bonds	$758,226 15
Claims allowed by the board of audit for which certificates were not issued	133,829 26
Claims in class 4, relating to contracts with the board of public works for work done, the measurements of which have been made and certified by the engineer of the District, but were not transmitted to the board of audit	143,186 62
Total	1,035,242 03

Mr. HUNTON. When this state of facts was made known to the Committee for the District of Columbia during the last Congress they reported a bill similar to this, except that there were not in it so many safeguards thrown around the government of the District to protect it from fraudulent claims as there are in this bill. This House then felt it a duty obligatory upon it to provide some mode by which these honest creditors of the District of Columbia could assert their claims, and if proved to be correct to have them paid.

It appeared that there had been paid claims to the amount of $13,700,000 in round numbers, and that $1,100,000 or $1,200,000 had not been passed upon. Now the owners of the claims which have not been passed upon aver that they are as honest debts against the District of Columbia as those for which the $13,700,000 was paid. Now, are we to say, as just men legislating for the District of Columbia, that these claimants against the District government shall never have an opportunity to assert their claims and if proper and right to have them paid as these others have been paid?

Now, in order to protect the government of the District from fraudulent claims, every safeguard has been thrown around this bill that the committee could think of. I find upon an examination of the bill, what I did not see when my friend and myself talked about it this morning, that it contains a provision covering the very amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER.] That provision will be found in the bill as reported by the committee. It provides that claims against the District of Columbia shall not be considered by the Court of Claims if they have been barred by any act of Congress.

Mr. BUCKNER. Allow me a moment right there. The difficulty is this: the law has provided that these claims should be presented within a certain time. The act of 1874 first provided that they should be presented within ninety days. That was extended so as to allow certain of these claims to be presented by the 1st of July, 1875. But the law nowhere says that unless those claims were presented they should be forever barred. It is in regard to the claims not presented that I desire to offer my amendment.

Mr. HUNTON. I cannot see how the gentleman can come to such a conclusion as that. According to his statement these people were bound to comply with the act of Congress and present their claims to the board of audit. At first they were to file their claims within ninety days; that was afterward extended to July, 1875. Now there was an obligation resting upon them to comply with the act of Congress. If they failed to comply with that act of Congress, then they were in default, and this bill says that there shall be no power in the court to consider claims barred by any act of Congress or by a failure of the claimant to comply with any act of Congress. Now if that act of Congress required them to file their claims within a certain time and they did not do so, then there was a failure on their part to comply with the requirements of the act of Congress, and their claims are barred by this bill in express terms.

I do not myself believe that it is proper to bar those claims. If they have honest claims against the government of the District for work actually done, and from which the District has been receiving a benefit day by day up to this time, whether they filed their claims or not, I believe it to be honest and just that they should be paid. But there was some difficulty upon that point in the committee, and by a majority vote the committee determined to protect the District from any claims barred by any act of Congress or by a failure to comply with any act of Congress.

Mr. BLOUNT. Were not the sewer certificates required to be presented?

Mr. HUNTON. I do not recollect.

Mr. BLOUNT. It is so stated in the report of the commissioners of the District in 1877, and yet you bring them in under this bill.

Mr. HUNTON. Very well, and if they are barred by a failure to comply with any act of Congress, then the court cannot consider them. These sewer certificates and all the classes of indebtedness enumerated in this bill in regard to which the holders of the claims have complied with the act of Congress certainly should not be forfeited.

Mr. BLOUNT. I suppose the gentleman from Virginia will not object to striking out the sewer certificates.

Mr. HUNTON. Why strike them out? Suppose it turns out that the commissioners were mistaken?

Mr. BLOUNT. And it might turn out otherwise; and with that in the bill they would be revived.

Mr. HUNTON. Would the gentleman as a lawyer say that was the construction of the law?

Mr. BLOUNT. I would not say absolutely, for I have not examined it.

Mr. HUNTON. If the gentleman would examine it he would see absolutely that it would not bear that construction. Suppose the commissioners were mistaken in regard to the sewer certificates not having been presented, and that they had been presented to the board of audit; would it be right to exclude them under a provision in this bill? Surely not. Then let the phraseology of this bill remain as it is, protecting the District government in all parts, according to my understanding, against fraudulent claims or any claims barred by an act of Congress or a failure to comply with any requirement of an act of Congress. I think, therefore, the amendment of my friend from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] is fully covered by the phraseology of the bill as reported from the committee.

Mr. BUCKNER. Now in the report from which we get these facts the commissioners say that there were auditors' certificates and sewer certificates to the amount of $102,000 that were never presented to the board of audit. These parties had then had from ninety days to three years in which to present their claims; and now after the lapse of some eight years more we propose to allow these parties who have not shown any diligence in the prosecution of their claims to come in and by any sort of testimony support their claims, putting them upon the same footing as those parties who showed proper diligence and presented their claims in due time. This is my objection to the proposition.

Mr. SAMFORD. Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to the payment of any debt which the Government of the United States honestly owes; but there are so many objections attaching to this bill which undertakes to make the Government of the United States responsible for these claims that there is some confusion in discussing the question.

As I said awhile ago in the discussion of the point of order, there is a question as to the extent of the liability of the Government of the United States in reference to these 3.65 bonds. It was not contended, I believe, by those who introduced the bill which became a law June 20, 1874, that it rendered the Government of the United States liable for the principal of those bonds; but the wording of the act is such as to make that matter questionable at least, and to give the holders of these bonds some reason for maintaining that the Government is bound for their payment—if not in the first instance, at least as guarantors, which amounts to the same thing.

Now, at the time of the passage of the act of June 20, 1874, many of the claims provided for by this bill were already in existence; and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] says that it would be unjust, that it would be contrary not only to law but to equity and good conscience, when we have paid a part of these creditors to refuse to give to these others the same sort of security. Mr. Speaker, if the Government of the United States ex gratia gave to some of these creditors that to which they were not entitled by law, it is no reason why the same kind of security should be given to those other creditors when they subsequently come in here and ask for it. Upon what ground can they ask this? Upon the ground that they were entitled to it by contract? No, sir; because the law authorizing the issue of bonds was not in existence at the time the contract was made. The pure and simple ground is that we have given a security of this kind to somebody else.

Now, I have no doubt that the intention of the law of June 20, 1874, was to provide for the then existing indebtedness of the District. I have no idea that it was the intention (although the wording of the act might bear such a construction) to authorize the District authorities to continue to make contracts and pay them with these 3.65 bonds. Now, by observing the reading of the law, it will be found that there are certain specified objects for the payment of which these bonds might be issued by the board of audit. One of these objects is the debt evidenced by sewer certificates. That evidently referred to some debt in the past. Another is the debt purporting to be evidenced and ascertained by certificates of the auditor of the board of public works. That evidently referred to a debt in the past. Then, thirdly, there was the debt evidenced by certificates of the auditor and comptroller of the District of Columbia; and, fourthly, claims existing or subsequently created for which no evidence of indebtedness had been issued, arising out of certificates, written or oral, with the board of public works.

Now, as was stated by the gentleman from Missouri, an act was passed in December of that same year requiring that these claims should all be presented within a certain length of time—ninety days, I believe. On March 3, 1875, or a few months thereafter, another act was passed extending for thirty days the time within which claims could be filed. Then, in December, 1875, or in the early part of 1876, a law was passed prohibiting absolutely the further issuance of these 3.65 bonds. That is the status of the law as we find it. In the law of June, 1878, providing for a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, it is provided that the Government of the United States shall advance all the interest on these 3.65 bonds and be credited with half the amount as its pro rata contribution to the expenses of the District of Columbia. That being the case, and it not being a question of law or a question of equity because the law for the issue of bonds was not in existence at the time of making these contracts in 1871, the question recurs whether as an original proposition we should at this time authorize the issue of bonds of the United States to the amount of $1,000,000 and more to pay back indebtedness of the District of Columbia. I am not an enemy of the interests of the District of Columbia; I am not inimical to the building up of the grandeur, the imperial splendor of this city; but I am opposed to paying out of the Treasury of the United States the whole of such expenditures or any greater part than has already been provided for by law.

The Government of the United States has advanced as expenses of this District over $27,000,000. I give these figures from the report of the commissioners of the District. After we have expended this amount of money we find that the law providing for a permanent form of government for this District absolutely obliges the Government for all time to come to pay one-half the current expenses of the District. Now, in all good conscience, Mr. Speaker, is not that enough to be taken out of the Federal Treasury?

But the gentleman from Virginia asks, (and with some degree of plausibility,) "Are you willing to cut off honest creditors of the District?" I answer the gentleman: I am not opposed to paying honest creditors of the District. What I am opposed to is paying those honest creditors out of the Federal Treasury. If the gentleman will introduce a bill giving to these creditors the right to receive bonds in payment of the back indebtedness of the District of Columbia, bonds for which the Government of the United States shall be in no way responsible—if the District of Columbia is thus required to pay its debts, I shall have no objection—none whatever. Hence my whole objection, so far as this bill is concerned, goes to requiring the Government of the United States to be responsible for it. In that view, Mr. Speaker, I have provided an amendment to section 6, which will give my idea of it:

That the Government of the United States is in no event liable for the payment of the principal or interest of any bonds authorized to be issued under the provisions of this bill.

Now, I say it is contended by some, and I should not be surprised if that were the proper construction to be put upon it, that the Government of the United States is liable for the whole of that 3.65 issue. We propose to come in now and add $1,000,000 more to the amount already issued, for which the Government is just as responsible, and to do it under the provision of a law which has been repealed. It was repealed by the act of March 3, 1875, and repealed again by the act of February, 1876, which absolutely prohibited any further issuance of these 3.65 bonds. Yet we come here now and propose to deal with that law as though it were still in existence.

To sum up the whole matter, sir, and by way of recapitulation, I have only this to say: there can be no legal claim against the Government of the United States requiring them to issue 3.65 bonds to pay for any contract before June, 1874, because the law was not in existence at that time, and therefore necessarily did not constitute a part of the contract under which these contractors acquired these claims. If these contracts were made since that time it was not only in violation of the existing law, but they have been barred by three separate and distinct acts of Congress.

There is no question, then, as to the equity; there is no question as to the law, and it simply resolves itself into a question of policy, whether the Congress of the United States will now advance another million of dollars of bonds in order to pay the back indebtedness of the District of Columbia. I am opposed to it, Mr. Speaker, because I think that the Government of the United States for the present has done enough in that direction.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I lay down the broad proposition that it is the duty not only of individuals but of municipalities and of States and of the United States to pay their indebtedness honestly and fairly and squarely. I do not believe I would plead the statute of limitations against the payment of a claim if the debt were an honest one. I think I am honest enough—I have never been put to the test, but I think I am honest enough—not to refuse the payment of an honest debt. Therefore, if this bill were shaped to suit me, there would be no limitation whatever of the rights of these creditors of the District of Columbia to present their claims for payment. But I acquiesced in the provision which is contained in this bill because the creditors who had an opportunity to present their claims and did not do so have been guilty of laches or neglect which it is the policy of the law to discourage.

The amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] does not seem to me to be necessary, in the first place, because the provisions which are incorporated in this bill are amply sufficient, in my opinion, to guard against any possible fraudulent claims, and because, in the second place, there may be some creditors who were not able to present their claims to the board of audit because of the haste with which the powers of that board were taken away by act of Congress. If there are any such creditors no one here, I am sure, would undertake to say they ought not to have the privilege of presenting their claims in the manner provided for in this act and having them adjudicated by the Court of Claims.

Mr. SIMONTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NEAL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMONTON. This board of audit I understand audited somewhere about $13,000,000 of claims.

Mr. NEAL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMONTON. Can you tell whether any large amount of claims was refused by them?

Mr. NEAL. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Tennessee I will state that I have not examined this question any further than is shown by the reports of the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SIMONTON. I wish to ask another question, and that is whether the large number that were refused will not have an opportunity to come in before the Court of Claims, it having equitable jurisdiction—whether those claims which have been refused by the board of audit will be considered as res adjudicata, or will be allowed to go before the Court of Claims under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. NEAL. No, sir; for the reason the provisions of this bill bar them. They are, however, already barred by act of Congress, as they were claims rejected by that board of audit.

Mr. SIMONTON. But suppose these claimants comply with all the provisions of the act and insist they have an equitable right to go before the Court of Claims, notwithstanding the refusal of their claims on the part of the board of audit.

Mr. NEAL. Those claims, if I understand the act correctly, were barred by their rejection by the board of audit.

Mr. FIELD. The original act provided no claim should be audited and allowed unless presented within ninety days after the first notice, and the supplemental act extended the time to thirty days from the date of it, but nothing was said that, having been presented within the ninety days and the thirty days, they should be barred as against the District of Columbia so that the Court of Claims could not take jurisdiction of them. Now, is the fact of not having presented a claim before that board, which is now abolished, a general bar to that claim being considered under this bill, if it becomes a law, by another court authorized to hear all claims arising under all contracts and not barred by act of Congress or failure to comply with the requirements of any act of Congress?

Mr. NEAL. If I correctly understand the gentleman's question I will say that by this bill all these claims are barred.

Mr. FIELD. It is not so said.

Mr. NEAL. It provides that they shall not be allowed. The terms barred and not allowed are equivalent.

Mr. FIELD. The board of audit could not take jurisdiction of them; but when that court is abolished and another court is established to which is given jurisdiction of all contracts, the contract still exists as between the claimants and the District, and I think there is here no general bar applicable to the enforcement of all contracts.

Mr. NEAL. That is true; but there is a specific bar provided by this bill that these claims shall not be re-examined by the Court of Claims under this act. The bill provides that the Court of Claims "shall have exclusive original legal and equitable jurisdiction of all claims now existing against the District of Columbia arising out of contracts, and not barred by any act of Congress or failure to comply with the requirements of any act of Congress."

Now, that law said unless the claims were presented within a certain time they should not be allowed. This law says that all claims in which the requirements of any act of Congress have not been complied with shall be barred. Now, I do not understand how it is possible for any court to construe this act any other way than as barring the claims existing when the board of audit was organized when the parties failed to comply with the requirements of the act.

Mr. FIELD. If it is intended not to extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims over matters which could have been brought before the board of audit, but which were not presented within the ninety and the thirty days respectively, why not say so in plain terms? Why leave it out?

Mr. SLEMONS. I move the previous question on the pending section and amendments.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I ask the gentleman to allow the amendment which I send to the desk to come within the operation of the previous question.

Mr. SLEMONS. I will hear the amendment read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 1, line 10, strike out the words "and other evidence of indebtedness;" and in lines 12 and 13 strike out the words "and all outstanding written obligations of the levy court of said District."

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I would like to say just a word in explanation of this amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Arkansas withdraw the motion for the previous question?

Mr. SLEMONS. I do so for a moment.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. The striking out of the words indicated in the amendment restricts this bill to matters which came within the jurisdiction given in the act of 1874. The words stricken out would allow other evidence of indebtedness to come in, and also all outstanding written obligations of the levy court of the District. Now, there is no information before the committee or in possession of any member of the committee, so far as I know, as to the amount of these various obligations. We know nothing whatever as to the amount involved in these two phrases. I think we should keep this bill within the limits of the original law of June 20, 1874, and submit only such classes of claims to the Court of Claims as were embraced in the original act.

Mr. BUCKNER. I wish to ask the gentleman whether in the act of June, 1874, the obligations of the levy court were permitted to be taken into consideration at all?

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. No, sir; this bill goes beyond the original act in that respect.

Mr. BUCKNER. Those words ought certainly to be stricken out.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I think we should not put anything in this bill that was not contemplated in the act of 1874. Those words, therefore, should be stricken out.

Mr. SLEMONS. I now move the previous question on the section and the amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; which was first upon the amendment offered by Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island.

The amendment was adopted.

The question was next on Mr. BUCKNER'S amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now on the section as amended. It will be agreed to unless there be objection.

Mr. SAMFORD. I object.

Mr. SLEMONS. I ask unanimous consent to strike out the comma after the word "Columbia" in the sixth line.

There was no objection.

Mr. SAMFORD. I will not insist on my objection if the gentleman who has charge of the bill will answer me a question.

Mr. SLEMONS. I will hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. SAMFORD. The bill says "all claims now existing against the District of Columbia." I ask the gentleman whether the bill includes everything up to date?

Mr. HUNTON. The limitation immediately follows.

Mr. SAMFORD. The limitation is:

Arising out of contracts, and not barred by any act of Congress or failure to comply with the requirements of any act of Congress, including certificates, &c., made since February 21, 1871.

Now there is no limitation in all that.

Mr. HUNTON. There were no such certificates issued after the commissioners of the District were appointed.

Mr. SAMFORD. Precisely so; but the bill does not say "certificates." It says "other evidence of indebtedness."

Mr. HUNTON. Those words have been stricken out.

Mr. SAMFORD. The bill says "all claims arising out of contracts." It does not say "certificates."

Mr. HUNTON. And it says what contracts shall be included.

Mr. SAMFORD. Then I understand the gentleman to say, in answer to my question, that this does not include all contracts up to this date.

Mr. HUNTON. No, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] withdraw his objection?

Mr. SAMFORD. I object to the section being considered as agreed to by unanimous consent, and ask the Chair to put the question.

The question being put, the section, as amended, was agreed to.

The Clerk read the second section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 2. All such claims against the District of Columbia shall, in the first instance, be prosecuted before the Court of Claims, in the same manner and subject to the same rules as claims against the United States are prosecuted therein, or to such other rules as the court shall prescribe. In any case in which the amount in controversy exceeds $5,000, if before trial either party requests in writing a finding of facts by the court, there shall be the same right of appeal, either by the District of Columbia or by the claimant, and subject to the same rules and regulations, as are prescribed by law for appeals on behalf of the United States or claimants against the United States from the judgments of the Court of Claims: Provided, That the prosecution of all such claims shall be commenced in the Court of Claims by the filing of the petition of the claimant, as required by the rules and practice of said court, within six months from the passage of this act; and all such claims against the District of Columbia now existing, and not so filed within said time, shall be forever barred, except in cases of claims owned and held by persons under legal disabilities, in which case such claims shall be in like manner barred unless commenced as aforesaid within six months after the expiration of such disability: Provided, That all certificates, measurements, or other evidence of indebtedness, in the custody of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, shall be deposited with the Court of Claims, upon the application of any claimant

When the validity of a number of claims depends substantially upon a like state of facts, they may be brought before the court in one petition in which all parties are joined, and may be tried together under such rules as the court may prescribe, and such judgments may be entered therein as the court may determine; and cases of like kind may be consolidated and tried together whenever the court so orders.

Mr. SAMFORD. In order to bring the question which I raised a while ago directly before the House, I move to strike out the second section. There can be no question that upon a proper consideration and construction of this bill it would include every claim which is properly chargeable against the District of Columbia up to date.

The language of the bill is that "all claims now existing against the District of Columbia," &c. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] objected to that construction, and said that the language was restricted by subsequent language to those claims to which certificates of the board had been issued, but the language is that all claims arising out of contracts, including the certificates of the auditor and the board of audit. If it included only claims for which certificates have been issued, then the gentleman's construction might be correct; but there is nothing in this bill to prevent the adjudication of claims that arose yesterday against the District of Columbia and issuing 3.65 bonds to pay them.

Mr. HUNTON. Are there any such claims?

Mr. SAMFORD. There are the claims for the ordinary expenses of the government of the District, such as the pay of policemen.

Mr. HUNTON. Are they included here?

Mr. SAMFORD. They are in the language of the bill as it now stands "all claims now existing against the District of Columbia arising out of contracts since 1871 and not barred." That is all the restriction thrown around the law. In 1876 there was a law passed prohibiting absolutely the issuing of any more bonds. In that law it was provided that all works for which the bonds had been issued should be discontinued, and yet we are called upon now in the verbiage of this law to allow the creditors to bring their cases before the court and get judgment upon their claims. Now, if it is the object and desire of the House to provide for the payment of all the past indebtedness of the District, it is easy to do that; but I do not understand that that is the object of the House, and it was not the object of the committee.

As it was said by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. ALDRICH,] claims are provided for in this bill that were never provided for by the law of 1874; and this is the first instance in which it has been proposed to pay some claims against the District of Columbia in 3.65 bonds. For instance, in addition to those which were written obligations of the levy court of the District which had been stricken out, we find that it includes certificates of the auditor and the board of audit. Now, all those claims were not provided for in that law, and that being the case we are now passing a law to issue 3.65 bonds to pay every single cent that may be due by the District of Columbia up to the passage of the law, including the ordinary expenses of the District government.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to say a single word in reply to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SAMFORD.]

I had supposed that after we had passed the first section we should have no more debate on the provisions of that section; but it seems to suit the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SAMFORD,] in discussing the second section, which does not apply to this matter at all, to discuss anew the provisions of the first section.

Mr. SAMFORD. I beg the gentleman's pardon; the first line of the second section says:

All such claims against the District of Columbia.

Mr. HUNTON. And the question of paying all such claims has been passed upon by a vote of the House.

Now, the objection taken by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] is, that under the provisions of this bill the Court of Claims could go on to hear and give judgment on claims against the District of Columbia contracted only yesterday. My friend is oblivious of the provisions under which the present government of the District of Columbia exists. He knows or ought to know that the District commissioners cannot spend a dollar or contract to spend a dollar in the District of Columbia now without first submitting to the Secretary of the Treasury estimates for the work proposed to be done, contracts proposed to be made, and obligations proposed to be incurred, which must be approved by the Committee on Appropriations of this House, and appropriations made to carry out the work before the commissioners can enter upon it. That is the provision of the law for the permanent government of the District of Columbia, and I can tell the gentleman that so far from any claims being outstanding against the District commissioners for the present fiscal year, I am informed by those commissioners that there will be a surplus in their hands, after carrying out all the work estimated for and appropriated for by the Committee on Appropriations for the current year. So that the idea advanced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] is without foundation in point of fact.

There are no such claims, and the whole object of this bill is that the court shall pass upon claims existing at the time there was a change in the government, and commissioners were appointed by act of Congress to conduct the affairs of the District of Columbia.

From the date of the appointment of the commissioners, which was, I think, in 1878, there is not an outstanding debt not provided for by an appropriation and by taxation, so that the idea of my friend from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] is entirely without foundation, and that question has already been passed upon by a vote of the House.

The claims which are to go before the Court of Claims are settled by the first section and the second section only applies to such claims as are referred to in the first section.

Mr. SAMFORD. Do I understand the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] to say that according to the estimates of the present commissioners of the District there will be a surplus after paying all they have estimated for during the present fiscal year?

Mr. HUNTON. I am so informed.

Mr. SAMFORD. There are a dozen places in the reports of these commissioners where they say that their estimates are not sufficient. Here is one page where there are two such statements. Then in another place they say that the estimated receipts will not be sufficient for them to provide for the sinking fund required by law and pay the amount due on past bonds. And there are half a dozen other places, to which I could refer in five minutes, where will be found their statement that there will be a deficit. Nearly every one of the heads of the various departments of the District make such statements.

Mr. HUNTON. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I have not time to go through the commissioners' reports. But the commissioners told me in their own office that of the appropriations for certain improvements in the District for the present fiscal year there would be a surplus unexpended by them. I now move the previous question on the second section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] to strike out the second section.

Mr. SAMFORD. I withdraw that motion, because I understand there is an amendment to be offered to that section.

Mr. HUNTON. I would not press the previous question to exclude amendments, but I want to cut off debate.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was taken upon agreeing to the second section; and upon a division there were—ayes 40, noes 9.

No further count being called for, the section was agreed to.

Mr. NEAL. I move to reconsider the votes by which the first and second sections of this bill have been adopted; and I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Sections 3, 4, and 5, were then read, as follows:

SEC. 3. The Attorney-General of the United States shall have authority, and it shall be his duty, to defend the District of Columbia against all such claims against said District of Columbia prosecuted in said Court of Claims, and on appeal, in like manner as he is now by law required to defend the United States in said court, with the same power to interpose counter claims and offsets against claims, and with like power of appeal as in cases against the United States tried in said court.

SEC. 4. All laws now in force relating to prosecutions of claims against the United States in the Court of Claims shall apply, as far as applicable, to the prosecution, practice, hearing, and determination of claims against the District of Columbia authorized to be prosecuted under the provisions of this act: Provided, That motions for new trials shall be made by either party within twenty days after the rendition of any judgment: And provided further, That in the trial of such cases no person shall be excluded as a witness because he or she is a party to or interested in the same.

SEC. 5. If no appeal be taken from the judgment and determination of the Court of Claims in cases provided for in this act within the term limited by law for appealing from the judgments of said court, and in all cases of final judgments by the Court of Claims, or on appeal by the Supreme Court where the same are affirmed in favor of the claimant, the sum due thereby shall be paid, as hereinafter provided, by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no payment shall be made except upon the presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury of a copy of said judgment certified by the clerk of the Court of Claims, and signed by the chief-justice, or, in his absence, by the presiding judge of said court.

No amendments were offered to the above sections, and they were adopted.

Section 6 was then read, as follows:

SEC. 6. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to demand of the sinking-fund commissioner of the District of Columbia so many of the 3.65 bonds authorized by act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, and acts amendatory thereof, as may be necessary for the payment of the judgments; and said sinking-fund commissioner is hereby directed to issue and deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of 3.65 bonds required to satisfy the judgments; which bonds shall be received by said claimants at par in payment of such judgments, and shall bear date January 1, 1875, and mature at the same time as other bonds of this issue; and for the amount found by the court to be due upon any such claim, interest shall be allowed from the maturity of the same, at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum; and the gross amount of such bonds heretofore and hereafter issued shall not exceed in the aggregate $15,000,000.

Mr. SAMFORD. I move to amend section 6 by adding to it that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Government of the United States is in no event liable for the payment of the principal or interest of any of the bonds authorized to be issued under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON,] as a matter of information, why it is that the limit of these bonds is put at $15,000,000? If the claims are right and so found by the court, why limit them to $15,000,000? May not that result in the payment of some of these claims and the denial of others, and require future legislation?

Mr. HUNTON. I will answer the gentleman with pleasure. When this bill came before the last Congress, the amount of 3.65 bonds to be issued in payment of these claims was not limited. A difficulty was at once raised on this floor, (as is most generally the case with regard to District bills,) that the amount of bonds might be extended to $20,000,000 or $30,000,000, that nobody could tell where it would go. The committee having the bill in charge were satisfied that it could not exceed $15,000,000, and that limit was put in that bill and is followed in this bill. The commissioners of the District of Columbia have estimated for all the claims that could be allowed, including those which have been stricken out of the first section of the bill this morning. In our opinion and in the opinion of the commissioners the amount cannot exceed $15,000,000.

Mr. SPARKS. Can the gentleman give us with any precision the amount of bonds already issued?

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, I can give the exact amount. It is thirteen million seven hundred and odd thousand dollars.

Mr. SPARKS. Thirteen million seven hundred and odd thousand dollars is not an exact amount.

Mr. HUNTON. I have not the book here; I had a moment ago.

Mr. SPARKS. My object was to get precisely the amount of bonds that has been issued and the amount which may be issued under this bill.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] by striking out the words "or interest." The law now provides that the United States shall be responsible for the interest on these bonds.

Mr. SAMFORD. I desire to say one word upon the amendment which I have offered in further answer to what was said by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] a moment ago. By looking at page 5 of the report of the commissioners of the District I find this language:

> It is not practicable, in view of other current requirements, to set apart such an amount from the present revenue.

The commissioners are there referring to the sinking fund and to the interest on the bonds. I find on page 16 these words:

> The total sum thus calculated exceeds by a large amount the possible surplus of the revenues of the District within the next two years.

I invite the attention of the gentleman from Virginia to that language. I find that further on the commissioners say:

> The resources of the water department are at present barely able to support the current expenses; and it will not be possible to lay the new mains necessary for the proper service of the present system without a slight increase in the water rates.

You will find that in the report of every single departmental officer of the District there is an estimated deficit.

Now, one word in reference to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CLAFLIN] striking out the words "or interest." If the Government of the United States is responsible for the interest it is responsible for the principal, though there is no law now existing under which bonds for the principal can be issued. This is the reason I refuse to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts and prefer to have the House vote upon it.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CLAFLIN,] because I think the Government of the United States ought to pay the interest; and I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SAMFORD,] because I think the Government of the United States ought to pay the principal. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the people of the District of Columbia are the most misgoverned within the limits of the United States. The public property within this city amounts to at least $90,000,000; and the Government contributes but little if anything toward the protection and preservation of this property.

Mr. NEAL. It contributes 50 per cent. under the law of last year.

Mr. STEPHENS. Fifty per cent. under the law of last year, but before that nothing.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Oh, yes; the Government paid a good deal before that.

Mr. STEPHENS. A very small amount. Now, I think the Government ought to pay in proportion to the value of the public property, as compared with private property. That is the right plan; and if we would do that it would be more than is involved in this bill. But I do not wish to discuss that question at this time.

I am against the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and against the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama. I am for the bill; and I trust the House will come to a vote upon it. It is but an act of justice to the people of this District, the great metropolis of this vast Federal Republic.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to say a word——

Mr. CLAFLIN. The gentleman will allow me to say that what the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] wishes to do in regard to the interest is done by my amendment. If he understood the bill, he would so understand the effect of my amendment.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to say a word or two in regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama. First as to the matter which he has been discussing upon the first section, about there being a deficit or a surplus, all I have to say is that I refer him to the commissioners; and I advise him to spur up and get to the point of the bill which we are discussing, not confining himself to a point we have passed by so long.

Now, as to the liability of the Government, it seems to me that the 3.65 bonds to be issued under this bill ought to stand on the same footing as those issued under a former act. What is the provision of existing law in regard to the bonds formerly issued? The Government guarantees that taxation shall be laid to meet the interest on those bonds and to establish a sinking fund to pay the principal at their maturity. That is the whole of the obligation of the Government, to see that a law is passed raising from the people of the District a sum of money sufficient to pay the interest on the bonds and to establish a sinking fund to meet them at their maturity.

Mr. SAMFORD. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HUNTON. That is the provision as I understand it; and it seems to me that the bonds to be issued under this bill ought to stand upon the same footing with the old bonds. In order to test whether that is acceptable to the House or not, I move the previous question upon the section and amendments.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman from Virginia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COX. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HUNTON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] for a question.

Mr. SPARKS. I do not know that I understand the argument of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] in connection with that of the gentleman from Virginia having the management of this bill. Is it the understanding that the Government of the United States is responsible for the principal and interest of these bonds? I want to know that.

Mr. NEAL. If the gentleman will allow me, I will read the section which provides for the issuing of the bonds.

Mr. SPARKS. As I understood the speech of the gentleman from Georgia, and I see it is not controverted by the gentleman having charge of this bill——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] moves that the House adjourn.

Mr. SPARKS. I understood that I was allowed the right to ask a question before the motion to adjourn was made.

Mr. COX. As my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] is speaking on the right side, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SPARKS. The question which I desire to put, and which is prompted largely by the speech of the gentleman from Georgia, is whether the gentlemen presenting this bill intend it to be understood that the Government of the United States is responsible for the principal and interest of these bonds.

Mr. STEPHENS. I can answer for myself——

Mr. HUNTON. The law on the subject will be read.

Mr. SPARKS. You can answer the question, I suppose.

Mr. STEPHENS. I will answer the gentleman from Illinois, so far as I am concerned. The law says that the Government of the United States shall be bound for its proportion, according to that act. My opinion is that the Government of the United States, as I said before, ought to be bound for the whole of it. That is my opinion. The law, however, makes it bound only for its proportion.

Mr. NEAL. I have the law here, and will read it.

Mr. STEPHENS. I hope it will be allowed to be read.

Mr. SPARKS. We have clearly the opinion of the gentleman from Georgia, and I should like to have the opinion of the gentleman from Virginia, who is managing this bill.

Mr. COX. I insist on my motion to adjourn.

Mr. HUNTON. The gentleman insists on his motion to adjourn when anything is to be said against his position, but when anything is to be said in favor of it he withdraws it.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 625) for the relief of the Farmers and Merchants' Bank, Paris, Texas;

An act (S. No. 650) to remove the political disabilities of Arthur P. Bagby, of Texas;

An act (S. No. 670) to remove the political disabilities of William N. R. Beall, of Missouri;

An act (S. No. 669) to remove the political disabilities of James F. Harrison, of Virginia;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 6) accepting from Professor Edward Fontaine, of Louisiana, certain maps, drawings, and explanations of the same; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 30) for the relief of Dr. C. W. Brink, bearer of dispatches from the United States minister at Mexico in 1869.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LORING, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for ten days.

DISTRICT CLAIMS.

Mr. STEPHENS. I hope the gentleman from New York will withdraw his motion until the law can be read.

Mr. HUNTON. We will get through with the bill very soon. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The House divided; and there were—ayes 61, noes 45.

Mr. HUNTON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only twenty voting in the affirmative.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-two minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BOWMAN: The petition of John R. Farrell, to be refunded moneys expended by him for subsistence of soldiers in 1862—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. COX: The petition of Michael Hayes, for the removal of the charge of desertion—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GIBSON: The petition of West Stevens, for the passage of a bill in relation to claims against the Bank of Louisiana—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HOUK: Papers relating to the war claim of John Henry—to the same committee.

By Mr. McCOOK: The petition of Mrs. Sarah P. Brown, for an increase of pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. McLANE: The petition of Mary Miller, for a pension—to the same committee.

By Mr. PHISTER: The petition of Edwin De Leon, late United States consul-general in Egypt, for compensation for judicial services rendered while acting as consul-general, as provided for by act of August 10, 1848—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. REAGAN: The petition of John F. Henry and 27 others, of Cow Run, Ohio, for the appointment of a special committee to investigate the charges and discriminations of railroads—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi: Papers relating to the claim of John D. Ryan, for compensation for printing blanks for officials of the United States—to the Committee of Claims.

Also, papers relating to the war claims of J. C. Cameron and Hugh Lewis—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WASHBURN: The petition of Samuel Marsh and others, for the passage of the Reagan interstate-commerce bill—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee: The petition of Jeremiah B. Simmons, for compensation for property taken and used by the United States Army during the late war—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, the petition of citizens of Hot Springs, Arkansas, for additional legislation in respect to the Hot Springs reservation—to the Committee on Rules.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 17, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill (H. R. No. 2165) to amend section 2297 of title 32 of the Revised Statutes, relating to homestead settlers; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2326) for the relief of settlers upon the Osage trust and diminished reserve lands in Kansas, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of Joseph P. Davis, vice-president, and George S. Rice, secretary, of the Boston Society of Civil Engineers, praying for the passage of a law authorizing the use of the metric system of weights and measures in the post-offices and custom-houses throughout the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of Thomas Hastings, of Chicago, Illinois, praying for the passage of a law authorizing the reissue of $20,000 of 5-20 bonds of the United States owned by him, and which were destroyed by the great fire in that city in 1871; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of John Brown and others, the petition of F. C. Moore and others, the petition of A. W. Rollins and others, the petition of William Manton and others, and the petition of S. L. Honey and others, citizens of the United States, praying for the passage of a law granting a pension to L. French Williams, of Linn County, Kansas, for injuries received during the late war; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL presented additional evidence to accompany the bill (S. No. 363) granting an increase of pension to James C. McCarty; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

DETROIT RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce have instructed me to report back without amendment House joint resolution No. 87, and recommend that it pass. It is simply to authorize the Secretary of War to convene a board of officers of the Corps of Engineers of the Army to inquire into the feasibility of constructing a bridge or tunnel for railroad purposes at or within a mile of Detroit. It appropriates nothing, and I ask the consent of the Senate to put it upon its passage now. There will be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 87) relating to a bridge across the Detroit River at or near Detroit, Michigan.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNITED STATES CENTENNIAL COMMISSION REPORTS.

Mr. WHYTE. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a joint resolution of the House of Representatives in regard to the printing of certain copies of the final reports of the United States centennial commission, to report the same back favorably, and I ask for its immediate consideration. It is the unanimous report of the committee.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 34) to print 5,000 copies of the final reports of the United States centennial commission upon the international exhibition and centennial celebration of 1876. It directs the printing of 5,000 copies; 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 copies for the use of the State Department, and 500 copies for the use of the centennial commission.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BOOTH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 701) for the relief of settlers on the public lands of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. McMILLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 702) granting a pension to Mary A. Tindall; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2327) to authorize the renewal of a loan therein named by the joint stock company of the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1369) to relieve the churches of the District of Columbia and to clear the title of the trustees to such property.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 625) for the relief of the Farmers and Merchants' Bank, Paris, Texas;

A bill (S. No. 650) to remove the political disabilities of Arthur P. Bagby, of Texas;

A bill (S. No. 670) to remove the political disabilities of William N. R. Beall, of Missouri;

A bill (S. No. 669) to remove the political disabilities of James F. Harrison, of Virginia;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 6) accepting from Professor Edward Fontaine, of Louisiana, certain maps, drawings, and explanations of the same; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 30) for the relief of Dr. C. W. Brink, bearer of dispatches from the United States minister at Mexico in 1869.

INDIAN WARS.

Mr. McPHERSON. If there is no further business, I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 671.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a resolution on the Calendar. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER] yesterday calling upon the President of the United States for information as to how many soldiers and civilians were killed and wounded, the estimated value of property destroyed, with the expenses incurred by the United States in certain named Indian wars. What is the pleasure of the Senator?

Mr. WALKER. I ask that it be passed over. I do not wish to have it taken up and considered this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will remain upon the Calendar, then, without order.

ENROLLING OF CANAL-BOATS AND BARGES.

Mr. McPHERSON. With the consent of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] I now ask to have the bill (S. No. 671) to amend the act entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," passed February 18, 1793, taken up. An amendment was made yesterday, when the bill was considered, by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] to insert a proviso, which I propose to strike out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question has not been put yet whether the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.]

Mr. McPHERSON. I will state that the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania is first to be considered, as it is contradictory to that offered by the Senator from New York. The amendment offered by the Senator from New York is simply an amendment put in a different place to cover the entire ground and much more than the one offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania was agreed to. That amendment was to add at the end of the bill these words:

Provided, That all vessels described by this act shall be enrolled or licensed without cost or fee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from New Jersey that the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania was made as in Committee of the Whole, and a motion to reconsider it is not in order, the bill being now in the Senate. After the amendment offered by the Senator from New York is voted upon, it will be in order to move to strike out the proviso added upon the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then I will offer the amendment offered by the Senator from New York yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from New York will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 4, after the word "require," it is proposed to insert "the payment of any fee or charge for;" so as to read:

That the provisions of title 50 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall not be so construed as to require the payment of any fee or charge for the enrolling or licensing of vessels not propelled wholly by sail or by internal motive power of their own, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Now, it will be in order to move to strike out the proviso.

Mr. McPHERSON. I move to strike out the proviso added yesterday in the following words:

Provided, That all vessels described by this act shall be enrolled or licensed without cost or fee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment moved by the Senator from New Jersey striking out the proviso.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. May we hear the bill reported at length as it has been amended, now?

The Chief Clerk read the bill as amended, as follows:

That the provisions of title 50 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall not be so construed as to require the payment of any fee or charge for the enrolling or licensing of vessels built in the United States and owned by citizens thereof not propelled wholly by sail or by internal motive power of their own, and not in any case carrying passengers, whether navigating the internal waters of a State or the navigable waters of the United States, and not engaged in trade with contiguous foreign territory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, as they have been amended in the Senate.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I have just had put in my hand a memorandum made by one who from his calling must be skilled in respect of this matter. I have read it only partly through; but I have read so far that I will venture to call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to one thing which I find in it, and that is a remark that extending this legislation to unrigged vessels plying on all the waters will be likely to open the door to smuggling. A moment's thought will suggest to every Senator what is intended by that comment. Under this bill, except for the amendment which the Senator has consented to requiring every vessel to be licensed and enrolled, as this writer suggests all these vessels would go without marine documents, to use his expression, and that would certainly open a door for smuggling.

I read this in part to furnish the Senator with a very good additional reason (although I confess I did not know it myself at the time) for insisting upon the amendment which has been made this morning, and which I hope does mean—and I should like an opportunity to look at it for a moment—that all these vessels not only may be but shall be licensed and enrolled.

Mr. McPHERSON. It covers the ground.

Mr. CONKLING. Upon examining it, I think that amendment does, as the Senator suggests, require the boats to be licensed and enrolled, and that certainly must go very far to answer the objection made by this gentleman, who apparently for conscientious motives has written down here a memorandum of objection to the bill. I will read one other observation:

Third. It seems that the exemption of unrigged vessels from documenting should not extend beyond their voyages made wholly or partly upon the canals or other internal waters, and that for voyages exclusively on tide-water they should be left liable under section 4371.

Does the Senator happen to have that section before him?

Mr. McPHERSON. I have not.

Mr. CONKLING. This is not, I am aware, a very regular mode of proceeding, but as I have been written to upon this subject I feel bound to avail myself of the only mode possible in this way of considering it, to bring this matter to the notice of the Senate. Section 4371 I will read:

Every vessel of twenty tons or upward, other than registered vessels found trading between district and district, or between different places in the same district, or carrying on the fishery without being enrolled and licensed, or if less than twenty tons and not less than five tons, without a license, in the manner provided by this title, if laden with merchandise the growth or manufacture of the United States only, distilled spirits excepted, or in ballast, shall pay the same fees and tonnage in every port of the United States at which she may arrive as vessels not belonging to a citizen of the United States; and, if she have on board any articles of foreign growth or manufacture, or distilled spirits, other than sea stores, she shall, together with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the lading found on board, be forfeited.

Mr. McPHERSON. In reply to the suggestion made by the Senator from New York, I think the section of the Revised Statutes to which he has called attention simply refers to the lading of a vessel and does not refer at all to the vessel itself. It seems to me that under this provision every guard has been placed around the whole matter. The vessel is required to be enrolled and licensed by some name or number. Some designation must be given to it at the custom-house or under the proper officer of the Government where the vessel can always be enrolled, and so the title can be changed. I think that the objection urged in that respect is of no particular consequence.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not feel authorized to deny what the Senator says. He understands this subject better than I do. The only point that struck me is a provision requiring at ports at which a vessel touches under certain circumstances certain fees. Whether the bill as he has it now arranged meets that difficulty, I do not know.

Mr. McPHERSON. We can remedy it by supplemental legislation at any time if we find there is any defect in that respect.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, shall the bill pass?

Mr. DAWES. The title of the bill should be amended.

Mr. McPHERSON. The committee report to amend the title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We have not reached the title yet; that is the last thing. Shall the bill pass?

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Commerce, I reported a bill as a substitute for the one which was introduced by the Senator from New York, [Mr. KERNAN.] The bill thus reported from that committee has been entirely emasculated. Since the foundation of the Government up to within a few days or a few weeks ago at most, since the act of February 18, 1793, was passed, no flatboats, coal-barges, and boats of that kind have been compelled to be registered or enrolled. I think that is a fair interpretation of the law of 1793. It has been thus interpreted, thus construed by all the Attorneys-General of the United States until the present one. The present Attorney-General of the United States says that boats of that description, and canal-boats drawn by horse-power, must be enrolled and registered. I think the opinion of the Attorney-General is erroneous; and I reported a substitute for the original bill from the Committee on Commerce, which reads thus; it is very short:

That the provisions of title 50 of the Revised Statutes of the United States—

That is the law of 1793, and we reported the substitute so as to meet the construction of the Attorney-General—shall not be so construed as to require the enrolling or licensing of vessels not propelled by sail or by internal motive power of their own, whether navigating the internal waters of a State or the navigable waters of the United States, and not engaged in trade with contiguous foreign territory.

By that bill as thus reported, no flat-boat, no canal-boat, none of the immense coal-barges going up and down the Ohio River, the Tennessee River, the Mississippi River and all of its tributaries, would have to be licensed or enrolled. That has always been the construction of the law up to a few days ago; but by the bill as it has been amended and as it stands now on its passage before the Senate, all flatboats, all coal-barges, all canal-boats, must be enrolled and registered. It is true the bill goes on and provides that there shall be no charge for enrolling or registering——

Mr. McPHERSON. May I interrupt the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. HEREFORD. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. In that respect is not the bill better than the existing regulation under the opinion of the Attorney-General?

Mr. HEREFORD. Yes, sir; but it is not better than the bill reported by the committee. Consequently I am opposed to it as thus amended. The bill as reported by the committee is the one I desire to see passed. By that bill none of these flatboats, none of these immense coal-barges, floating all along the Ohio, the Tennessee, the Wabash, and all of those immense interior streams would have to be registered or enrolled. That has always been the construction of the law now for nearly a hundred years, and I cannot give my consent to any bill that will impose upon that interest the burden of having their flatboats enrolled and registered.

It may be said that it will not cost anything. That is all true; but why impose this burden upon them at all? Here is a tug or steamboat towing fifty or a hundred flatboats, covering acres of space, filled with coal, ready to start. As the law has always existed they can go whenever they please and come whenever they please, without let, or hinderance, or permission from anybody. But if the bill as thus amended becomes a law they have got to apply to the proper officer wherever the port of entry may be to have their vessels enrolled and registered, and before they are enrolled and registered what must be done? The officer whose duty it is will not enroll and register these vessels and give them a certificate that they are in good condition until he examines them. Then is he going to travel two hundred or three hundred or four hundred miles distant, and go where this fleet of boats may be to examine them at his own expense, or will all the boats have to be taken to him and then brought back again? All this is a great deal of unnecessary trouble, and such a trouble, such an annoyance as has never been inflicted upon these people from the foundation of the Government down.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator from West Virginia yield to me a moment?

Mr. HEREFORD. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. I wish the Senator to understand that when these boats are built they are then enrolled and licensed, and after that no further enrolling or licensing is necessary. The boat then goes on record at the Custom-House department. It has always been necessary that there should be some record of a boat. Before you can pass title there must be a name or there must be a number. I think that the objection urged by the Senator from West Virginia is altogether unnecessary. It seems to me that the amendment offered by the Senator from New York yesterday (although I did not at that time agree to it) is a very proper amendment, and it is better than the existing law in this respect, that it does not require any fees or any charge to be made on account of the enrolling or licensing of a boat. That they should be enrolled is very evident to my mind.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question. On the upper waters of the Cumberland, the Tennessee, and other western rivers, boats are built for the transportation of coal, or wheat, or cattle; and they are floated to New Orleans or Natchez or to some other point upon the Mississippi River, where the cargo is sold and the boat is broken up and destroyed. Now, why should we desire to have boats of that kind and character enrolled? How can they be enrolled? Perhaps there is not a customs officer within two or three or four hundred miles. It is obviously an impropriety, and evidently there is no necessity for the enrollment of that class of boats.

Mr. McPHERSON. Boats from the headwaters of the Hudson River come down to New York with a load and are there enrolled. There is no trouble whatever in enrolling them.

Mr. BAILEY. What is the necessity for enrolling them?

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not understand how you can pass the title of a boat unless you have some record somewhere that there is such a boat, that it has a number, or that it has a designation.

Mr. HEREFORD. How do you pass the title to a horse? Do you have him enrolled?

Mr. McPHERSON. A boat is a peculiar thing.

Mr. HEREFORD. Ever since this has been a government men have sold these flatboats ad libitum and never have had to ask permission of the General Government to sell their boats.

Mr. BECK. Does the Senator say that every coal-boat or barge is to be enrolled?

Mr. HEREFORD. The bill as amended requires every one of them to be enrolled and registered; thousands of them all over the country.

Mr. BECK. At the forks of the Kentucky River, for example, there are very large coal interests. There are hundreds of coal-boats that never go far enough down the river to get within one hundred and fifty miles of Louisville, that bring their cargoes to the county seats of the counties along the river, and the boat never gets any farther. If you are going to enroll all that class of boats, you are going to subject those people to an annoyance and the Government to a cost that will be enormous, because county after county on each side of the river receives coal and lumber from boats that never get any farther. They simply go backward and forward. There is no sort of chance of ever getting them within two hundred miles of a place where there is any custom-house officer. That will not do.

Mr. HEREFORD. I believe the bill is still open to amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read the third time, and without a reconsideration of that vote no amendment can now be received.

Mr. HEREFORD. I ask unanimous consent to offer this amendment——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote ordering the bill to be read a third time can be reconsidered.

Mr. HEREFORD. I enter that motion now for the purpose of offering an amendment. I propose to add:

Provided, That nothing herein contained, or in any statute, shall be construed to require the enrollment or licensing of coal-barges or flatboats on the interior rivers of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia moves to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. McPHERSON. I think that amendment to be contradictory to the construction of the bill as it has passed to a third reading. The bill requires the enrollment of boats and an enrollment of that particular kind, which is canal-boats, barges, &c. Now he offers a provision which simply excludes all the boats mentioned and named and considered in the body of the bill, from its provisions. The Senator from West Virginia will observe that there is no tax. I do not suppose any custom-house officer is going to hunt up barges or canal-boats for the purpose of forcing their enrollment.

Mr. HEREFORD. The Senator must know that it is the duty of the officer to not let these boats move until they are licensed or enrolled. The same law will apply to them that applies to sea vessels. There is a penalty. If there is no penalty as regards flatboats or coal-barges, then there is no penalty for a steamboat. The penalty is the same. I have no objection to the bill if thus amended; and all I ask is that this provision shall be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia moves to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to oppose that motion. There is either a misunderstanding about this, or the position of the Senator from West Virginia is very extraordinary. In 1793 an act was passed requiring boats to carry marine documents as they are called. That statute has stood ever since except that, in consequence of such a complaint as the Senator from West Virginia now makes, in 1874 it was altered, and the alteration is found in these words:

That the act to which this is a supplement shall not be so construed as to extend the provisions of the said act to canal-boats or boats employed on the internal waters or canals of any State; and all such boats, excepting only such as are provided with sails or propelling machinery of their own adapted to lake or coastwise navigation, and excepting such as are employed in trade with the Canadas, shall be exempt from the provisions of the said act, and from the payment of all customs and other fees under any act of Congress.

The other day came a report from the Committee on Commerce and came the Senator from New Jersey now in his seat [Mr. RANDOLPH] to confirm that report, saying that in instances which he gave, some of which he said occurred in the collection district of New York, large fees and detentions growing out of these fees were visited upon boats not exempt according to this act of 1874. So it was proposed by the bill that on all the waters of the United States an exemption should be made. The Senate has proceeded to perfect a bill by which all unrigged vessels are relieved of fees and relieved of everything except that they, to wit, the vessels not heretofore exempted altogether from enrollment, are still to carry marine documents for which no fee is to be charged.

Now, what does the Senator from West Virginia say to that? He says that is not enough, and he proposes that canal-boats and boats plying the internal waters having been relieved heretofore, so that they are not in question, may be liable still to some sort of inconvenience, and therefore he proposes that it shall be enacted in substance that unrigged boats need not carry any papers at all. The precise amendment which he has offered I did not catch the words of, but I did catch what he said in his argument.

Mr. President, one single objection when stated will I think convince every Senator that unless we are going to abandon the tariff laws of the country we cannot tolerate the idea that all unrigged vessels are to go without any sort of certification. The moment vessels ply on the St. Lawrence River and along the coast without documents, without enrollment, without license, without anything by which they can be tracked, you have opened a door to smuggling which I know of no way to close.

If this bill related simply to western waters, to rivers wholly in States or running between States, I am not prepared to say that you might not with some safety dispense with all licensing and enrolling; but when you consider that the bill as it now stands applies to the lakes, applies to the river Saint Lawrence, applies to all the coast round and round, seven thousand miles of coast on two seas, everybody I think must conclude that if you are going to dismiss the whole idea of vessels being registered anywhere, being licensed, being enrolled, being subject to any sort of scrutiny, you may as well give up the idea that you can enforce the customs revenue laws; you cannot do it. Therefore I say to the honorable Senator from West Virginia that the answer to his argument is that a great body of these boats have been already by name in 1874 exempted and that the few that may be caught with the inconvenience of simply handing in their names and taking a license had a great deal better submit to that inconvenience than to prostrate to the extent we should do the collection machinery of the country.

The Senator from Kentucky said if I understood him that boats plying in his State were never enrolled or licensed. Certainly not. The act of 1874 covers them. This bill does not change that at all. This bill simply adds an additional body of vessels to those already exempted. Then the Senator from West Virginia says he does not like it because it does not throw down the whole thing everywhere. I hope, therefore, that the vote on the third reading of the bill will not be reconsidered, but if a reconsideration is had I think it had better go back to the committee to consider it with care.

Mr. HEREFORD. I have no objection to its going back to the committee.

Mr. CONKLING. I think it goes far enough as it is, and I hope the Senate will stand by it.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, the difficulty about sending this bill back to the committee is that if the session should not be a long one we may not have the opportunity of considering it in committee, of reporting it to the Senate, and of passing it with the promptitude that the necessities of the case require. I have been absent for the last week or ten days. I now say as to my own constituency that this is a matter of very great importance, affecting an interest very large, and I am very anxious to secure relief. Inasmuch as there is no real opposition, as I understand, to the passage of a proper bill covering the ground, I hope that immediate action will be taken. If, therefore, the Senator from West Virginia can reconcile his views to ours upon the floor this morning without recommitting the bill, I shall be extremely obliged to him, and so will my colleague.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the vote will not be reconsidered. This measure in substance has been before the Committee on Commerce for the last sixteen or seventeen years. It is deemed a great hardship that canal-boats and other boats navigating our inland waters have been compelled to pay heavy charges for customs-dues. I believe the bill to be a wise one, and I hope it will not be reconsidered or recommitted to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. HEREFORD. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. HEREFORD. I ask for a division.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 13, noes 26.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is, shall the bill pass.

The bill was passed.

Mr. McPHERSON. I move to amend the title so as to make it read: "A bill relating to vessels not propelled by sail or internal motive power of their own."

Mr. FERRY. I suggest that the word "wholly" be put in the title also.

Mr. McPHERSON. Let the title be so amended as to read, "wholly by sail."

The title was so amended.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION.

Mr. LAMAR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1847) to provide for the appointment of a Mississippi River commission for the improvement of said river from the head of the passes, near its mouth, to its headwaters.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I object to the consideration of the bill.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before proceeding to the unfinished business, the Chair will lay before the Senate some bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. No. 2327) to authorize the renewal of a loan therein named by the joint stock company of the Young Men's Christian Association, of Washington; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1369) to relieve the churches of the District of Columbia, and to clear the title of the trustees to such property.

REFRIGERATING SHIP FOR DISINFECTING PURPOSES.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to offer a resolution calling for information from one of the Departments:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the Senate a copy of the report of the board of naval engineer officers appointed by him to assist the National Board of Health in the selection of a disinfecting apparatus provided for under a recent act of Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. That ought to be "directed" instead of "requested."

Mr. VOORHEES. Well, use the word "directed."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, sir. Let it be modified as suggested by the Senator from Iowa.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 243) to authorize the Secretary of War to release certain lands of the United States to the people of the State of New York, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

DISEASES OF DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

Mr. WHYTE. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives in regard to the printing of certain copies of the report of the Commissioner, No. 12, in regard to diseases of swine, to report it favorably and ask the immediate consideration of the resolution.

By unanimous consent, the resolution was considered and concurred in; as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring therein.) That there be printed 100,000 copies of Special Report No. 12 of the Commissioner of Agriculture, containing the reports of the examiners appointed to investigate the diseases of swine and contagious and infectious diseases incident to other classes of domesticated animals, of which 70,000 copies shall be printed for the use of members of the House, 25,000 for the use of members of the Senate, and 5,000 copies for the use of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 14th instant approved and signed an act (S. No. 678) relating to vinegar factories established and operated prior to March 1, 1879.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2175) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, if it be agreeable to the Senate I would suggest that the reading of the bill in extenso be dispensed with, inasmuch as there are very few changes made in the bill as compared with the bill which passed a few weeks since. I ask, therefore, that the general reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that we proceed to consider it by paragraphs, and I will point out the changes existing between this bill and the previous bill, and call attention to all the amendments which have been proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CONKLING. How many amendments are there from the committee?

Mr. WITHERS. Very few; only two or three, and they generally unimportant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Virginia proposes to consider the amendments as they are reached.

Mr. WITHERS. Yes, sir; to consider the bill by paragraphs, and I will call attention to the amendments as they are reached.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that course will be taken, and the Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. WITHERS. Before the Secretary proceeds to read the bill by sections for adoption, I will make a general statement as to the condition of the bill.

The amount appropriated by the bill as it passed the House of Representatives was $26,797,300. The amount added by the Senate Committee on Appropriations is $720. The total as it is reported to the Senate is $26,798,020. The total of the estimates for 1880 was $28,384,500. The bill as reported is less than the estimates by the sum of $1,586,480. The total appropriations for 1879 are $26,593,486. The bill as reported exceeds the appropriations for 1879 by the sum of $204,533.99.

The items of difference in this bill as compared with the appropriations for 1879 are as follows:

For the pay of the Army there is an increase of $699,112.82; for subsistence there is a decrease in the appropriation of $15,000; for quartermaster supplies, an increase of $250,000; for ordnance supplies, $10,000; repairing ordnance, dismounting guns, &c., $5,000; military post at Niobrara River, $50,000; military post in Montana, a reduction of $100,000, and in Dakota the same; for completing Medical and Surgical History of the War, a reduction of $12,883.85; illustrations, &c., for the same, $17,414.98; proving ground at Sandy Hook, a reduction of $5,000; site for powder depot, an increase of $50,000; for superintendents of national cemeteries, an increase of $720; for manufacture of arms at national armories, an increase of $100,000; for the Army and Indian transfer commission, a decrease of $10,000; making the increase in the aggregate $1,164,832.82, and the reduction $260,298.83, making a net increase of $904,533.99. Deducting the amount of deficiency appropriation for pay, &c., $700,000, it leaves a net increase of this bill over the appropriations for 1879 of $204,533.99.

As the reading progresses I will call attention to any amendments which have been adopted or any new matter which is contained in this bill that was not contained in the bill which has been vetoed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill to line 14.

Mr. ALLISON. Is the word "thereafter" at the beginning of line 14? It should be "hereafter." I think it must be a misprint.

Mr. WITHERS. It is evidently a typographical error. It should be "hereafter," so as to read "hereafter there shall be no more than twenty-five thousand enlisted men in the Army at any one time."

Mr. ALLISON. I move that correction in line 14.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that correction will be made. The Chair hears no objection.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to line 193.

The Committee on Appropriations proposed to amend by striking out "purchase" and inserting "purpose" in line 193.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is a mere verbal amendment, and if there be no objection it will be considered as made. The Chair hears none, and it is so made.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill to line 196:

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to receive, by donation of citizens or others, the title for any lots or tracts of land necessary to the proper location of the building or buildings hereinbefore provided for.

Mr. WITHERS. In pursuance of the promise I made, that I would call attention to any new matter, I will state that the provision from line 186 to line 196 is new matter, not in the last bill. It was introduced in the House and recommended by the Secretary of War and the General of the Army. It simply appropriates $30,000 of the previous appropriation, "or so much thereof as shall be necessary, in the discretion of the Secretary of War," to be "expended in the construction of a necessary storehouse and depot building at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska."

The reading of the bill was continued to line 215.

The Committee on Appropriations proposed to amend, in line 213, after the word "may," to strike out "charge" and insert "change."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is a mere verbal amendment, and will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. WITHERS. The provision from line 211 to line 215, is new matter which was added in the House for the first time, and it was done on the recommendation of the managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, without opposition in the House.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 216, before the word "superintendents," to strike out "seventy-one" and insert "seventy-two;" and in line 217 to insert after "thousand" the words "seven hundred and twenty;" so as to read:

For pay of seventy-two superintendents of the same, (national cemeteries,) $59,720.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill to line 288, the end of section 1.

Section 2 was read.

Section 3 was read.

The Committee on Appropriations proposed to amend section 3 by inserting after the word "shall," in line 2, the word "hereafter."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That when a vacancy occurs in the office of professor of the French language or in the office of professor of the Spanish language in the Military Academy, both these offices shall cease, and the remaining one of the two professors shall be professor of modern languages; and thereafter there shall be in the Military Academy one, and only one, professor of modern languages; and that section 1336 of the Revised Statutes be, and is hereby, amended by inserting, after the word "service," in the first line, the words "as professor."

Mr. CONKLING. Here perhaps as well as anywhere, I should like to inquire of the Senator having this bill in charge why is that provision touching a professor of foreign languages at West Point?

Mr. WITHERS. It is the same provision that was in the two last bills which passed the Senate, the object being evidently to consolidate two professorships into one, I presume partly in the interest of economy. We do not regard it as necessary to have two professors, one of French and one of Spanish, but one professor can discharge the duties of both chairs.

Mr. MAXEY. My attention was called to this matter a day or two ago by a very distinguished gentleman, a member of the House, who is a graduate of the academy, and my own thought has been brought to the subject, and I have never been able to see any reason for the provision here proposed. The creation of the professorship of Spanish was caused by the acquisition of the territory acquired from Mexico, making it quite important indeed that the officers stationed along the Mexican frontier should be acquainted with the Spanish language. Every officer who has ever been stationed there will bear witness to the importance of the knowledge of Spanish acquired by him at West Point. Of course everybody knows why the professorship of French was created a great many years ago at West Point. It was because a very large portion of the military works were originally published in the French, and in my day and time there I studied many of those works in the original French; they had not then been translated into English; and that language was quite important. I do not believe—and I give my testimony as one having some knowledge of West Point—I do not believe that it is in the power of any one man to be the professor of the French and also the professor of the Spanish language there. I think true economy to this Government, which is to properly educate its officers as their duties require, is that there should be a professorship of French and a professorship of Spanish. That is my deliberate judgment. I think a man should speak the French language thoroughly to be a competent French teacher; I think a man should speak the Spanish language thoroughly to be a competent Spanish professor. This is my judgment. I do not believe that it is policy to blend those two professorships into one. I believe that that is true here, because I believe it is the duty of the Government, so long as the Military Academy is kept up, to educate its officers.

Mr. WITHERS. I do not assent to the conclusion reached by the Senator from Texas. I would only say that the custom of having one professor for both the French and Spanish languages is one which is observed and followed in the majority of the literary institutions of this country; nor do I conceive that it is impossible to have a professor who may be thoroughly versed in both languages.

In the other House, I would state, this provision was inserted in the bill without objection from any one, so far as I am advised, and without any remonstrance or suggestion from the authorities at West Point that it would impair in any degree the efficiency of their instruction.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Virginia. Provisions of this sort commonly have their rise in some personal application. As they do in fact act, so they are intended usually to act upon the individuals concerned. That is enough for me to say about this, except that I want to ask the Senator if he knows the professors now at West Point, or whether so or not, is he able to say to the Senate that a man can be found proficient in Spanish who speaks it fluently as a cultured Spaniard does, and who at the same time is equally proficient and fluent and faultless in his pronunciation of French. If the Senator can say that in respect of West Point, and if he can say it to the faculties of the various colleges and the managers of the universities of the country, my impression is that he would be eagerly applied to for information and he would be giving information deemed of great value by those who have occasion to consider such questions.

Mr. WITHERS. I would simply state that the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate did not investigate that question. So far as I am individually concerned, I do know many professors who discharge, so far as I am apprised, satisfactorily the duties of these two professorships in other literary institutions.

Mr. CONKLING. Shall I understand the Senator to say that he knows men who speak both Spanish and French equally well and teach both of them?

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator must not understand me as stating any such proposition as that. I do not say whether they speak them equally well or not. Not being an expert myself in either language, it would be a very great piece of impertinence on my part to make such an assertion. I do know that there are professors of both languages united in the same person in other institutions.

In addition to that, I would call the attention of the Senator from New York to the fact that this does not depose any professor at present holding such a position at West Point. It is simply a provision which becomes operative whenever a vacancy shall occur in one or the other of these chairs.

Mr. MAXEY. I am opposed to any rash, sudden, ill-considered change in the management of the Military Academy at West Point. My deliberate judgment is that these changes are injurious to the academy, and of consequence injurious to the service. No change there should be made without the most deliberate investigation and a manifest propriety in the change proposed. Take the case, for instance, which was mentioned by the Senator from Virginia, that in many colleges the professorships of French and of Spanish are blended in one chair, and therefore he deduces the conclusion that it might as well be so at West Point. But is that true? What other institution in the United States demands of its graduates that when they do graduate they shall put into practical exercise their knowledge of the Spanish language as the graduates of West Point are required to do when they go upon the Mexican frontier? So that his reasoning is a non sequitur. So much for that.

The point which is made by the Senator from New York in my judgment is well taken. It is a query that I imagine not many will be able to answer off-hand whether you can find at West Point one man to fill these two positions. I bring this question right down to the point at issue; it is not whether some man can be found in the United States who can speak both the French and the Spanish; but under the wording of this section the survivor, whether he be the Spanish professor or the French professor, is to be the professor of both chairs. Both chairs are to be blended.

The proper question therefore is, does the Spanish professor at West Point speak the French language as well as the Spanish, or does the French professor speak the Spanish language at all? Suppose that the French professor should become the survivor and occupy both the Spanish and French chairs, the query arises does he speak the Spanish language, and unless he does I ask my friend to the right, who has had some experience there as well as myself, the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] if he does not himself speak the language like a native is he qualified to teach others to speak that language, and especially men who are to become officers of the Army and who are to go on the frontier there to speak the language themselves practically?

I give this as a point. We all know something about the Mexicans. Suppose an officer on the frontier has important business with people in Mexico, and suppose he knows nothing whatever about the Spanish language, what is the result? He is forced to fall back on an interpreter, and that interpreter may be entirely incorrect. It will not do. The cadets at West Point should be taught the Spanish language themselves, they should have it taught by a competent professor, and no man can teach that which he does not know.

It does seem to me that anything which changes the curriculum or the professorships at West Point should go to the Military Committee and be thoroughly investigated, and every means of information which would throw light on the subject should be traced out. I do not like to see a change at that old institution, established in the early portion of this century, made suddenly on an appropriation bill.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, if it is in order to do so at this time, I move to strike out the fourth section from the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the Committee on Appropriations have not yet been acted on.

Mr. MAXEY. I intended to make that motion at the proper time.

Mr. WITHERS. So far from this being an ill-considered change, I scarcely think the criticism is applicable, inasmuch as this identical section, without change of a letter or word, has twice passed the Senate and twice passed the House without any objection from any of the authorities at West Point or any other person interested, so far as I am apprised.

So far as I am concerned I have no feeling about this matter whatever. I would be perfectly satisfied to have the Committee on Military Affairs consider the question and make any report on the subject they desired. They seem very sensitive about trenching on their prerogative. I have no such design or desire; but finding the provision in the bill as it came from the House, no serious objection being urged against its incorporation into the bill, the Committee on Appropriations have adopted it without any dissent, so far as I am advised.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I think the reason why objections have not come to the committee, or at least one reason, is the understanding that these bills were perfected in caucus, and were to go through without any change.

Mr. WITHERS. Oh, no; that is a mistake. Certainly it was a very erroneous assumption if anybody supposed so.

Mr. CARPENTER. People are just as likely to be controlled by erroneous impressions as by sound ones.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The bill has passed both Houses twice, and, so far as my knowledge goes, it never was considered in caucus either in the previous Congress or this; nor was such a thing thought of.

Mr. CARPENTER. That simply shows that the gentlemen who would otherwise have made objections were mistaken about the fact; yet the mistake controlled their conduct. I know that this provision is not acceptable to men who have had experience in this matter, and who would have made objection but for the supposition, erroneous I am informed, on this subject, which I have stated. I believe that every officer of the Army would say that this provision ought to go out of this bill. I do not care to repeat the argument so well made by the Senator from Texas and the Senator from New York, and I concur with every word they have uttered on this subject. The teacher of Spanish at West Point should be a Spaniard, and the teacher of French should be a Frenchman.

Mr. BLAINE. I have not a word of discussion on this matter, but I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations what his remark was. I did not quite catch it as to this provision having twice passed Congress.

Mr. WITHERS. The same provision was in the bill which passed at the last session of the last Congress. It was also in the bill which has recently been vetoed.

Mr. BLAINE. What I want further to know is——

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator himself was a member of both the Appropriations Committee which reported it in the last Congress and of the conference committee.

Mr. BLAINE. Why does this provision find its way into the Army appropriation bill when it belongs pre-eminently to the West Point Military Academy appropriation bill?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My friend will recollect that he had charge of this bill in the last Congress and passed the bill through the Senate, and he was on the conference committee upon it. He had charge of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Not charge of originating this provision; and those bills came so quickly to a disagreement on account of other things as to which there was no attempt at or no possibility of an adjustment, that we did not (as my friend in charge of this bill now knows) go over the other points which we might have differed upon. This section certainly ought to be dropped out of this bill.

Mr. WITHERS. I will state as an additional reason why it should remain in that it is carrying out simply a principle which prevails at the Naval Academy, where one professor discharges the duties of professor of both languages without any complaint whatever, so far as I have heard.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I merely desire to remark that matters of this character, it does seem to me, ought to have an examination by some other committee as well as the Committee on Appropriations. I think that it pertains to the duties of the Military Committee more than to those of the Appropriations Committee.

I hope I may be pardoned for a moment in stating as briefly as I can something in reference to the history of this section, for I think I know as much about it perhaps as any Senator on this floor.

This attempt has been made for years in the Congress of the United States. I do not think it originated at West Point. I do not care about giving my impressions as to where it did originate; but I may be pardoned for saying that at the suggestion of a gentleman who does not now occupy the position of Secretary of War this attempt was made several Congresses ago. I hope I may be further pardoned in saying that the attempt was to get rid of one of these professors—the professor of the Spanish language. The question was examined by the Military Committee in the House when I was a member of the House, and in the Senate when I was the chairman of that committee, and the committees unanimously agreed that this change ought not to be adopted, and when it was proposed by the Appropriations Committee it was stricken out in the Senate on that account. It was not only examined by the Committee on Military Affairs, but we sent for Army officers and examined them before the committee in reference to the necessity of these professors. The object then was to get rid of the professor of Spanish. There was no question then about the Spanish language being taught, but it was about the person himself. An attempt was made to retire him by act of Congress, then afterward to put both chairs together, as here, for the purpose (because he is in the senior) of having him retired. He is a man who is just as competent, and will be if he has health for years to come, to teach this branch in the Academy as anybody can be. Then it was examined and agreed unanimously by the Military Committee that it ought not to be done.

After that result, after the Senate refused to adopt the proposition, it passed on for some few sessions of Congress, and again was inserted in the Army appropriation bill, as I understand, in the last Congress. It only proves that it requires but a short time for us to forget facts, but a short time for us to forget examinations that have been had for the purpose of giving light to the Congress of the United States on subjects before them for consideration.

In connection with what the Senator from Texas has said in reference to the Spanish language, I may be allowed to say that I think the Spanish language is more important for the Army of the United States to understand than any except our own language, for the reason that our border is with a Spanish people. That language is spoken right where the principal portion of our Army is stationed. My own experience is very slight; I do not speak the Spanish language well, but I do speak it so as to be understood, and so that I can understand it when spoken; and I know from the little time I served with the Army on the borders of Mexico that my knowledge of it was of great value to me; and every officer of the Army will state to-day that it is of more value to our Army than any other language except our own.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Conceding all the Senator says to be true, the question is, could not the Spanish and French languages be taught by one professor as well as by having one professor for each?

Mr. LOGAN. I say emphatically no. I do not claim my understanding to be such that my opinion would be as good as that of persons thoroughly educated in those languages; but I am satisfied from the little knowledge I have of them that you cannot find a person who can read, write, and speak both of those languages as correctly as a Spaniard himself does his own and a Frenchman his. I am thoroughly satisfied of that. If you can find such a man he is an exception to the rule. We have these two professors at West Point, and have had for years; and there is no reason, at least it strikes me there is none, why one professorship should be abolished. I do not see why it is that there is such a persistent effort made every Congress to abolish one of these professorships. I cannot understand it unless it be that there is something outside of that which would benefit the Academy itself. It must be something beside that. I do not wish to state it or to say so, for perhaps I have no authority for saying it, but I have good reason to suspect that that is true; not that the committee propose that, but it originated in something outside of a desire to benefit the Academy or to be an advantage to the educational interests of the Army or the cadets at West Point.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to answer for him the question asked by the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes.

Mr. MAXEY. The classes which study the French and Spanish are divided into sections. Those sections number from 8 to 10. It would be a physical impossibility for one man to go through all those sections and even see that the assistant professors do their duty. He could not go through each section once in two weeks.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is more conversant with the management of the Academy than I am, and doubtless his statement is correct. I can see very readily from what he says the necessity for exactly the professors there are now under the law; and I do think as long as we retain West Point as a military academy—and I have no reason for thinking it will not be retained—we ought to keep it on the basis it has shown itself to be of value to the country, and not attempt to restrict it in this or any other particular so far as educational facilities are concerned.

I have no desire, so far as this part of the bill is concerned, to send it back to the House for any purpose of that kind; but what I say, I say because I have the objection and feel it strongly against this section of the bill, and I do hope that the Senate will consider this bill now before it for the purpose not of any little advantage that may arise to one side or the other, but for the purpose of making the best bill they can out of it, so as to have it arranged that we shall not find that it will be subject to criticism, and this certainly would be. I do not believe you can find an officer in the Army to-day, if you will ask him whether or not the two professors (leaving out of view the personnel of the persons) should be retained, who will not say that they ought to be and that they are absolutely necessary. Such is the universal judgment of the officers of the Army.

Mr. ALLISON. If any Senator will make a motion to strike out this fourth section I shall vote for it.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is not in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I know. But I wish to say a word or two in reply to the Senator from Illinois and also the Senator from Wisconsin with reference to the method by which this section got into the bill; and I call the attention of the honorable Senator from Texas also to what I am about to say, because he seems to regard this as an innovation, as a new thing that has been jumped into this bill. This is one of the little relics of army organization that has been handed down to us from the Military Committee. I have here the grand bill which was incubated during the last vacation by the select committee of both Houses known, I believe, as the Burnside bill, consisting of seven or eight hundred sections, by which, having the aid of the highest military officers in the Army, and according to rumor having the special aid of the major-general who commands at West Point to-day, this military commission or committee reorganized the Army not only, but reorganized West Point, and in doing so they provided not for a professor of Spanish and a professor of French as has been the law for many years, but they provided for a single professor of modern languages.

When that bill failed to accomplish its purpose, owing to the brief session, we being unable to read the bill through carefully, and it was finally abandoned, the House Military Committee, the colleagues of my friend from Texas, on the other side, in the last Army appropriation bill put on so much of this great bill as would reorganize the Army substantially; and among the sections of that bill, if I remember aright—I may be mistaken now as to the details—was this section reorganizing the professorships of French and Spanish at West Point. We struck out, I believe, in the Senate the whole of that Army reorganization bill; possibly we may have retained this section. If we did, we did it under the eye of the Committee on Military Affairs, and that committee is very vigilant and active and energetic with reference to matters pertaining to military affairs.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me a moment?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. MAXEY. That bill, the Burnside bill, never was in the hands of the Military Committee. The Military Committee tried to get it there, but the Committee on Appropriations told them they did not have time to let them have it. That is the fact about it. I said to the Senate before that I personally had examined that bill carefully and it could be made a good bill, but that it would require severe and heavy amendment and cutting up. If that bill had come before us with that clause in it, I should have moved to amend it.

Mr. ALLISON. I was only calling attention to the fact that, so far from its being a new question thrust in here by the Appropriations Committee, it is a provision which we inherited in the Appropriations Committee from the joint military committee of last year.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me I will state the fact that the proposition has been before Congress for years.

Mr. BLAINE. For fifteen years.

Mr. LOGAN. It has been here for years I know, because I was chairman of the Military Committee in the House for years, and so I was of the Senate Committee, and it was before our committee nearly every Congress since I have been in Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. LOGAN. Finally it found its way into the Committee on Appropriations, because the Military Committee always opposed it.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly; but I was endeavoring to explain to the Senator from Illinois that after he left the committee which he presided over so ably, this same project fell into the hands of a joint select committee especially created by Congress, which joint select committee recommended that these professorships be consolidated.

Mr. LOGAN. That was a commission.

Mr. ALLISON. It was a committee of both Houses. I am only endeavoring to excuse the Appropriations Committee for allowing a section or two of that bill to remain. I never examined it carefully until this particular session, because I thought it was understood it was to remain; but now I find that the remaining professor, the surviving professor, is to be the professor of both languages. That certainly ought not to be.

Mr. MAXEY. Can the Senator from Iowa state whether the surviving professor will be able to teach both the French and Spanish languages?

Mr. ALLISON. That is just what I am about to say. I certainly think that if the French professor at West Point should die first it would be rather awkward for the Spanish professor at West Point to teach French.

Mr. MAXEY. I only ask the question, because the survivor is to teach both languages, to know whether both those gentlemen speak French and Spanish.

Mr. ALLISON. I am endeavoring to help my friend. I think the provision ought to go out.

Mr. BLAINE. If my friend will permit an interruption for a moment, I want to state the situation there, for I think I have been familiar with it for eighteen years. How much longer the difficulty dates back I do not know; but I was on the Board of Visitors eighteen years ago this summer. My honorable friend from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] was on the same board and can substantiate all I am about to say. This trouble then existed at West Point. Some wanted to get rid, there was no doubt of it, of the Spanish professor. This is the final form in which that particular end is sought, and this awkwardness comes out of it, that the professor of French to-day is an American. I do not know but that he is a very good professor of French, but I do not have as much faith in an American professor of French, especially in teaching the art of speaking the tongue, which is what the officers desire to a large extent, as if he were a native Frenchman. If they get this man out of the way, you will then have a professor of modern languages trying to teach the art of speaking French and Spanish, neither of which is his vernacular, and I think it is a very awkward way of getting out of the difficulty.

I want to say further that there is not a college in the United States that has had a liberal endowment that, if it were providing for the teaching of French and Spanish, would not have a separate professor, and in each case it would have a professor to whom the tongue was native, in order that he might impart the conversational use of the tongue with all its idiomatic troubles and difficulties. If we pass this proposed law, this is going to leave it in the worst possible way. We not only dispense with the native Spaniard who is teaching Spanish, but we leave both French and Spanish to be taught by one who speaks them with the absolute accuracy that a native of New England handles both those tongues.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Maine has stated much better than I could state the reasons for striking out this section. I think the section ought to go out.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course it ought.

Mr. ALLISON. As I said in the beginning, I think it ought to go out for two reasons: first, because it is defective in this, that it makes the surviving professor the professor of both languages; and as we do know, in neither case would the surviving professor be fit to teach both languages. That is one reason why the section should go out; but it should go out for another reason: because it undertakes in a sliding scale of a way to reduce the pay of some of these professors, which I do not think ought to be done. Inasmuch as the Military Committee seems to be opposed to it, and inasmuch as the language must be perfected before it can be made applicable to the present situation at West Point, it seems to me the section had better be stricken out, and, therefore, I shall vote for striking it out.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I expect to vote to strike out this section, and I desire to say a word in explanation of my vote. I shall so vote with the most perfect respect for the Committee on Appropriations. I desire no inference drawn from my vote by the committee that it is a reflection upon their management or conduct of this bill. I have no doubt that this section has been considered and put in here as properly as any other section of the bill. I am invited to my conclusion by one or two considerations that I may as well state.

In the first place, while one may write a foreign language, I do not believe that any person ever speaks two living languages with accuracy. You may take the best educated foreigners who come to our shores, men who have adorned positions in this body, and their pronunciation of our language is never entirely correct. Men have often taught with success in colleges both the dead languages, Latin and Greek, one as well as the other; but as to two living languages in constant use, I know of no one person having a perfect knowledge of both. I have no doubt professors in our colleges have taught two different living languages, but they have taught them only indifferently well, I imagine.

There is another reason, however, that will govern my vote. I believe that this section is aimed to accomplish an object in an indirect and covert manner. I know enough to be satisfied that such is the fact. If a change is desired upon this point, it ought to be made in an open-handed, frank manner.

As the Senator from Texas, with his large military experience, and he graduated at that institution, has said, this is one of the features of that college that has come down from its foundation. It has been sanctioned by the lapse of time, by many years, and it ought not to be changed in this indirect and to some extent surreptitious manner. I think there is a personal object covered up in this section, and whether the object is a right one or a wrong one, the mode pursued to accomplish that object certainly does not meet my approval. I think we had better leave the institution upon these two questions as it is until, if it becomes necessary, the point may be investigated fairly and considered upon its own merits.

I desired to say this much to explain the vote that I shall give to strike this section from the bill.

Mr. WINDOM. I see that the bill has been reported several days. I desire to ask the Senator from Virginia whether he has heard any objection to this provision, either from the War Department or from the Military Academy at West Point?

Mr. WITHERS. None whatever. No syllable or word of objection has ever been laid before the committee, or before any member of it so far as I know—certainly not presented to me.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator from Minnesota allow me to ask him if there is not at present an order in force in the War Department which prohibits any officer or person in the military department of the Government from making any application to Congress or to interfere in any way to influence legislation? That is possibly an explanation of the fact that no objection has come from the War Department or the Military Academy.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not know how that order may be, but I know we do have a great many communications from the War Department on other subjects.

Mr. WITHERS. I have suggestions here in my hand in favor of the provision.

Mr. WINDOM. Even if such an order exists prohibiting direct communication by Army officers to Congress, it is very easy for them to communicate to the War Department and for the War Department to communicate to the Committee on Appropriations, as I have had occasion to know has been done heretofore.

Mr. VOORHEES. If the Senator from Minnesota will allow me a moment, I will state that while nobody has committed an infraction of the order which is mentioned by the Senator from Wisconsin in communicating with me, yet I have heard ample and powerful objections to this species of legislation, and this particular proposed act of legislation.

Mr. WINDOM. From anybody not directly interested in the professorships?

Mr. VOORHEES. I presume everybody is interested in having a proper course of instruction there.

Mr. WITHERS. Directly?

Mr. WINDOM. Although I have spent some little time within the last two weeks at West Point on the Board of Visitors, I have failed thus far to hear of any protests against this action on the part of the House of Representatives from persons not directly interested in these professorships. I will say further to the Senate that this very provision was discussed by the Board of Visitors at considerable length while they were at West Point, and in view of the circumstances and in immediate connection with the facts, and that board declined to make any recommendation to change the action of the House.

Mr. BLAINE. Did not the board decline to take any action at all on the subject?

Mr. WINDOM. It did.

Mr. BLAINE. Now, I think my honorable friend is giving, unintentionally of course, an entirely wrong inference. I have heard a little from West Point myself, and I heard that the same influence which got this section in the Army reorganization bill tried very hard to get the Board of Visitors to recommend that the action of the House be adopted, and they got nothing at all out of the board.

Mr. VOORHEES. I heard the same.

Mr. WINDOM. I heard it said that those directly interested in the professorships tried hard to get the board to recommend non-concurrence with the action of the House and that the board would not do it. I know that a number of the members of the board, myself among the rest, after investigating the matter as fully as we could at West Point, came to the conclusion that it was the best thing to do.

Mr. CONKLING. That this section should stand?

Mr. WINDOM. That this section should stand. Perhaps it ought to be modified in one respect, and I am going to make that motion; but the idea was that these professorships should be consolidated and that one professorship of modern languages should take their place. I think the words "and the remaining one of the two professors shall be professor of modern languages" should be stricken out; but I think it proper there should be but one professor of modern languages. While I am not authorized to speak for any one there, I am satisfied that if you gave them that power at the academy they would so decide; and I am satisfied if we get a communication from the War Department at all upon the subject it will not be adverse to that idea.

Mr. MAXEY. I am satisfied that if the object designed to be accomplished by this section is accomplished and the two professorships are blended, it will not be one year from the time that is done until application is made from the academy to separate the professorships and have two chairs as now.

Mr. BLAINE. If my friend from Minnesota will permit another question, why did not the board, if that was so universally the feeling, make the recommendation? That was the very purpose for which they assembled there. The very object of their coming together there was to make recommendations touching the government of the academy and its general welfare in every direction. They had jurisdiction as wide as every interest connected with it; and we do not get one word from them.

Mr. WINDOM. I did not state that it was the unanimous opinion of the board. I do not know whether it was or not. I know it was the opinion of several members of the board so far as I heard it expressed. They did not feel it to be their duty to interfere with a bill now on its passage before Congress, but I believe the prevailing sentiment is at West Point, and it is my own opinion, that the professorship of Spanish is a very unimportant professorship in that institution. I believe there should be but one professorship of modern languages; and therefore I shall vote to sustain the action of the House of Representatives.

Furthermore, I think if there had been any serious objection to this provision, as I stated in the outset, we should have heard from some person interested in the general management of the Academy.

That is all I desire to say about it. I have no interest in the matter except I want to move, if the Senator from Virginia does not object, to strike out the words I indicated a few moments ago.

Mr. WITHERS. We had better proceed, with the consent of the Senate, to consider the other sections of the bill and the amendments offered by the Committee on Appropriations first, and when we come back to this section the Senator from Minnesota can offer his amendment, to which I see now no objection, in view especially of the declaration made by the Senator from Maine, the Senator from Illinois, and others, because their criticism, the only one which struck me as possessing any particular force, would be fully met by a motion to strike out the words "and the remaining one of the two professors shall be professor of modern languages." That would entirely obviate the criticism made by both the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Illinois on that branch of the subject. Therefore I see no objection to those words being stricken out. But if the Senators have expressed their views upon the subject sufficiently, I think we had better go on and consider the other amendments which have been reported by the committee first, and then go back and consider a motion either to strike out the whole section or to amend in the manner indicated by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, I do not rise in defense of the bill for the reorganization of the Army, to which my friend from Iowa referred. There is not time enough left in this session for that purpose, but I want to state to him that he is mistaken in saying that the Military Committee of the Senate has recommended this clause to be stricken from that bill. I believe that an American, well instructed in all the modern languages, is much better fitted to teach a cadet French and Spanish for military purposes than a native of those countries. The object in teaching cadets at West Point these languages is to make them entirely familiar with and able to consult all the military literature of modern nations in those languages. They will generally acquire a sufficient facility in speaking the languages to make themselves well understood.

If the occasion to go into Mexico should occur again, the officers of the Army would learn more Spanish in sixty days than they will have learned from the professors in the whole course at West Point. It is the general knowledge of the language that these officers want, and that they get better from well-instructed Americans than from native Frenchmen or native Spaniards. Each instructor of French or Spanish at West Point should be conversant with both languages; and there is no reason in my opinion why one professor could not superintend the teaching of the two languages.

I want to say another thing: the professors of these languages do not have the immediate charge of all the sections; they must have assistants. They cannot take care of more than one or two sections at most in each class, so that they have to rely upon their assistants, and some of those can very well be native-born Spaniards and Frenchmen.

Mr. WITHERS. I suggest that the reading of the bill be continued, and that the Senate act upon the other amendments offered by the committee.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out section 5 in the following words:

SEC. 5. That each member of the graduating classes of the Military Academy, of 1879 and 1880, after graduation, may elect, with the assent of the Secretary of War, to receive the gross sum of $750 and mileage to his place of residence; and the acceptance of this gross sum shall render him ineligible to appointment in the Army, except in the event of war, until two years after his graduation; and the amount required to defray the expenditure herein provided for shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. WITHERS. That amendment was proposed by the Committee on Appropriations because of a change in the status of the Army as regards vacancies. At the time the section was inserted it was stated, I believe, that the vacancies in the Army were not sufficient to supply the graduating class of West Point with positions; that there was always a considerable deficiency in positions, and that graduates therefore had to be put on as supernumeraries for a greater or less time in the Army rolls without assignment to command. That condition of things no longer exists. The removal of the restriction against promotions in the Army of course permits by the promotions a larger number of vacancies to occur in the position of second lieutenant; and now the number of graduates at the Military Academy for the present year will not suffice to fill the vacancies that have been created in the Army.

Mr. LOGAN. What is the necessity for this section, then?

Mr. WITHERS. None whatever. We amend by striking out the section.

Mr. LOGAN. That is right.

Mr. WITHERS. I have here a communication addressed to Hon. WILLIAM WINDOM, a member of the committee and one of the Board of Visitors, which will explain itself more fully:

SIR: In answer to your telegram of the 14th instant, I inclose herewith a statement showing the number of vacancies of second lieutenant which have occurred in the Army each year since July 1, 1873, and the number of graduates of the Military Academy each year since and including 1874.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

Accompanying it is a list showing the number of vacancies in the grade of second lieutenant of the Army caused by casualties, &c., in each year since July, 1873, together with the number of cadets graduated from the United States Military Academy during the same period. The number of vacancies in 1874 was 65, and the number of graduates 41; in 1875 there were 82 vacancies and 43 graduates; in 1876 there were 63 vacancies and 48 graduates; in 1877 the vacancies were 62, the graduates 76; in 1878 the vacancies were 91, the graduates 43; in 1879 the vacancies were 87, the graduates 66; which by aggregation shows that there have been 450 vacancies in that series of years and 317 graduates, leaving 133 vacancies more than could be supplied by the graduating class at West Point.

These, briefly, are the reasons which prompted the committee to amend the bill by striking out the section providing for the retiring of graduating members of the class.

Mr. MAXEY. I concur fully with the Committee on Appropriations in the propriety of striking out this section. Yesterday, believing that the section was unwise, I went myself to the War Department and I received a telegram from the Secretary of War which I ask to have read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 16, 1879.

To Hon. SAMUEL B. MAXEY,
United States Senate:

There are about ninety vacancies of second lieutenants and several candidates from non-commissioned officers that have been examined. The graduating class at the Military Academy numbers sixty-six.

GEO. W. McCRARY,
Secretary of War.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senate will see that there are nearly ninety vacancies in the rank of second lieutenant; there are only sixty-six graduates, so that it would be the height of folly to pay a graduate $750 when his service is needed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BOOTH in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk read section 6 of the bill.

Mr. WITHERS. There is a verbal amendment required by striking out "6" and inserting "5" as the number rendered necessary by striking out the previous section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That modification will be made.

Mr. WITHERS. As the provision just read, now the fifth section of the bill, which is substituted in lieu of the provision known as the sixth section of the vetoed bill, will probably give rise to some discussion, I ask that it be passed over and considered hereafter. We can recur to it when we conclude the consideration of the remaining amendments.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand the Senator has requested that course as the customary precedence in the consideration of the amendments of the committee as to all the bill?

Mr. WITHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. That covers his suggestion about this section.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to add to the bill:

SEC. 8. That the proviso to section 1151 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. WITHERS. That amendment is offered on the recommendation of the Secretary of War and the Adjutant-General of the Army, and it is rendered necessary by the provisions of section 1151. I ask that a communication from the Chief of the Engineer Corps to the Secretary of War and to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, which I send to the desk, be read in connection with this amendment.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, June 12, 1879.

DEAR SIR: I perceive that the whole of section 9, Army appropriation bill, was stricken out yesterday in the House. That section contains the provision that has been earnestly recommended by myself to the Secretary of War and by him to Congress as essential to the efficient administration of the Engineer department. The absence of such a provision is besides embarrassing to myself and to other officers of engineers. That provision was as follows:

"Provided, That nothing shall prevent the appointment of a chief of engineers, with the rank of brigadier-general, when a vacancy shall occur."

I send you herewith a copy of my letter to the Secretary of War explaining in part the difficulty of the case.

To this I may add that in the event of a vacancy occurring no appointment of acting chief of engineers can be made for a longer period than ten days.

May I beg of you to have the provision again inserted in the bill in such form as you may prefer?

Very truly, yours,

A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers, &c.

Hon. HENRY G. DAVIS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, Senate.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, D. C., December 6, 1878.

SIR: Under the law as it now stands, if the office of the Chief of Engineers of the Army should become vacant no appointment to fill that vacancy could be made, although the law requires that there shall be a chief of engineers, that his rank shall be that of brigadier-general, and that he shall do certain acts. (See section 1151 and others, Revised Statutes.)

This prohibitory provision should be repealed. It came to be enacted in this way:

Section 6 of the act making appropriation for the support of the Army, 3d March, 1869, chapter 124, volume 15, page 318, prohibited promotion and new appointments in the engineers, the ordnance, and in all staff departments.

The act of 10th June, 1872, chapter 426, volume 17, page 382, repealed that prohibition so far as it affected the Corps of Engineers, provided that no promotion should be made in that corps beyond the grade of colonel.

I believe that this single prohibition was retained for reasons which no longer exist.

It would be unjust and injurious to the engineer service to retain this provision any longer.

All the provisions of section 6 of the act of the 3d March, 1869, prohibiting promotions and new appointments in the ordnance and in the staff departments have been repealed since 1872, and the only remaining provision of that section is the one prohibiting promotion in the Corps of Engineers above the rank of colonel. This remaining provision should also be repealed.

I have added the project of a bill for the purpose, which also includes the removal of the prohibition of promotion enacted in the last Army appropriation bill, so far as it may apply to the Chief of Engineers.

Should these views meet your approval, I beg leave to ask that the subject be brought to the attention of Congress with your favorable recommendation.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers.

Hon. GEORGE W. McCRARY,
Secretary of War.

Mr. MAXEY. The proviso to section 1151 is in these words:

Provided, That no promotion shall be made to fill any vacancy in said corps above the rank of colonel.

That proviso is taken from the third section of the act of March 3, 1869. The act of July 28, 1866, confers upon the Chief of Engineers the rank of brigadier-general. The same act makes the promotion to the rank of brigadier-general go by selection. The act of March 3, 1869, prohibited promotions in the Corps of Engineers above the rank of colonel. Then the act of June 10, 1872, found in volume 17, page 382, Statutes at Large, cuts loose all the promotions in the Engineer Corps except the proviso, which is the exact proviso in the Revised Statutes:

Provided, That no promotion shall be made to fill any vacancy in said corps—

That is, the Corps of Engineers—

above the rank of colonel.

This question was presented to the Military Committee at the last session of Congress, and on the 4th of February, 1879, as a member of the committee, I was instructed by it to report a bill providing for filling vacancies in the office of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army. That bill was reported back by the committee unanimously, and I will read the recommendation and conclusion of their report, which is all that it is necessary to read now:

An examination of these communications—

The communications from the Secretary of War and from the Chief of Engineers—

An examination of these communications will show that the defect in the law to which they direct attention exists, and the remedy suggested is in the opinion of the committee proper.

The remedy is the precise remedy now proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

Wherefore the committee report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

The only reason why the bill was not acted on by the Senate at the last session was the want of time. The amendment now proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, I can state to the Senate, had the full indorsement at the last session of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CARPENTER. At the proper time I shall move to amend section 8 so as to read:

That all laws which forbid promotions in the Army are hereby repealed.

The whole subject is considerably mixed at present.

Mr. WITHERS. What amendment does the Senator notify the Senate of his purpose to move?

Mr. CARPENTER. I shall move to amend the bill by striking out the eighth section and inserting:

That all laws which forbid promotions in the Army are hereby repealed.

Mr. WITHERS. That might not meet the particular case under consideration.

Mr. CARPENTER. It certainly would meet every case. It is broader than section 8 as it is, and in the same direction. Section 8 reads:

That the proviso of section 1151 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Has the Senator that proviso before him?

Mr. WITHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will he read it?

Mr. WITHERS. The proviso reads as follows:

Provided, That no promotion shall be made to fill any vacancy in said corps above the rank of colonel.

Referring to the Corps of Engineers.

Mr. CARPENTER. This certainly covers that; it is broader:

That all laws which forbid promotions in the Army are hereby repealed.

The Senate will recollect the fact that several provisions were inserted in the act which provided for a commission to remodel the Army, and, as the lawyers thought, a great many of them forbade all promotions; but the Senate has promoted notwithstanding; and does not respect to the statute require that the Senate, after having confirmed the promotions in violation of the statute, should at least repeal the statute?

Mr. WITHERS. The Senate Committee on Appropriations were of opinion that the action of the House might properly be deferred to striking out the ninth section of the bill, which prohibited promotions except in this special case, which is a matter of special enactment.

Mr. CARPENTER. If that be so, there can be no earthly objection to this amendment. There is no objection to it if the Senator's position is sound. I offer the following amendment instead of the one I suggested; add to the section as it stands:

And provided further, That all laws which forbid promotions in the Army are hereby repealed.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Wisconsin seeks to repeal the statute about which he made a report some time ago, I think he had better provide for it specifically.

Mr. CARPENTER. I have provided for it generally.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it had better be provided for specifically.

Mr. CARPENTER. The Senate has provided for it specifically.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator can point out any other statute which ought to be repealed we can also repeal that; but there may be some sections of the Revised Statutes on this subject that ought not to be repealed. I am not quite clear about it.

Mr. MAXEY. I can see perfectly well what the Senator from Wisconsin is after, and I thoroughly agree with him. My construction of the eleventh section of the act of 1878 was that promotions could not go on. The Senate decided otherwise, to let promotions go on. I do not know that that decision changed the minds of any of us who voted the other way, the Senator from Wisconsin and myself among the rest. I believe the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin proposes a decent respect to the statutes as they stand, and therefore I suggest, in order to have no doubt about the engineer matter, because that is a special law, to leave that part of the section as it is and then add this as a proviso.

Mr. CARPENTER. I accept that suggestion, and move to amend the section by adding:

And provided further, That all laws which forbid promotions in the Army are hereby repealed.

Mr. WITHERS. I see no objection to it myself. It takes rather a broader scope, however, than the committee proposed.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no objection to it personally. If it is the intention to repeal all laws which forbid promotions in the Army, I am perfectly willing to have it done.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask the Senator from Iowa if he is aware of any existing provision in the laws with regard to promotions in the Army except the one in the act of 1878 and that specially repealed by our amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know of any.

Mr. WITHERS. The attention of the committee was directed specifically to repealing this provision for the purpose of securing the advantages described by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] moves to amend the amendment of the committee.

Mr. EATON. The Senator from Wisconsin has directed his attention to this matter, and I want to know from him what statutes he proposes to repeal?

Mr. CARPENTER. There are two or three sections standing in the statutes prohibiting promotions which have been made, and which, in my opinion, will lead to interminable difficulty for the next twenty years in this Senate. When you interfere with the promotions that are regulated and fixed by law, I have seen that such interferences were always followed by contests and struggles. These sections have been disregarded by the Senate. They declared in plain terms that promotions should not be made; but the Senate has made them. Now, if you repeal the statute, you put the promotions which have been made out of all question. The promotions were proper and right and ought to have been made, except for the little circumstance that does not amount to anything nowadays, that they were in violation of a statute. Let us wipe the statute out and say that we do not treat it with contempt, although we do not treat it with obedience.

Mr. MAXEY. While it is true that promotions in the Army were made notwithstanding the eleventh section of the act of June, 1878, a good many believed that those promotions were made in direct violation of that section of that statute. I am one who believed so myself, and I do yet; but I was as much in favor of the promotions as any man who voted on that side of the question. I believed they could not be made, because I thought that was the reading of the law. Now the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin does precisely what I want. I want to promote these officers; they ought to be promoted; but I want them promoted according to law, and this does it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as amended will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the proviso to section 1151 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, repealed: And provided further, That all laws which forbid promotions in the Army are hereby repealed.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. CARPENTER. Now I move to strike out the fourth section.

Mr. WITHERS. I would suggest that the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] would probably come in first, because it goes to the perfection of the section.

Mr. CARPENTER. It will be first put by the Chair, of course, if he offers it.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to strike out on lines 4 and 5 the following words:

And the remaining one of the two professors shall be professor of modern languages.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That when a vacancy occurs in the office of professor of the French language or in the office of professor of the Spanish language in the Military Academy, both these offices shall cease; and thereafter there shall be in the Military Academy one, and only one, professor of modern languages.

Mr. CARPENTER. That would need further amendment, because that would leave the provision that when one professor died both professorships should cease, which would be rather rough on the survivor.

Mr. MAXEY. According to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, they can put in German, Italian, or anything else, and teach neither Spanish nor French.

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not see that that follows.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CARPENTER. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Minnesota. His amendment makes this section declare that when either of these professors dies both offices shall cease. How are you going to fill an office that has ceased with one professor?

Mr. WINDOM. The section provides that thereafter there shall be in the Military Academy one professor of modern languages. That establishes it.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then the idea is that he shall not be, or need not be, a professor of either French or Spanish.

Mr. WINDOM. No, sir; professor of the modern languages. They may appoint one of these men, or any other man.

Mr. CARPENTER. In other words, the whole system of education in that respect as to the languages may be changed under this amendment, and may be switched off one year on to German and Italian, and the next year tack on two or three other languages, and so on. They may change it every year, just as they please.

Mr. WINDOM. If you have a Secretary of War and an academic board that have no more sense than to do that, you had better revise the whole institution.

Mr. CARPENTER. It is pretty hard to require the Secretary of War to have more sense than the Senate. I think it is an unreasonable request. [Laughter.] If we make a law and cannot, by simply a word here, make it sound and right, we have no business to abuse the Secretary of War because he construes it as bad as we have drawn it. Everybody wants to continue the French and Spanish languages.

Mr. WINDOM. Everybody wants to establish a professorship of modern languages.

Mr. CARPENTER. A few men want to get rid of the professor of Spanish. I am opposed, whether it is at West Point or in the Army, or in the civil service, or anywhere in the Government, to getting men out by such a provision. This office is to be abolished to-day, and when this man is got rid of the office is to be established again and some other man put in. I am opposed to that. This is perhaps "telling tales out of school," but I think I am saying what I know to be a fact.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish on the part of the committee to enter a disclaimer to any such imputation as is contained in the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not mean to charge it on the committee at all. I do say what I believe, that the committee have been approached and induced to take this step by men who concealed their motive, which motive was to get rid of the professor of Spanish.

Mr. WITHERS. So far as the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate is concerned, no one has approached it in connection with this subject, so far as I am advised.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then I understand this whole thing has been conceived by the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. WITHERS. Oh, no, that is not true.

Mr. CARPENTER. If nobody approached them on the subject and they bring the subject here it must spring from their minds.

Mr. WITHERS. We found it in the bill of the House.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then the Appropriations Committee of the House must have done it.

Mr. WITHERS. It came from the Military Committee of the House.

Mr. CARPENTER. I hope the Senator does not understand me as reflecting on any committee of this body or any other body. I am opposed to this thing, and I have a right to vote against it. That is all I am saying.

Mr. WITHERS. I could say with equal propriety that I am opposed to it, but I vote for the bill as it stands. I am opposed to any personal influence controlling legislation, and so far as I know no such personal influence has been brought to bear in connection with this subject. The superior information possessed by a few individual Senators may enable them to do so, but there is nothing that has been brought before the committee to notify them of the existence of such a thing.

Mr. CARPENTER. I was a member of the Board of Visitors at West Point myself a few years ago; I know that institution as well as any man who does not know any more about it than I do; I know something of the jealousies that exist there and something of their workings; and I think I know—not to instruct anybody else but for my conduct—that this is a mere scheme to get rid of a person. I am opposed to the thing itself and I am opposed to the way this thing is to be accomplished, and I am especially opposed to the proposition of the Senator from Minnesota that when one of these professors dies both professorships shall die also.

Mr. WINDOM. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin how it is that this section gets rid of any person? I do not understand it so.

Mr. CARPENTER. It does not to-day; but if one of them dies, it certainly gets rid of the other.

Mr. WINDOM. We get rid of him without the bill if he dies.

Mr. CARPENTER. It is suggested to me by my friend from Texas that the tenure of each will depend upon the life of the other, not upon his own life but upon another fellow's life. I do not want to hang one professor up on the life of another, and I do not want to hang these professorships up on any such contingency. I want to continue the provisions that French and Spanish shall be taught in that academy. That is the present law, and I want to continue it so. I do not want to leave it to the discretion of the academic board to say we will take up German in place of French or Spanish. I think the act of Congress should fix it.

Mr. WINDOM. The only object I have in proposing this amendment is to establish in the academy one professorship of modern languages, and I am willing to leave it to the Secretary of War and to the academic board to decide what are the languages to be taught. I am perfectly satisfied that the Spanish language is of no importance whatever, and that it is so regarded at the Military Academy and they would be glad to get rid of it. I think the French ought to be taught. I believe the German language ought to take the place of the Spanish language, but I am willing to leave that to the academic board. I think they know more about it than I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] to strike out the section.

Mr. WITHERS. I am opposed to the striking out of the whole section for the reasons which have been indicated, and I will say in reply to some of the suggestions made by those who favor striking out that the arguments looking to thorough instruction in both the French and Spanish languages at the West Point Academy are exactly in accordance with my own views. Nor do I conceive that retaining this section would by any means imply that either French or Spanish should be imperfectly taught. I have reason to know, as I stated when I was up before, that many of the literary institutions of the country teach both French and Spanish through the medium of one chair. The Naval Academy does the same thing. We have but one professor there, who teaches both French and Spanish, and, so far as I know or have ever heard, with entire thoroughness and acceptability. If any argument can be deduced to show that it is necessary to have two professors at the West Point Academy by reason of our extended southern frontier running along the Mexican border for so many miles, it seems to me it would imply a fortiori that the students at the Naval Academy, who of necessity are brought in contact with people from all parts of the world, should be taught these languages by separate professors. If one person can discharge the duties of both chairs in that institution, I see no reason whatever why the same thing cannot be done at the Military Academy.

Mr. MAXEY. I call the attention of Senators to the fact that the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota having been adopted as part of the section, there is nothing whatever now which requires, if that be adopted and become a law, either the French language or the Spanish language to be taught at the Academy. Heretofore the law has required a professorship of French and a professorship of Spanish. Adopt this section as it now stands, and you leave it not to the law to determine what modern languages are to be taught, but you leave it to the Secretary of War, and he can teach neither French nor Spanish unless he cares to do so, but may put in German or any other modern foreign language. That is the effect of the adoption of it. I call the attention of Senators to it now, so that they may see the practical result.

Mr. WITHERS. I presume those who control the course of study there will be controlled by proper considerations as to what is necessary to be taught.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then why not make an appropriation of so many hundred thousand dollars for the Military Academy, and leave it to them, without attempting to specify what shall be done and what shall be taught.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator from Texas a question in reference to what can or cannot be done at the academy? I understand that the academic board can change the course of study there now if they choose to do so.

Mr. WITHERS. At any time they please.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand there are no restrictions on that board by law.

Mr. CONKLING. Not in this regard when the language of the law is express that there shall be a professorship of Spanish and a professorship of French.

Mr. MAXEY. Does the Senator from Iowa suppose the academic board can create a professorship? That is the question here. It is not as to the curriculum; it is as to the chairs.

Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand the Senator from Texas to say that the academic board cannot direct the professor of the Spanish language what he shall teach? Is there a limitation on that board? If there is I should like to have it read at the desk.

Mr. MAXEY. They can direct him what books shall be taught, but they must be Spanish. They can direct the Spanish course, but it must be Spanish. The Spanish professorship was created by law. The French professorship was created by law. The academic board cannot create a professorship; and yet this section does do that very thing. It says that hereafter there shall be but one professor of modern languages, and according to the way the members of the committee having charge of the bill have shaped it, the Secretary of War can say what modern languages shall be taught. The Senator from Minnesota tells us that he wants German to take the place of Spanish. You may entirely eliminate all that the law has determined so far as French is concerned from about the year 1806, and so far as Spanish is concerned since the acquisition of the Mexican territory.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not understand it so. Of course if the modern languages are to be taught, German may be added, but certainly you cannot substitute German for French and Spanish if the law now provides that they shall both be taught.

Mr. BECK. The only concern I had as a member of the Committee on Appropriations was that we should not be charged with having made any innovations or assumed a jurisdiction that belonged to the Military Committee; nor, as has been intimated, have we rushed this in as though we were making a radical change that had not been thought of before. When I came to look into it, I saw that so far from having usurped any jurisdiction we only did what we were compelled to do on all the information that was given to us. The Burnside commission, which was composed of very able men and whose information was said to be very accurate, and whose report we were urged to take because of the very great length of time they had devoted to the subject, recommended the consolidation of these professorships. I find on loking over the RECORD that the Hewitt bill brought in last year and the Banning bill from the Military Committee of the House, as well as the bill sent by the House made up from different portions of those bills, contained this same section in the language now recommended by the Senator from Minnesota. The House adopted it, the Senate agreed to it. All these gentlemen of the Military Committee were in their seats, and no objection came from them. It was sent to a committee of conference of which the Senator from Maine was chairman; a report was made to us that they had agreed on every item of that bill, this included, and no gentleman of the Military Committee objected. It came up again in the House at this session of Congress, passed the House again with the assent of the Military Committee there, and passed the Senate again with the assent of the Military Committee here.

Now, when the bill comes again, sent to us from the House, nobody objecting there to this, we are told that the Committee on Appropriations are taking jurisdiction of things they ought not to take cognizance of properly and which belong to the Military Committee of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. The gentlemen have had new light since that time.

Mr. BECK. I have served a long while on the Appropriations Committees of both Houses, and if there had been any serious objection to this measure from West Point or from the Department we should have had information in an official form instantly. There never was a case where there was an attempt to cut down any of the employés of the Government or any of the professorships at West Point or do anything that they did not like that we did not receive remonstrance earnestly and promptly. So far from that view of the case, there was no communication made to us, no complaint made, and, as the Senator from Minnesota said awhile ago, the Board of Visitors, for he was there as one, looked into this subject and there was no serious protest made against this provision. Therefore it seems to me that if the gentlemen now come and intimate that the Committee on Appropriations have done anything, either carelessly or without consideration, they cannot be sustained by the facts. A commission carefully considered the subject; it went to the Military Committee, and both Houses have passed on it.

Mr. MAXEY. The Military Committee of the Senate has never acted on it.

Mr. BECK. The Military Committee of the Senate certainly had ample opportunity to act on it. They had the Burnside bill a long time before the committee; they then had a modified bill; they then had this bill as it came over from the House with the sanction of the committee of the House; and why did not some gentleman of the Military Committee, either at the last session of Congress or hitherto at this session when there was an opportunity to have it investigated, investigate it and present some complaint as to this consolidation, if it was improper? Why reserve it to the closing hours of the session after having acquiesced all through the last Congress and all through this up to this time—why reserve it for the last hours of the session to complain of the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. MAXEY. The Burnside bill was not before the Military Committee. They put the bill on the Calendar from the joint committee's report, not from the Military Committee of the Senate at all.

Mr. BECK. Still the Military Committee were here in their places. They were here when the matter was being considered. They were here when the bill was up the last time.

Mr. ALLISON. May I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that they debated at great length the ninth section of the bill which was struck out.

Mr. BECK. I merely rose to say that, though the Committee on Appropriations have been very often charged with assuming jurisdiction over matters that they had no right to assume jurisdiction over, we are careful on that subject. Feeling that we might possibly have done it in this particular case, I have gone through the old bills and the records, and I find that we were compelled by the past action of the two Houses to consider this matter; and we were certainly not assuming any jurisdiction that was not forced upon us, because we want to be very careful, I assure gentlemen, to send to other committees all matters that we think they ought to have jurisdiction over. We are loaded down with work now; we have more than we can do really.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of this bill, if the proposition is made that but one professor of modern languages shall be at West Point, what is the authority for making the change? Whence comes the rule that a German shall be professor of French or a Frenchman shall be professor of German if either language is to be taught? I will not say that this movement is not in the direction of good discipline and perhaps economy; but my present impression is that it is not. As the academy now stands, there are three separate professorships of the different languages and these professorships are always separated where these languages are intended to be taught properly. Therefore, being of a conservative disposition, I only ask before we change the existing state of affairs that we may know upon what basis we do it, and I would ask the honorable Senator who desires us to adopt section 4 of this bill the reasons why. It is a change and there must have been a motive for that change, and I want to know whence the motion comes that the number of professorships should be diminished and that the whole teaching of modern languages should be placed in a single hand? I can say from individual experience that it is about the most expensive thing in the world to teach a man French by a German professor and sometimes I have thought the same of the attempt to teach a man German by a French professor; and yet both those languages to military men are especially necessary at the present time.

Mr. WITHERS. In answer to the Senator's question I wish to state that he was not present and did not hear the statement which has been twice or thrice made before the Senate that no party whatever, no individual whatever, appeared before the Appropriations Committee to urge the adoption of this section. The Appropriations Committee find it in the bill as reported from the House; they find it identical with a section in the bill which passed and was vetoed; they find it in the bill of last year identical in form with what it is in the present. Tracing it back further they find it in the Banning bill of the House.

Mr. BAYARD. Was it enacted before?

Mr. WITHERS. It was not enacted. We passed this bill twice before. In one case it failed by reason of the failure of the two Houses to agree in the closing session of the Forty-fifth Congress, and in the Forty-sixth Congress it was passed again, but lost by the veto of the President. Therefore this identical section in this very form has been before the Senate repeatedly; the Senate has passed it repeatedly; the committees of both the House and the Senate have passed upon it; no person has ever appeared to object to it. The Senator from Minnesota, a member of the Board of Visitors at West Point, has stated that the subject was up before the board at its last meeting, and they signified their approval of it, and no person has ever objected to the passage of it at all before. The Burnside commission approved it. All these approvals have been made; and for the first time to-day we find criticism.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator intend to say that this is the first time objection has ever been made to this section?

Mr. WITHERS. So far as I know.

Mr. LOGAN. I state here that for twelve years that I have been in Congress since the war this proposition has been up at nearly every Congress, and has been defeated nearly every time it has been up except the time the Senator mentions.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I remember perfectly well hearing the Senator from Illinois dissecting very ably the ninth section of this bill, which was up before. I do not recollect to have heard him say one word about this section, although it was in that bill in the same language that it is now. Had not the Appropriations Committee a right to believe that the Military Committee was especially anxious that this provision should pass?

Mr. LOGAN. Now, Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senator says I dissected one section and did not refer to this, I desire to go back into what passed here but a few weeks ago. It is very well known that it was not necessary to dissect any section in that particular bill. It was doomed to pass the Senate, no matter what was in it, without any amendment. I did not refer to this section. I took up one section.

Mr. WITHERS. You referred to another?

Mr. LOGAN. I did. I referred to another one, but I did not care to go all through the bill; but as I stated this morning, this very section has been before the Military Committee time and again, and has always been reported against and always voted down. I repeat again that it was examined at the suggestion of the then Secretary of War some years ago by the Military Committee. Officers were brought before the committee and examined in reference to this very point.

Now, I will say to the Senator from Iowa, inasmuch as he rather called me to account for not speaking on this section when the bill was up before, that if he will examine the remarks I made on section 9 he will find that I said I had many other objections to the bill, but it was useless to discuss them.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator mistakes me. I am not calling him to account for anything. I am simply showing that it is not the Appropriations Committee only that is mistaken about this matter; that the Appropriations Committee, finding this here and finding no objection coming from the many sources of the Military Committee, had a right to suppose this was proper and right. I intend, however, to join the Senator from Illinois in voting to strike out this section, as I have had light from him, and also from the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Texas.

Mr. LOGAN. But I will say in reference to the Appropriations Committee that I have not heard any criticism on that committee. The criticism has been on this section. I certainly have said nothing by way of criticism in reference to the Appropriations Committee. I have only adverted to the section itself. Inasmuch, however, as the Senator has mentioned the Appropriations Committee, I will say that if there is a committee in this Senate that seems to have a disease of sensitiveness it is that committee. There is nothing coming from their hands that can be criticised in the Senate without some Senator saying there is an attack on the Appropriations Committee. Nobody desires to attack the Appropriations Committee, but if this Appropriations Committee would allow legislation to go to its appropriate committees, probably we should not have so much difficulty. It is presumable at least that military men know as much about military affairs as those who have had no experience in military matters. It is at least presumable that the Finance Committee would know as much about a bill that they have before them as the Appropriations Committee. It is presumable that the Committee on Commerce would know as much about subjects pertaining to their appropriate functions. It is not presumable that the Committee on Appropriations know everything and that other people know nothing. If they are so sensitive on this subject, I say now that the bill which was brought before the Senate by the Appropriations Committee with section 9 in it, and that passed the Senate, was a disgrace to the intelligence of military men. When I say disgrace I mean it in reference to the knowledge of persons, for there is not a man that ever had any military experience on the face of God's earth but what would say that section 9 was put in there by a man who knew nothing on the top of God's earth about military matters. I will say that for the benefit of the committee.

Mr. WITHERS. De judice! It is very certain, notwithstanding the disclaimer of the Senator from Illinois, that the course of the Appropriations Committee has been criticised, and they have been held up to the opprobrium of the Senate as usurping powers not properly belonging to them in presuming to mention anything in connection with this bill relative to military matters. I yield precedence to the Senator from Illinois as to his possessing superior knowledge on the subject, but he does not possess all the knowledge on this subject. The Appropriations Committee, I undertake to say, have never willingly usurped the function of any committee. That they have reported bills containing legislative provisions which might properly have come under the consideration of other committees, I do not pretend to deny; but it has never been done by any act of volition on their part save when rendered indispensable by the exigencies of the public service. In the latter days of the session, when other committees would not have time to act on bills, it has been absolutely necessary in order to secure speedy legislation upon certain matters for the Committee on Appropriations to take cognizance of them in connection with the appropriations for a specific service; and it is in that way and that way only that they have assumed to control matters properly within the cognizance of other committees.

It is only within the last day or two that I reported to the Senate, with a request that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, an amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] on some question of military law. I assure the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Texas that the Appropriations Committee will very gladly turn over to them, when the necessities of the public service will authorize it, the consideration of all questions in which military matters are involved. We shall be glad to get rid of them. We have enough to do; we are worked to the extent of our capacity, mentally and physically, toward the end of the session, and we should be very glad to get rid of many of the bills we are called on to consider.

I accept the suggestion of my friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] that the criticism passed upon the Committee on Appropriations as trenching on the prerogative of the Military Committee in reporting this bill is not raised now. I presume other Senators can judge as well of the propriety or impropriety of consolidating two professorships of modern languages at the West Point Academy into one as the Senator from Illinois or any other member of the Military Committee.

I have thought it necessary to say this much in defense of the committee of which I am a member, and to assure the members of the Military Committee and other committees that the Appropriations Committee do not desire to usurp any powers legitimately belonging to them or to trench in any degree on their prerogative.

Mr. LOGAN. I had this morning not said one word in reference to the Committee on Appropriations, and the language I made use of was drawn out by the criticism of the Senator from Iowa, who is a member of the Appropriations Committee, suggesting that I had not criticised this section in the former bill when I had said, after speaking to section 9 of the former bill, that there were other incongruities and objections in that bill that I did not deem it necessary to mention, and this was an objectionable section to me then. I stated what had been done in reference to this section in Congress for years gone by by the Military Committee. I had no disposition to criticise the Committee on Appropriations; but when Senators criticise other Senators because they object to matter that is brought to the Senate in an appropriation bill, they must expect that those Senators will at least have the same privilege of criticism that the others have. That is all there is in reference to it. I have made no assumption so far as knowledge is concerned in reference to this or any other matter; but what I do know I know as well as anybody else; what I do not know, I do not pretend to know; what other people do not know they ought not to pretend to know. That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. CARPENTER. As I do not have the honor to be on either of the committees that seem to consider themselves on trial, I am probably as impartial an umpire or arbitrator as can be found. I have the profoundest respect for both these committees. On a question touching the Army, I should certainly as a Senator, in my vote, be inclined to follow the Military Committee; on a question of appropriating money, I should bow with the utmost submission to the Appropriations Committee. But the Committee on Appropriations are not captains of hosts nor leaders of armies. I would not follow their banner into a street fight. On appropriations I would take everything they said for law and gospel; I would know they had examined it; I would know that their report was the result of deliberation and examination and care, and, therefore, should be disposed to follow it.

Now, there has not been, so far as I have understood, certainly not from me, one word uttered with a view to criticise either committee or any committee. The question is not whether this measure belongs to one committee or another. The question is, ought the section to stand or fall? That is all. All this reference that has been made to the action of the last Congress amounts to nothing, for of course we are not estopped by it. We all know perfectly well that at the last session the Army bill, where this provision was, was incumbered with other difficulties, and so much more important as everybody thought that the attention of Senators was directed to those points, and these little details were not attended to.

My recollection is that the Senator from Illinois stated in the course of his remarks on the vetoed Army bill that there were many other things in this bill besides those he discussed that ought to be considered and matured deliberately by the Appropriations Committee, but that it was useless to discuss them, because the bill was certain to pass without the change of a word.

Now, the only question being whether this section should stand or fall, let me say five words on that, and I will trouble the Senate no longer on the subject. As this section now stands amended by the Senate on motion of the Senator from Minnesota, we are to throw out, as far as legislation is concerned, the French and Spanish languages as matters of instruction in the academy. At the academy two years are devoted to the study of languages. There is a class now there, which has just graduated upon that subject, that has passed through that branch of study; there is another class there that is just half-way through the Spanish and French. They have had one year in these branches. It would be in the power of anybody who wants to intermeddle, to change the whole programme there and establish German and Italian to be taught in the place of French and Spanish, and the result would be that one class would have a year's study in one and it would have a year in the other language, and would accomplish nothing in either. The next year the Secretary of War might think some other language was a good deal more important, and another change might be made, and so on.

That certainly has not been the way Congress has dealt with the Military Academy. It has always been a pet of Congress and of the nation, and it has been carefully guarded and protected by law. This professorship of the Spanish language was established by law, and so of the French language; but this section abolishes those laws, takes away the effect entirely of those statutes, and leaves it in the discretion of the Secretary of War or the academic board, or whoever else may have control of it, to adopt any other languages in place of these.

Mr. WINDOM. Allow me to ask the Senator, if these two languages are required by law to be taught, how the adoption of the section as now amended would prevent their being taught?

Mr. CARPENTER. They are only required to be taught by law from the fact that a Spanish professorship is established by law. It never yet was supposed that when Congress established a Spanish professorship its occupant was to teach German or Dutch.

Mr. WINDOM. Was that Spanish professorship established by any other act than the mere appropriation of so much money to pay a Spanish professor?

Mr. CARPENTER. I think the act declared that there shall be a professorship of the Spanish language, with a professor. It would be enough if it were done in the way suggested, but this act does establish a Spanish professor.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not think, then, with all due respect for the Senator's knowledge of law, much superior to mine, they would be prevented from teaching both Spanish and French.

Mr. CARPENTER. Let us see.

Mr. LOGAN. The professorship of Spanish is established by law. He has the assimilated rank of colonel by law.

Mr. CARPENTER. The Senator from Minnesota says this does not take away the establishment of the Spanish professorship. Let us see:

That when a vacancy occurs in the office of professor of the French language or in the office of professor of the Spanish language in the Military Academy, both these offices shall cease.

Mr. WINDOM. But the Senator has just told us that by law these languages are to be taught.

Mr. CARPENTER. I say they are to be taught under existing law, but if you repeal the law they are not to be taught under any law.

Mr. WINDOM. We simply repeal the office of Spanish professor, but the law still stands, according to the Senator's statement, requiring Spanish to be taught, and it can be taught under one professorship of modern languages, and the law will be complied with.

Mr. CARPENTER. It is impossible for the Senator from Minnesota to shelter himself under a repudiation of being a lawyer and justify putting such a construction upon this section. I ask him to look at it for one moment. The law at present is that there shall be a Spanish professorship and a French professorship in the Academy. It is not necessary for an act of Congress to declare that the Spanish professor shall teach Spanish and not French, and that the French professor shall teach French and not Spanish, because that would be going so far into details as to be an absurdity; but a Spanish professorship exists by law, and so a French professorship. Now comes the Senator from Minnesota, and by his amendment to the fourth section he declares that just as soon as either of these professors shall die both offices shall cease, and in the place of them there shall be one professor of modern languages. Suppose the French professor dies and the Spanish professor lives, both offices are abolished by this section on the happening of that event. Then there is to be a professor not of Spanish or French but of the modern languages.

Mr. WINDOM. Cannot that professor teach the modern languages under that provision?

Mr. CARPENTER. It is not a question of what a man can do; it is a question of what he is compelled to do, and I want to compel him.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not want to compel him to teach the Spanish language.

Mr. CARPENTER. I understand the Senator to have avowed his preference for teaching the German language. That may be very well; but if that is to be adopted and the teaching of the other languages is to be discontinued it should be so declared by law. I do not want to leave it in this indefinite way, to be shifted and changed year after year and year by year. I want the law to declare what languages shall be taught, and that has been the policy of Congress in regard to the academy from the very first.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to have the law establishing these professorships read? It is section 1309. I send the law to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1309. The United States Military Academy at West Point, in the State of New York, shall be constituted as follows: There shall be one superintendent; one commandant of cadets; one senior instructor in the tactics of artillery; one senior instructor in the tactics of cavalry; one senior instructor in the tactics of infantry; one professor and one assistant professor of civil and military engineering; one professor and one assistant professor of natural and experimental philosophy; one professor and one assistant professor of mathematics; one chaplain, who shall also be professor of history, geography, and ethics, and one assistant professor of the same; one professor and one assistant professor of chemistry, mineralogy, and geology; one professor and one assistant professor of drawing; one professor and one assistant professor of the French language; one professor and one assistant professor of the Spanish language; one adjutant; one master of the sword; and one teacher of music.

Mr. MAXEY. That covers the point. The professorship of Spanish is established by law.

Mr. CARPENTER. Now it is perfectly plain that if this fourth section, as amended by the Senator from Minnesota, shall pass, these two offices are abolished and in place of the two is to be a professor of modern languages. The Senator asked me if he may not teach French. Yes, he may or he may not; and if it is of no sort of consequence what is to be taught in that academy, if we do not care to dictate what shall be taught there, then this section is well enough. But if we do intend to have French taught there and Spanish taught there, we should say so; and the Senator from Minnesota throws away that direction when he says there shall be one professorship of modern languages without providing what languages are to be taught. I believe that it would be a very great wrong to pass this section and to interfere with the teaching of these languages as they are now taught in the academy. For that reason I hope the motion to strike out the section will prevail.

Mr. WINDOM. I think from the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin it is perfectly clear that if this section shall be passed as now amended there will be authority on the part of the academic board or the Secretary of War or whoever has the direction to teach both these languages or either or neither, as they desire. I have no doubt about it. It places the matter in their power.

Now, the amendment has simply this effect: it reduces the number of professorships, and it places the discretion as to the modern languages to be taught elsewhere than in the statute. I am perfectly willing for one to leave it there, but if Senators prefer to designate what languages shall be taught, it can be done without keeping up the two unnecessary professorships; we can very easily amend this section by requiring that by this professorship of modern languages French and Spanish shall be taught. It is not necessary to keep up the establishment with both professorships in order that they may be taught. I prefer to leave it to the proper authorities who have control of the institution to teach either Spanish or French as they may direct, or both. I believe they will select those that are most advantageous. I am confident that General Schofield in charge of the institution knows more about that than I do. I would not state that he knew more about it than my honorable friend from Wisconsin; but he certainly does know more about it than I do, and I am willing to leave it to him and the Secretary of War. If the Senator is not, it is very easy to amend this section without continuing the two professorships.

Mr. CARPENTER. The ironical courtesy of the Senator from Minnesota——

Mr. WINDOM. Not by any means; it is truthful.

Mr. CARPENTER. He says he does not know much, but he thinks I do! That is all very cheap and very easily understood. If he thinks General Schofield knows more than all of us about managing the Military Academy, why does he not amend this bill by appropriating so many hundred thousand dollars, to be expended under the care of General Schofield, to run the Military Academy? The Senator is not quite frank; that is to say, he does not state all the truth. He does not want to leave everything to General Schofield or any other one man, but he wants to leave the particular thing that he thinks will come out as he wants it. Now, I am just exactly as selfish as he is. I want to secure the instruction of the cadets in both these languages, as is now fixed by law, and I am opposed to any provision that takes away that legislative direction.

Mr. WINDOM. Let me ask the Senator if it is for that alone, why he cannot amend this provision by saying that this one professorship shall teach both these languages?

Mr. CARPENTER. It is not for that alone. It is because, in the first place, I do not believe any one man could properly teach all the classes in both languages. There is a limit to human endurance and human capacity in the way of instruction, and as a matter of physical power it cannot be done. The professor of French now, for instance, has one or two sections to teach himself, and he visits every section in the class once in two weeks. He could not do the same thing in the Spanish if he was just as good a Spaniard as he is a Frenchman. So of the Spanish professor. It cannot be done.

Mr. WITHERS. Will the Senator permit me to ask him whether he has heard of any complaint of the want of efficient teaching of the two languages in the Naval Academy?

Mr. CARPENTER. I know nothing about the Navy. I never sailed. I am sea-sick whenever I pass the Navy Department. [Laughter.] I do not know anything about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to strike out section 4.

Mr. CONKLING and Mr. CARPENTER called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. Could I have foreseen when I asked a very innocent question about this section all that it has led to, I might have foreborne that question; but having asked it and having heard all to which the Senate has listened, I am satisfied that this section ought to be stricken out. I forbear to give any reason for it in addition to those that have been given save one. As the section stands now, no commission, no Committee on Appropriations or Military Affairs or anything else of either House has ever recommended it. On the contrary it is changed to mean something essentially and radically different from that ever recommended by any committee whatever.

That is all I have to say about it.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HEREFORD. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] are absent and paired. The Senator from New Jersey, if present, would vote "nay," and the Senator from Mississippi "yea."

Mr. CARPENTER, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I desire to state that I had forgotten that last evening I paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] on this bill. Having forgotten it for the moment when I voted, I wish to withdraw my vote, as I do not know how he would vote.

Mr. BLAINE. My colleague [Mr. HAMLIN] is paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. GROVER.] I do not know how either of them would vote. I presume both would vote "yea" if they were here.

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Allison,	Conkling,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Bayard,	Davis of Illinois,	Logan,	Rollins,
Blaine,	Groome,	Maxey,	Saunders,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harris,	Paddock,	Voorhees.

So the motion to strike out the section was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2251) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, non-concurred in certain other amendments of the Senate to the said bill, and had concurred in certain other amendments of the Senate with amendments thereto, in which amendments it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 102) authorizing a survey of the Mississippi River near Lake Concordia, Louisiana, and Cowpen Bend, Mississippi, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) to repeal certain clauses in the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1879.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BECK. I ask leave to call up the bill (H. R. No. 2251) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, that it may be sent back to the House. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and ask for a committee of conference to be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator to state the amendments of the Senate to which the House has disagreed. What are they?

Mr. BECK. The bill has just come from the House. They have disagreed to some of our amendments. Not having the bill in hand, I am not able to answer the question. They have also made some additional amendments of their own, not very important I understand. I suppose the easiest way would be just to insist on our amendments and have a committee of conference, as the amounts are small.

Mr. CONKLING. How can the Senator from Kentucky know that the Senate would not agree to the amendments of the House?

Mr. BECK. I do not know that, and cannot. I make the motion that that shall be done.

Mr. CONKLING. Without meaning to interfere with the Senator's motion, I suggest that he allow it to lie a moment until he look at the bill and see what the amendments are so that he can inform the Senate of their nature. I do not know what they are any more than he does.

Mr. BECK. I may be wrong in the motion I have made, but I have heard it made so often that I suppose it is the usual way.

Mr. CONKLING. So have I, but not under circumstances like these. The amendments here between the two Houses are very trifling at best. It is not like the general amendments added customarily to appropriation bills. As I say, I do not wish to interfere with the Senator's motion, but I think if he would take the trouble to look at the bill before making it, so as to indicate to the Senate what the disagreements are, it is possible we might avoid the necessity of a committee of conference.

Mr. BECK. I hope the Senator will allow the committee to be ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not make an objection; I only make a suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the motion of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee of conference on the part of the Senate; and Mr. BECK, Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia, and Mr. WINDOM were appointed.

A subsequent message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted on its amendments to certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2251) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, insisted on its disagreement to certain other amendments of the Senate, and agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. J. D. C. ATKINS of Tennessee, Mr. J. H. BLOUNT of Georgia, and Mr. J. H. BAKER of Indiana, managers at the conference on its part.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 102) authorizing a survey of the Mississippi River near Lake Concordia, Louisiana, and Cowpen Bend, Mississippi, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2175) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to strike out the fourth section, beginning after the word "languages" in line 7, down to the end of the section. This seems to be a modification of existing law, and is a matter purely for the consideration of the Military Committee; and after the admonition of my friend from Illinois I do not think the Committee on Appropriations ought to take cognizance of a matter of so much importance as changing the compensation of these professors. Therefore I move to strike that out, so that that matter may be carefully considered by the Military Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa is to strike out from section 4 the words which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And that section 1336 of the Revised Statutes be, and is hereby, amended by inserting after the word "service" in the first line, the words "as professor."

Mr. WITHERS. The Senate have passed on that question. They refused to strike out the section, but I presume it is in order for the Senator to move an amendment to strike out a portion of the section. I will read the law as it stands to show the effect of the amendment. Section 1336 of the Revised Statutes is as follows:

SEC. 1336. Each of the professors of the Military Academy whose service at the academy exceeds ten years shall have the pay and allowances of colonel, and all other professors shall have the pay and allowances of lieutenant-colonels; and the instructors of ordnance and science of gunnery and of practical engineering shall have the pay and allowances of major.

It is not worth while to read the whole section as it goes on to provide for several other matters. The provision of this bill which amends section 1336 proposes to do so by inserting after the word "service" in the first line the words "as professor," so that it will read:

Each of the professors of the Military Academy whose service as professor at the academy exceeds ten years shall have the pay and allowances of colonel, &c.;

The effect of it being to entitle those who have served at the academy as professors for ten years to this compensation; if they have served for a greater period in any other capacity than as professor they would not receive it.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not know what particular man is to be hit now by this section in this respect. I know of one very deserving man who would be hit by this provision. The present professor of engineering was appointed from the Army, and this of course would cut off his increased pay unless he has been there ten years as a professor, and I do not think he has been; but what is the principle upon which such a discrimination rests? A man in the Army has an increase of pay based upon the length of his service. If you take him from the line of his duty in the Army and put him in as a professor at West Point why should he be deprived of that increase of pay? He would have received it if he had remained at his place in the line. Why should it be denied to him because he has been made a professor?

Mr. WITHERS. He would not have received the amount of pay of that rank as provided by that section if he had remained in the line of the Army.

Mr. CARPENTER. Why not?

Mr. WITHERS. Because the rank and pay is greater at the Military Academy than in the Army.

Mr. CARPENTER. How do you know that?

Mr. WITHERS. By virtue of the provision of this law. For instance, a major——

Mr. CARPENTER. Suppose a colonel was appointed a professor?

Mr. WITHERS. Suppose a major was?

Mr. CARPENTER. Suppose a colonel was?

Mr. WITHERS. Then it would be the same.

Mr. CARPENTER. Suppose a brigadier-general should be?

Mr. WITHERS. I presume that these cases are scarcely supposable, but the facts are that officers of inferior rank are appointed as professors there, and by virtue of their appointment as professors they are entitled to this increased pay.

Mr. CARPENTER. I have never before in my life heard of the principle of legislation that seems to obtain here to-day. We are passing laws not to put up the bars, but because ten to one nobody will come in, ten to one no injury will come. We do not say we will have French and Spanish taught, but leave them at liberty to teach them or not, as they please; and ten to one no harm will be done if we pass the bill.

Mr. President, the principle of this thing is totally wrong. If you have appointed a man to a professorship there from civil life and increase his pay after ten years' service 5 per cent. or 10 per cent., why should you deny the same increase to a man who has been taken from the Army and appointed there? There is no reason in it that I can see, and no principle in it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to state that if a captain in the Army has served for nine years in any capacity at the academy and is appointed a professor, in one year's time he becomes a colonel by virtue of ten years' service; whereas a civilian appointed one day before him would have to serve the whole ten years before he would become a colonel. Does the Senator understand me?

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not.

Mr. BURNSIDE. If a captain in the Army is appointed a professor after he has served nine years at the academy, at the end of one year he becomes a colonel.

Mr. ALLISON. That is nine years at the academy.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Yes, nine years as an instructor. As a matter of course the statute refers to the academy. I suppose the Senator knows I refer to that. He may be an instructor for five years, say, and then if he is appointed a professor that five years' service as an instructor at the academy counts in his favor, and at the end of ten years' service in the academy instead of ten years as a professor he becomes a colonel; whereas a citizen appointed as a professor of chemistry or of French or Spanish must serve for ten years before he becomes a colonel.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not understand that he becomes a colonel at all, except that by being a professor he is assimilated to a certain rank for the purpose of fixing his place in the service.

Mr. BURNSIDE. All the professors have the relative rank of lieutenant-colonel.

Mr. CARPENTER. How does this provision touch that question? How is it affected by such legislation?

Mr. BURNSIDE. Every man becomes a lieutenant-colonel as soon as he is appointed a professor, and under this provision they must serve ten years as a professor without reference to their previous service at the academy before they get the rank and pay of a colonel.

Mr. CARPENTER. How will it affect Colonel Wheeler, for instance?

Mr. BURNSIDE. If Professor Wheeler has not served ten years as a professor he is now only lieutenant-colonel, for he cannot be a colonel until he has served ten years as a professor.

Mr. CARPENTER. There is some mystery about this thing I do not get through me.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I have tried to explain it to the Senator, and fail to see why there should be any doubt on the question.

Mr. CARPENTER. It is my fault entirely, but I do not get the idea.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator can readily see if a man has been an instructor at the Military Academy for five years and is appointed a professor he becomes at the end of five years a colonel by the law as it now stands.

Mr. CARPENTER. He is a colonel at the end of ten years?

Mr. BURNSIDE. If the law is amended as proposed he cannot be a colonel until he serves ten years as a professor.

Mr. CARPENTER. As I understand this section, if a man served twenty years in the Army and was then appointed a professor he gets no additional pay until he has been ten years a professor.

Mr. BURNSIDE. He becomes a lieutenant-colonel as soon as he is appointed.

Mr. CARPENTER. It does not say anything about lieutenant-colonel; the statute says "service in the Army and at the academy."

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am saying something about it. I say an officer in the Army appointed to a professorship becomes a lieutenant-colonel at once, and after a service of ten years at the academy he becomes a colonel, and if he had served in the academy before he became a professor that service is counted in his ten years' service.

Mr. WINDOM. I agree with the Senator from Iowa that this amendment ought to be carried.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am not trying to combat the amendment in any way. I do not say anything against it or for it.

Mr. WINDOM. I call attention to section 1336 of the Revised Statutes, which has already been read:

Each of the professors of the Military Academy whose service at the academy exceeds ten years shall have the pay and allowances of colonel, and all other professors shall have the pay and allowances of lieutenant-colonels.

So that, as stated by the Senator from Rhode Island, the very appointment to a professorship gives the grade of lieutenant-colonel, but by this act which we propose to pass to-day a professor must have served as a professor ten years before he can have the grade of colonel.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator read that section again, section 1336?

Mr. WINDOM. Yes, sir:

Each of the professors of the Military Academy whose service at the academy exceeds ten years shall have the pay and allowances of colonel, and all other professors shall have the pay and allowances of lieutenant-colonels.

The fourth section of the bill proposes after the word "service," as it appears in the first line of the section just read, to insert the words "as professor;" so as to read:

Each of the professors of the Military Academy whose service as professor at the Academy exceeds ten years, &c.

Now, I will state the effect of that amendment of section 1336. Professors Wheeler and Michie are among the most prominent, if not the most valuable professors at the Academy, and they have not been there as professors ten years. They were in service at the Academy as captains for a part of the time; and the effect of this amendment is to reduce the present compensation as allowed by law to Professors Wheeler and Michie, and to nobody else at present. It might hereafter affect some of the younger professors who were in the service, but at the present time it affects no others. I will read part of a letter which I have received from the Secretary of War upon this subject. I telegraphed him on Saturday, and this is his reply:

Referring to your telegram of the 14th instant, asking what officers will be affected by the last four lines of the fourth section of House bill 2175, and whether the clause should be amended, and if so, how, I have the honor to invite your attention to the following remarks of the Paymaster-General, in answer to the first question:

"The clause will, first of all, affect Professors Michie and Wheeler. It will require that a professor shall hereafter serve ten years as professor before he has the pay of a colonel, all other professors having the pay of lieutenant-colonel."

The Second Comptroller, by a decision of October 29, 1878, decided that the ten years required under section 1336, Revised Statutes, could be made up by service in other grades at the academy as well as in that of professor. So that an officer could, for example, be on duty eight years as captain at the academy and two years as professor and then be entitled to pay of colonel.

As the Second Comptroller has decided the question those professors are entitled to the pay of a colonel. This provision would take it from them.

Mr. BURNSIDE. That is exactly as I stated, except I supposed that one of them had rendered five years' service as captain instead of eight years' service, as the Senator from Minnesota has read.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, after the schooling I received this morning from the Committee on Appropriations, I certainly should not say a word if it were not for the remark of my friend from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] who said he made this motion to strike out the concluding clause of the fourth section merely because of the fact that I had—he did not use the word criticised, but that was the meaning of it—had criticised their committee, and therefore he desired to refer all things to the Military Committee. I am used to such remarks. It sometimes becomes a kind of disease in the minds of some individuals that they must always when referring to the language of others speak in rather a disrespectful way. That I care nothing about. I desire now, inasmuch as the Senator by his remark provoked what I am going to say, to state to him that the very motion that he has made now does show the necessity of a person examining somewhat closely that which is proposed to the Senate.

The very motion that the Senator has made to strike out this clause shows either that he does not understand himself the section of the Revised Statutes that is proposed to be amended or that he proposes by his motion to do an injustice, one or the other. The only part of section 4 in this bill that has any merit in it whatever is the very part that the Senator proposes to strike out. I think I can convince the Senator that he shows by his motion that he either does not understand the bill or he wants an improper bill to pass.

Now what is the law? The law as it stands to-day is just as it has been explained by the Senator from Rhode Island; that is to say, that if an Army officer with the rank of lieutenant or captain is detailed at the West Point Academy and has served there for nine years in any capacity whatever, it makes no difference what, whether a professor or not, when appointed a professor, after one year's service he gets the rank of colonel, while any other officer detailed as professor to that department has to serve ten years before he gets the rank of colonel.

That is the condition of the case. That shows that the proposition in this section as it stands now reported by the committee is correct; and why? Because it puts the professors on an equality. Each and every one is required to have the same term of service in the same character of employment in order to get the same rank, and that is certainly just and proper. Therefore I say to the Senator from Iowa that by attemping to say something very sharp to me he has shown that he misunderstands what he undertook to do himself.

There is, as I said, no proposition in this section as meritorious as the very proposition that the Senator from Iowa proposes to strike out, because that proposition does equalize the professorships and does do justice to all; and I am opposed to striking it out inasmuch as the section stands by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I made this motion with a view of having this very important question of the compensation of professors and instructors at the Military Academy considered by the Military Committee. Of course I did not know as much about it as I ought to have known.

Mr. LOGAN. I think not myself.

Mr. ALLISON. But I did know that this little provision reduces the pay of two very worthy and meritorious officers. I also knew that the question of the compensation of officers at the Military Academy is one that has received consideration from time to time by the Military Committee of the Senate; and inasmuch as the Senator from Illinois undertook a moment ago to indicate that the Appropriations Committee were engaged in matters they did not comprehend or understand, I thought it well enough that this very important subject, as it certainly is an important subject, should be referred to the Military Committee.

What the Senator from Illinois says is true. An officer of the Army occupying the position of lieutenant in the Army can be appointed as professor at the Military Academy and at once receive the pay of lieutenant-colonel. That is true; but as in the case of Professor Wheeler, who, I believe, when he was appointed a professor in 1871, was a major in the Engineer Corps, he is compelled, if the law is changed, to serve ten years as a professor before he can become a colonel, although if he had not had the misfortune of being appointed to the Military Academy he might, if he was an officer in the line, have been appointed to a higher rank. That might occur.

All I desire is that this matter shall be investigated by those gentlemen who understand the question. The Senator from Rhode Island has given us some information that is very valuable. Therefore it is that I do not want to see these legislative provisions tacked on to appropriation bills against the judgment of the Military Committee. If the Military Committee will give us the information that is necessary for the proper understanding of these questions, of course we can put such provisions upon appropriation bills. But I would have been misled, I confess, by section 4 of this bill.

In the first place, at the beginning of the last session, in looking over the bill of the Senator from Rhode Island, representing the joint select committee, I found this fourth section. In looking over the bill that came from the House Military Committee I found this fourth section. These questions have been debated over and over again in this body. I had seen members of the Military Committee sit by and hear these sections read at the Clerk's desk day after day. I heard no comments whatever from that committee, and, therefore, when I found this provision here, inserted by the Appropriations Committee, coming from the House as it did, supposed to have the sanction of the Military Committee of the House, I felt like apologizing to the Military Committee for having put in a provision of this kind without fully understanding its effect, and hence it was by way of apology that I stated for myself the reasons which operated on my mind for allowing this section to remain in the bill. When I had the section explained to me by the Senator from Illinois and by other members of the Military Committee, I became convinced that we were doing an injustice by putting in this fourth section, and therefore it was that I joined him in voting to strike out the fourth section. Now he tells me that the fourth section has a very great merit in it, and that there is a provision here of great value, and, therefore, he is not in favor of striking out a portion of the fourth section. If that be true, I of course do not desire to insist upon my motion. If it is an important provision that ought to be retained in this bill, as the Senator from Illinois, a member of the Military Committee, says it is, I am quite willing to withdraw my motion or allow it to be voted down. I only wanted a correct and full understanding of the several provisions of this section.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say in a word, and not by way of apology either, that I am not chairman of the Military Committee, and so far as I am individually concerned I have no desire to have anything referred to it. I am perfectly willing that the Appropriations Committee shall do all the work of Congress. I am not "hankering," as the boys say, after work; but I will say to the Senator, because he seems to be the only one seeking information on this point, that the only merit in the fourth section is the clause he desires to strike out. That is all I have seen in the section that has any merit in it.

In order that the Senator may not be misled, inasmuch as he claims to be without understanding in reference to this point, as he thinks that Major Wheeler was unfortunate in being detailed to West Point, as thereby he does not get so high rank as he would if he had remained in the Army and not been detailed, let me state that he has there fallen into another error. Mr. Wheeler might have staid in the position he occupied in the Engineer Corps for thirty years and he never would have been a colonel perhaps. It is by being detailed to West Point that these lower-grade officers get higher rank much sooner than they do by remaining in the line. Therefore the position is sought. It will not do to say that a man is unfortunate in being detailed to West Point, for there is not an officer in the Army to-day but what would thank the Secretary of War for detailing him there if he is of low grade, because it gives him higher rank, higher pay, and an easier place. Not only that, but I will venture the assertion that there is not a man at West Point to-day who was detailed by the Secretary of War without an application for it. Therefore it will not do to say that.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator misunderstood me if he supposed that I regarded it as unfortunate to be detailed to West Point.

Mr. LOGAN. That was the language the Senator used.

Mr. ALLISON. I used that in a Pickwickian sense.

Mr. LOGAN. It is not a misfortune; it is not only a compliment, but it is a benefit pecuniarily and every other way, for it gives them higher rank. Officers in the Army serve ten years, lieutenants in the Army have served fifteen years, and have not had promotions. Hence I say there is merit in this very word "professors," that they shall be required to serve as professors ten years before receiving the rank of colonel, because many men serve twenty years in the line without receiving that rank. Therefore, I do insist that the Senator's motion shall not prevail. I am opposed to the section as a whole. I think the section is wrong, but if the section goes on the bill this clause ought to go with it, because there is merit in that part of the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BOOTH.) The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CARPENTER. I move to amend section 4 by adding at the end of the section these words:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to the case of any professor now serving at said academy.

If here is a principle that ought to be presented and applied hereafter let it be so, but do not let us legislate here to hit two men who as stated by the Senator from Minnesota are among the very best professors of that academy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WITHERS. The effect of the amendment is simply to destroy the whole provision.

Mr. CARPENTER. If the provision is only designed to strike two individuals I am opposed to it for that reason. There is no principle in it if it is a mere strike at two men.

Mr. WITHERS. I maintain that there is principle in it, and if it happens to strike an individual that is not the object of the section. The principle is to require ten years' service as a professor in the institution before the professor can be entitled to the pay and rank of a colonel.

Mr. CARPENTER. In other words, a man accepts a professorship there under the existing law, knowing just exactly what his compensation is to be. After he is in his place you propose to strike his pay down.

Mr. WITHERS. As I understand it, no pay is stricken down by the section.

Mr. CARPENTER. I understand the Senator to say that Colonel Wheeler's pay is stricken down.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all.

Mr. WITHERS. No, but exactly the contrary.

Mr. LOGAN. It does not affect his case at all; he is not entitled to a colonelcy now; he has not served in the academy long enough to receive it.

Mr. CARPENTER. Would he not get his increased pay quicker without this provision than with it?

Mr. LOGAN. No, because he is a professor now, and it will only run as long as he is a professor. He did not serve in the academy prior to his being a professor; he was detailed as a professor at the time, so it does not affect him at all.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then it would reduce his pay if it does not affect the term of his professorship before his promotion.

Mr. LOGAN. It does not reduce his pay.

Mr. CARPENTER. I understand from the Appropriations Committee that the only object of this section is to strike two individuals; I understand from the former chairman of the Military Committee that it does not affect those individuals.

Mr. LOGAN. The professor gets a lieutenant-colonelcy, assimilated rank, and he can get a colonelcy by being ten years a professor. Therefore this provision does not affect his pay a particle. That is the law.

Mr. ALLISON. It does affect, as I understand it, two professors at the Military Academy. It may not affect Professor Wheeler, but certainly there are two professors, as stated by the Senator from Minnesota, who was recently a Visitor at the academy, who would be affected by this contemplated provision. I understand the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to provide simply that this provision shall not apply to the present professors there.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator from Iowa will allow me to say to him that it will affect the professors in one way. It will not affect their present pay, because the two officers to whom the Senator from Minnesota referred are now lieutenant-colonels. It does not increase or diminish their pay, but the law as it stands now will allow them to become colonels sooner than they will become colonels under the law as it is proposed to amend it.

Mr. CARPENTER. Colonels?

Mr. BURNSIDE. Professors with the rank of colonel. They will become colonels sooner under the law as it stands now than under the law as proposed to be amended.

Mr. ALLISON. Then it does affect them?

Mr. CARPENTER. Then it certainly affects them.

Mr. BURNSIDE. It will affect them in the future.

Mr. CARPENTER. It affects them after the bill passes; I did not suppose it would before.

Mr. BURNSIDE. They would become colonels sooner under the old law than they would under the law as now proposed to be amended. I think the Congress of the United States has a perfect right to make a modification of this kind, and I think it is a very just modification, because it is all in the direction of equality. It requires every man to serve as a professor ten years before he can be promoted from the rank of a lieutenant-colonel to that of a colonel; in other words, before he can receive the pay of a colonel instead of the pay of a lieutenant-colonel. It acts equally upon all, and I think the clause ought to be retained in the bill as it now stands.

Mr. WINDOM. I think the Senator from Rhode Island is mistaken in saying that it would not affect the pay of any present professors. The Secretary of War informs me in this letter that—

The Second Comptroller, by a decision of October 29, 1878, decided that the ten years required under section 1336, Revised Statutes, could be made up by service in other grades at the Academy as well as in that of professor.

The statement also says that the clause will first of all affect Professors Michie and Wheeler. The fact is, that by the decision of the Second Comptroller those two professors are entitled to the pay of colonels, and that Congress has not appropriated to them more than the pay of lieutenant-colonel heretofore; but the officers of the Treasury have decided that their pay was that of a colonel. I hold in my hand a communication from the Paymaster-General, dated February 14, 1879, urging the appropriation of an additional amount to make up the pay of colonel, to which he claims they are entitled under the decision of the Second Comptroller. So that, if this measure shall pass, they will not be entitled hereafter to the pay of more than a lieutenant-colonel. They are now, by the decision of the Second Comptroller, entitled to the pay of colonel.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Have they been receiving that pay?

Mr. WINDOM. They have not for two or three years received it for the reason that Congress has refused to appropriate it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. They have not received it for lack of appropriation?

Mr. WINDOM. For lack of appropriation; but the letter of the Paymaster-General which I hold in my hand insists that there is a deficiency which ought to be appropriated to make up the difference between the pay of a lieutenant-colonel and the pay of a colonel.

Mr. LOGAN. They have been professors there all the time?

Mr. WINDOM. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. It does not affect them.

Mr. WINDOM. It affects them in this way: the Second Comptroller holds that other service, as that of captain, for instance, at the Academy may be counted as part of the ten years. Counting that other service before they became professors, both these professors had served the ten years some two or three years ago, and by the ruling of the Treasury Department had become entitled to the pay of colonel; but this provision says that they must have served ten years as professors; so that if it passes they will get only the pay of lieutenant-colonel instead of the pay which the Treasury officers say they are entitled to receive, that of colonel.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I was led into a mistake by assuming that they had not served at the academy before they were appointed professors. It seems from the statement of the Senator from Minnesota that they had served there before their appointment to professorships. Under the present law, of course they would be entitled to credit for that service, but that does not take away from Congress the right to pass a just law placing all on the same footing.

Mr. LOGAN. If they become colonels by virtue of the law as it exists now, the fact that we pass another law does not affect them at all. If they are entitled to the rank of colonel as the law exists now, this measure does not change their rank one particle, and will have no application except in the future; therefore it does not affect their pay. No matter what the Comptroller may have decided as a legal proposition, their pay will not be affected. I have no objection as far as that is concerned to protecting them, but they are not affected in the slightest.

Mr. WINDOM. But if the Senator will allow me, they do become colonels by the law as it exists now.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator say they have become colonels heretofore under the law?

Mr. WINDOM. They are colonels now.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; then how would this provision affect them?

Mr. WINDOM. They have their colonelcies by assimilated rank.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course, that is the only kind of rank they have.

Mr. WINDOM. They are not in the Army, but they have become colonels by ten years' service at West Point, and they are entitled to the pay of colonel.

Mr. BURNSIDE. This proposed law will not affect them because they have already become colonels.

Mr. LOGAN. They are already under the old law entitled to the assimilated rank of colonel, I understand.

Mr. WINDOM. But this measure reduces them.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg pardon, it will affect only those who become colonels in the future. A colonel is not reduced in rank by this proposition.

Mr. WINDOM. The Secretary of War says this clause, first of all, affects those two gentlemen, naming them.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator read that communication from the Secretary of War, so that we may exactly understand this question?

Mr. WINDOM. It is dated June 16, 1879, and is addressed to me.

Referring to your telegram of the 14th instant, asking what officers will be affected by the last four lines of the fourth section of House bill 2175, and whether the clause should be amended, and if so, how, I have the honor to invite your attention to the following remarks of the Paymaster-General in answer to the first question:

"The clause will, first of all, affect Professors Michie and Wheeler. It will require that a professor shall hereafter serve ten years as professor before he has the pay of a colonel, all other professors having the pay of lieutenant-colonel."

The Second Comptroller, by a decision of October 29, 1878, decided that the ten years required under section 1336, Revised Statutes, could be made up by service in other grades at the academy, as well as in that of professor. So that an officer could, for example, be on duty eight years as captain at the academy, and two years as professor, and then be entitled to pay of colonel.

Mr. LOGAN. That is all true; but I submit to any lawyer in the Senate if the law, for instance, should provide that when an officer shall have served ten years in the line of the Army he shall be entitled to the rank of colonel, if he has performed that service he is entitled to the rank. Suppose, then, you pass a statute afterward saying that the service shall be twenty years before he is entitled to the rank of colonel, that does not affect the man who has already acquired the rank and has it; it only affects those who are to acquire rank in the future. Hence, if these two professors have the rank of colonel now, and have been paid according to that assimilated rank, they are not affected by this provision. If they have not acquired the rank by virtue of existing law, then they would be affected; but if they have acquired it by virtue of existing law they would not be affected. I only say this to maintain my proposition as a legal proposition, not that I object to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to protect these men if there is any danger, but I insist as a legal proposition that I am correct, and they are not affected, no matter what the Secretary of War may have said. If they have acquired the rank by virtue of the law that now exists you cannot affect their rank by virtue of this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.]

Mr. EATON. Let the amendment be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 4 it is proposed to add:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to the case of any professor now serving at said academy.

Mr. CARPENTER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary called the roll.

Mr. CARPENTER, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I must recall my vote again, as I voted by mistake. I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.] I am so in the habit of voting when present that I had forgotten the pair.

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Allison,	Chandler,	Hill of Georgia,	Platt,
Anthony,	Conkling,	Ingalls,	Ransom,
Bayard,	Davis of Illinois,	Jones of Florida,	Rollins,
Booth,	Dawes,	McDonald,	Saunders.
Call,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Pa.,	Groome,	Maxey,	Whyte,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,	Windom.

NAYS—23.

Beck,	Garland,	Kernan,	Vance,
Burnside,	Hampton,	Logan,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Harris,	McPherson,	Walker,
Coke,	Houston,	Morgan,	Wallace,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,	Withers.
Eaton,	Kellogg,	Slater,

ABSENT—25.

Bailey,	Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Bell,	Gordon,	Kirkwood,	Teller,
Blaine,	Grover,	Lamar,	Thurman,
Bruce,	Hamlin,	Paddock,	Williams.
Butler,	Hereford,	Pendleton,
Carpenter,	Hoar,	Plumb,
Edmunds,	Johnston,	Randolph,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope not.

Mr. WITHERS. I hope the Senate will not go into executive session. Let us proceed further with the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, seeing that the Senator from Virginia who has this bill in charge is in such good heart, so willing to proceed, although it is half after four, I venture to ask him a question about section 6 as it was, section 5 as it has come to be on the report of the Appropriations Committee. I inquire of the Senator from Virginia the meaning of lines 4 and 5 of this section, and I do so because some ambiguity is supposed by some persons to exist in regard to it. I observe the provision is: "That no money appropriated in this act is appropriated or shall be paid for the subsistence," &c., of the Army of the United States "to be used as a police force to keep the peace at the polls at any election." I understand that there is some difference of opinion as to the intention of that language, and I ask the Senator from Virginia to state, if he will, what he and the committee he represents understand it to mean, in order that I may govern myself, and others who hear me themselves, upon the question of offering amendments to it or not.

Mr. WITHERS. It would be an act of supererogation on my part to attempt to enlighten the Senator from New York, however good spirits I might be in. I have no doubt he is as fully competent, indeed much more so than I can possibly be, to give a proper legal construction to the language about which he has inquired. My understanding is that the language is plain, simple, perspicuous, and to my mind it conveys simply the idea that no money shall be appropriated under this act where the Army of the United States is used as a police force to keep the peace at the polls, my view being that the Army is not designed to be used as a police force to keep the peace at the polls, or for any other police duty, police duty being a duty performed by civil officers for the purpose of keeping the peace or enforcing civil laws.

Mr. CONKLING. Then may I inquire of the Senator, as he understands this language, should it be adopted, the Army may nevertheless be employed to keep the peace at the polls but not to keep it as a police force?

Mr. WITHERS. The restriction is as to a police force, of course.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator be kind enough to answer my question? Shall I understand him to mean that although under this language the Army could not be employed to keep the peace as a police force, it could nevertheless be employed to keep the peace at the polls?

Mr. WITHERS. The only provision of the section is that they shall not be "used as a police force." I infer that there is no further inhibition. If they are used in any other capacity than as a police force, there is no inhibition in the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. That is very well, but if the Senator would oblige me by answering my question I would take it kindly.

Mr. WITHERS. I have endeavored to do so.

Mr. CONKLING. I assume that the Senator from Virginia, as the organ of a committee or speaking in his own right, does not wish to secure assent to legislation under any misapprehension; that the Senator does not wish to do anything surreptitiously, secretly, or uncandidly——

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator may stop discussing that branch of the subject and assume that to be the case.

Mr. CONKLING. I was saying, Mr. President, that I assume that in the case of the particular Senator I address, and therefore I venture to put these questions. If I assumed the reverse, if I supposed that the Senator from Virginia wanted to keep me or any other Senator in the dark as to the meaning or effect of a bill he reports, then of course propounding questions to him would be a mere bit of finesse, a mere game of chess and dexterity in concealing ideas, and it would be hardly worth while for me to attempt to cope with the Senator in such a game as that.

Now, being confirmed by him in my belief that he is quite willing to be frank and candid about this matter, I return to my question. That question does not seek to find out what the words are in the bill, because I can read those myself. It does not seek to ascertain that they are the only words relating to this subject, because having read the bill with some care I find that they are the only words; but it is aimed at the meaning and effect of these words as understood and intended by the Committee on Appropriations, and more especially by the Senator from Virginia, the organ of that committee. I ask the Senator whether despite these words as he understands them, it will, should this section become law, continue to be lawful for the President and the authorities to employ the land or naval forces of the United States to keep the peace at the polls?

Mr. WITHERS. Does the Senator place that construction upon the provision himself, or does he wish me to answer whether I would place that construction upon it, whether they can be used under any circumstances other than those specified?

Mr. CONKLING. I was not so much in the act of stating my own impression as asking for the opinion of the Senator. I will either now or at any time, with the utmost frankness, state my impression; but as I have begun to ask a question of the Senator, if he will allow me I prefer to get an answer to that, and then I will answer any question with great pleasure.

Mr. WITHERS. I will answer as distinctly and succinctly as I know how, that in my view the construction of this section would preclude the use of the United States Army as a police force at the polls. I have also said that if they are not acting as a police force the provision would not affect them at all. I do not know how I can be more explicit.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will indulge me a little further, I will enable him perhaps not to answer more explicitly but to answer more intelligently to me. Shall I understand the Senator to mean that these words do or do not permit the application of this money to the subsistence and equipment of the Army while any portion of it is employed in keeping the peace at the polls?

Mr. WITHERS. If they are employed as a police force for that purpose, it does not permit it.

Mr. CONKLING. That leads me then to change the form of my questions. Does the Senator understand——

Mr. WITHERS. I would state to the Senator from New York that my individual opinion of the law or my individual construction of it is a matter of no consequence whatever. I know that I am not prepared to give in this manner the legal construction of any particular phraseology in an enactment. Therefore I assume that the law if passed will receive legal construction from persons much more competent than I; and having stated my own conviction and opinion as to the meaning of the phraseology, I do not think it necessary for the investigation to proceed further.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President——

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator from Indiana will pardon me for a moment, I want to make a reply in the nature of an apology to the Senator from Virginia. I should hold myself unfortunate indeed if the effect of asking that Senator a question has been to irritate him.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator is not unfortunate in that regard.

Mr. CONKLING. I thought the Senator answered with some asperity; at least with some animation.

Mr. WITHERS. I had none.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not intend to irritate the Senator from Virginia, nor did I intend to trench upon the usage of the Senate in inquiring of the organ of a committee making report of a measure his understanding of the effect of that measure. I supposed it was the common right of every member of a parliamentary body to inquire of any member of a committee especially, but more particularly of the organ of a committee, reporting a measure, the effect of that measure as understood by him. Meaning to keep within the limits of this habitual permission, I was addressing respectfully an inquiry to the Senator to ascertain how far it was worth while for me or any other Senator on this side to offer amendments to this provision.

Mr. WITHERS. I recognize the right of the Senator from New York or any other Senator to make such inquiries as he has indicated. The inquiry has been made, and I have given response, so far as I know how, directly to the point of the interrogatory. So far as regards the purpose or desire of bringing forward the provision, of course the Senator will decide that for himself. Nothing that I can say I am sure would in any degree influence his action in that regard.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, let me try again. Perhaps I can win the Senator over to a willingness to enlighten me, as he is abundantly competent to do, as to his understanding of the meaning of this language. Shall I understand the Senator to mean that, despite this language, the right of the President to employ the Army to keep the peace at the polls is left untouched?

Mr. WITHERS. Does the Senator desire an answer immediately?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. WITHERS. If the troops can be used to keep the peace at the polls in any other manner than as a police force they may be so far as this bill is concerned.

Mr. CONKLING. But the Senator answers me all the time hypothetically, and therefore I get nothing.

Mr. WITHERS. I will state that the whole thing is a hypothetical case. The inquiry being hypothetical, the answer must be so.

Mr. CONKLING. The inquiry is not hypothetical unless the Senator deems it a hypothesis that I say "should this language pass."

Mr. WITHERS. The inquiry is hypothetical when it is addressed to me to know if in a certain contingency such and such a construction would be possible.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, no, there is no contingency about it. I am trying to find out from the Senator what this language means, and he keeps reading it to me. He says if it is done as a police force, then it is prohibited. That is the language of the bill. I am asking the Senator not to assist me in reading that language, but rather to assist me in understanding what he means by it.

If the design is to say that the President may use the Army or employ the Army to keep the peace at the polls in the only way, as far as I know, that anybody ever supposed that under existing law he could, and to say further that he shall not employ the Army as an ordinary civil police force, or a judiciary police force, as it has been called, that is mere idle talk. There is no objection to it except that it is nonsense. If, however, the design is to say that the Army shall not be employed in aid of the civil authority as it has been heretofore, then the attempt is here to accomplish by one form of words what has failed when attempted in another. Then the design is to present to the Executive a bit of proposed legislation which he has already disapproved in two veto messages.

As I said, if I could suppose that the Senator from Virginia wants to hoodwink anybody about this section, wants to allow or induce some Senator to vote for it supposing it means one thing and discover afterward that it means the other thing, then I should not trouble him with questions, because I should know if I did that his whole effort would be to baffle my attempt to understand or to find out anything about it. Long before it was said that language was given to conceal ideas it required only very common, cheap ingenuity to enable any man who will to evade an answer to an honest and direct question. I know the Senator from Virginia well enough to know that he has three or four times the modicum of intelligence necessary to enable him to do that; but I supposed he would be willing to tell me frankly the understanding of himself and his committee of the meaning of this language.

I have no doubt what it means, and yet I have heard that in another place a serious effort was made to convince somebody that it only meant that soldiers were not to be used instead of watchmen, constables, patrolmen, and civil policemen on election day. I am told an effort has succeeded to convince somebody that really that was all this language meant. Did it mean that it is an inhibition of a thing which nobody ever thought of before, as far as I know, which never has been done, never has been proposed, and which may properly be forbidden for every reason except the inherent absurdity of forbidding any such thing.

On the other hand, despite some effort to throw sand in the eyes of those who read this section, I think it has come very generally to be understood that its effect will be to deny in the only sense in which the right has ever been claimed, the right of the President to employ armed force to execute the laws of the United States and to preserve the peace.

I am not going, however, at this time if at any time, to be drawn into a discussion generally of this section. At a later hour of its consideration, unless I am anticipated, as I hope I shall be, by other Senators, in assigning the reasons which have occurred to me against this measure, I shall venture to ask the Senate to hear me, not I hope at much length. But now gathering, as far as I have been able, the intention of the Senator from Virginia, I will offer an amendment or two to which I hope there will be no objection, and which will make this language plain, and make it mean that which I infer the Senator from Virginia intends me to understand he ascribes as its meaning. Therefore I move to add to the end of this section 5 these words:

Except in aid of the civil authorities.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I have waited patiently to hear the Senator from New York through. There are some imputations in the remarks he made of a desire to hoodwink people and to deceive people. That may pass. He is prolific in the questions that he propounds to this side of the Chamber. I ask him now in return whether he is in favor of using the Army at the polls on election day?

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator want an answer?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes.

Mr. CONKLING. I am in favor of executing, and executing when necessary by the aid of the military power of the Government, all the laws of the United States on all the days in the year, including election day, and at all the places throughout all the States and all the Territories of the Republic, including the places where the polls are held at elections on election day.

Mr. VOORHEES. Does the Senator from New York think that we have a law, or does he think that we have not at this time a law, that authorizes the President of the United States to interpose the Army at the polls?

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator want an answer to that question?

Mr. VOORHEES. I could have asked the question for no other purpose.

Mr. CONKLING. I think we have to-day more than one provision, both in the Constitution of the United States and in the statutes of the United States, authorizing and requiring the President to see to it that on election day at the polls, and on every other day at every other place within the national jurisdiction, the laws, and all the laws, are faithfully executed.

Mr. VOORHEES. I propounded the question in order to illustrate the perfect harmony which prevails in the republican party at this time, for a well-recognized leader of that party some place else, it is not worth while to say where, within the last four days, in response to the exact question which I propounded to the Senator from New York, responded as follows:

I think we have not—

That is, not such a law—

that we never have had it, and that we never ought to have it in time of peace.

Mr. CONKLING. Now may I ask the Senator from Indiana a question?

Mr. VOORHEES. I should be very unjust if I did not allow the Senator to ask me a question, having asked him three.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Indiana never would be unjust or ungenerous. May I inquire of the Senator from Indiana whether he is in favor of the proposition which I stated to him in answer to his question?

Mr. VOORHEES. Of course. I would not vote for the bill that is before this body to save my own life if I supposed it allowed any President, this President or any one who may come after him, to surround the ballot-box and interpose troops to control elections on election day. I believe in the American people and their right by virtue of local self-government, by virtue of that sovereignty which they have in their subdivided capacities to govern themselves on election day; and I would not on any consideration, earthly or beyond, vote for a bill which by implication or construction allowed the President of the United States to order the military—infantry, cavalry, and artillery—with shotted guns and fixed bayonets to surround the polls on election day. Whenever that hour comes I regard this Government subverted; I regard it overthrown; there is no longer a Republic here at all. The Senator from New York will get a perfect answer to his question so far as I am concerned. I would not vote a dollar, never have intended to, and never shall hereafter.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not intend to interrupt the Senator at all except by his permission, and not again even by his permission, but if he will allow me one moment I shall be very glad.

Mr. VOORHEES. Anything the Senator from New York asks.

Mr. CONKLING. I should be very glad to have the Senator from Indiana say whatever he thinks it proper to say on this point: I want to know—and I discover, by the conversation of Senators around me, that they as much as I want to know—which one of two things is true; whether this language in the bill is intended merely to say that the President must not put soldiers in the place of the ordinary civil police, but that he may send troops to the polls to keep the peace in any capacity, under any name, whether as ordinary police or civil police, or no police at all?

Mr. VOORHEES. I will answer.

Mr. CONKLING. The honorable Senator from Indiana sees perfectly what I want to know and I ask him to answer frankly.

Mr. VOORHEES. I understand the question and I will answer frankly. I understand this legislation. It is a recognition of the capacity of the American people to keep the peace at the polls themselves. I understand that the Senator from New York denies their right or their capacity to do that, or he would not be insisting on somebody else doing it. I understand this proposed legislation is a compliment to the intelligence and virtue of the American people. Our Government is founded on the virtue and intelligence of the people; our Constitution rests on that. Whenever either one of these ingredients fails, our Government fails. We say that we will not allow the use of the troops of this Government for the purpose of keeping the peace, and we do it because we have faith in the people. I know that there has been a party ever since the foundation of this Government that did not believe in the capacity and virtue and intelligence of the American people to govern themselves. It has existed always, and the old Federal party that was thought to be buried a half a century ago is stronger to-day in this body than it was in the days of Alexander Hamilton, and there is more desire, more demand on the part of the men for what was then known as a strong or high-toned Government than there was in those days. There is a more absolute denial on the part of members of this body on the opposite side of the Chamber of the capacity of the people to rule themselves than there was in the days when there was a party in favor of a monarchy.

What we propose in this legislation simply is that the American Army is not necessary to keep the peace at the polls where you and I live. Let the Senator arise in his place and proclaim here, to go all over this country, that the people he represents cannot keep the peace at the polls. Let the man arise here who will say so. Not one will do it. He would arise and say he wants to keep the peace for somebody else. You want to dominate somebody else; you are not anxious to declare that the people you represent need the supervision of the bayonet. It is the great question that shook parties at the foundation of this Government. I broadly and firmly believe that the people in their local capacity, in their townships, in their towns, in their counties, in their States are honest, firm, and true, and capable of governing themselves—the old Jeffersonian idea; and this doctrine of hurling the Army into their midst is monstrous, utterly monstrous, forbidden by the spirit of republican government, subversive of every idea of self-government, local sovereignty, or freedom in any form.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. Does he think the people are any more capable of keeping the peace under all circumstances at the polls on election day than they are on any other day of the year?

Mr. VOORHEES. Well, I will say yes, in some sense. Of course a gentleman sitting quietly in his seat while another is speaking can ingeniously put a question to disturb him, and yet I will answer yes. The Senator from Wisconsin asks me an appropriate and proper question, and I answer him that the people on election day are more capable of keeping the peace than on another day, first, for the reason that they are all there; they come together; the old heads are all there; the wise men, the captains in Israel are all there, as well as the young men, the middle-aged, and the stalwart; and, combined for the preservation of the laws and liberties of their country, why are they not better fitted at that time to keep the peace than at another time when they are scattered at their homes? The Senator from Wisconsin well knows that election day brings together the best as well as the worst, but the best predominates, the best elements of society are predominant; they are there in their strength; they are there early in the morning; they choose their judges of election, they open their polls, and there is no day in American history beneath the flag when the people are so strong for virtue and for right as on election day.

And again, they come together on that day to govern; they come together that day to be sovereigns, to select their public officers, to make their laws. In other words, they are there to rule; and why should they not be in a better condition to keep the peace than on another day? They are there, I repeat, to govern and to rule. And let me call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to a law of his own State that with all his legal acumen and well-recognized and highly appreciated legal learning he may have overlooked. I state to the Senator and to the country that in the wisdom of the Legislature of Wisconsin—and I make my profound bow to her wisdom—a regiment of soldiers can not only not approach the polls on election day, but they cannot be mustered in the county where an election is going on. Is the Senator aware of that?

Mr. CARPENTER. I am aware of that, and I understand that it is for the reason that the law will not permit military forces to be drawn out for muster for the purpose of keeping them away from the polls. We have another law in our State which requires the closing of liquor shops and all those places on election day, not because the people are all there, but because for other reasons it is well to shut out temptations on that day. I call attention to that.

Mr. VOORHEES. Ah, the Senator from Wisconsin does not mean to answer in that way. The Senator from Wisconsin does not mean to tell me that the law on the statute-books of Wisconsin that is there to-day prohibiting the mustering of a regiment or a company of military troops not only about the polls, but anywhere in the county, is because they should have permission to go and vote.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is my understanding of the object of that statute in perfect good faith.

Mr. VOORHEES. An impossible understanding.

Mr. CARPENTER. It is not impossible for me to understand it that way. What you called for was my understanding. Otherwise a democratic colonel might call out a republican regiment, and march them out to drill on election day, and slip in a democratic candidate, when if they were not mustered on that day the result might be different.

Mr. VOORHEES. If the Senator from Wisconsin will name one democratic colonel from whom a body of troops was in danger of being deprived of the privilege of the ballot-box, this may have the semblance of reason. It has not now.

Mr. CARPENTER. One object of that statute undoubtedly was to prevent a republican colonel from being as mean as a democratic colonel might be; that is, to prevent his calling out the democrats to muster when they ought to be at the polls voting.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is the merest badinage in the world. I state here to Senators, and they will not take that as an answer at all, that under a constitution which says that the military shall be subordinate to the civil authority, that great young State, in the spirit and interest of liberty, placed upon her statute-book a law which says that not only no regiment or company of troops shall be brought about the polls on election day, but that they shall not be mustered in the county; and the Senator from Wisconsin——

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator gratify me by referring to that statute so that I can send for it?

Mr. VOORHEES. Oh, I will send for it. I am making no mistake, for I have examined it quite recently, and I thought as likely as not an opportunity would be had to instruct and enlighten the public mind as well as the mind of the Senator from Wisconsin, for with all his great liberality and great legal learning (for which nobody has a greater admiration than I have) I thought the traces of party might keep him voting for these unjust, iniquitous, and outrageous measures that menace the free ballot-box of the country, and it gave me great pleasure to find in examining the statutes of every State in this Union that Wisconsin had gone beyond all of them. If the Senator from Wisconsin had given the true reason here that they were not to be mustered because they might be taken away from the polls, it would be queer that the law says they shall not be mustered near the polls. There would be a good chance for them to vote, an excellent chance, which would contradict the reason given by the Senator from Wisconsin. I would not say a disrespectful word of the Senator from Wisconsin, for I have the greatest possible respect for his abilities and for his general fairness, but I do not think that he has treated this question at all fairly or justly.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. VOORHEES. Of course.

Mr. CARPENTER. I wish to apologize to the Senator if my interrupting him annoys him at all.

Mr. VOORHEES. Not the slightest in the world.

Mr. CARPENTER. I understood him to say that he came out to instruct me and I put the question to him for the purpose of gaining the very instruction which it was his purpose to impart.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Wisconsin has certainly not interrupted me at all. He has asked me to send for a law to the library and it may take me a moment to turn to the statute that I allude to. I will do it if I can without trespassing upon the Senate as I have the book now.

Mr. CARPENTER. I will take it and look it up for the Senator myself if he wishes.

Mr. VOORHEES. I can only say in continuation of what I have said—and I mean only to detain the Senate a moment—that it is not wonderful that the State of Wisconsin enacted that just and wholesome law; it is only wonderful that every other State has not done the same. They have supposed they did the same substantially, because in their constitutions, I believe in the constitution of every State in the United States, it is declared that the military shall be subordinate to the civil authority, because it is supposed the civil authority governed better than the military. It is not at all remarkable that that statute exists in Wisconsin. It existed about one hundred and seventy years ago in the dark reign even of George II, when Lord Bute and that class of people darkened the world, suppressed the aspirations of liberty, retarded the progress of the human race. Even in that dark period a law was passed that troops should not be mustered around a voting place, they should not go there to menace freemen with their presence. And now the Senator from New York, and I believe the Senator from Maine—I generally catch him in bad company; I do not know whether he has been so this afternoon or not; but certainly there is a following and a support for the distinguished Senator from New York; he always has that—come here to revive a doctrine and principle of despotism that was repudiated and exploded really two centuries ago in the midst of one of the darkest, most retroactive, and reactionary reigns that England ever had; and because I uncover and bring to the surface a law on the statute-book of one of the young, great, and growing giant States of the West, in accordance with the enactment of George II, people seem surprised and begin to doubt their senses and want to get behind the screen, away back yonder instead of coming forward in the sunlight.

Mr. CONKLING. Who wants to get behind the screen?

Mr. VOORHEES. Well, I leave you and the Senator from Wisconsin to settle that question. At any rate I understood the Senator from New York to avow perfectly and absolutely his purpose to use the troops at the polls to keep the peace in and around the voting places on election day. On that question I make as broad an issue as it is possible for one man to make with another, for when it becomes necessary to use force to control the people in choosing their own servants—I will not say rulers, but servants to serve them in public life—this Government is overthrown and destroyed, and is not worth living for or dying for.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator allow me now?

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. A celebrated master of the law said that he would be ashamed not to answer a question touching the common law, but he would be ashamed to attempt to answer a question touching a statute without the statute before him. My impression of the Wisconsin statute was that it was passed to prevent calling the electors away to serve in a military capacity. Turning to the statute there is no doubt I was right although I spoke from mere memory and recollection. Section 646 of our revised statutes provides as follows:

> No muster shall assemble for instruction, review, or parade shall be held or called in any county on any day during which a general or special election shall be held therein, nor within five days before such election, except in case of riot, invasion, insurrection, or imminent danger thereof; and if any officer shall order any such muster or assembly he shall forfeit $100.

This was not intended to prevent the militia of Wisconsin being at the polls; it was to prevent their being called away from the polls, and it cannot be done within five days of the election because they might be called to a distance where it would annoy them to get back to the polls as soon as they would be required to vote. Now I have no doubt whatever from reading this statute that that is the true construction and the real object.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing for every intelligent person here—and that applies to everybody—to determine whether the construction of the Senator from Wisconsin or my own is correct. For five days preceding an election a military company shall not be paraded or mustered in any county in Wisconsin—five whole days, not pieces of days. If it was for the purpose of preventing some malignant officer from keeping a squad from going to the polls they might have let them muster a little while in the morning or they might have let them muster some portion of the day and vote the rest of the day. The Senator from Wisconsin will pardon me for saying that a more absurd construction I think I never heard of in a legislative body.

The people of Wisconsin have to work on the roads. Let me give some illustrations. They may be ordered out at any time by a supervisor for that purpose. It would have been well, when protecting the people of Wisconsin from being ordered to train on election day and for five days before it, for fear they would thereby be kept from the polls on election day, to have said neither should any supervisor order out the people of a road district to mend the roads, neither should anybody hold a protracted meeting, for religious revivals are about as powerful as anything else, and might keep somebody away from the ballot-box. Where a law is launched against the mustering, drilling, and training of men for five days from the election, the idea that its purpose is to keep anybody from restraining his voting proclivities is absurd to my mind.

I will tell you when this statute was born. I have no fear of speaking plainly. It was when that great sentiment for the liberty of another race sprang up in Wisconsin, when the fugitive-slave act in the Booth case was shaking the public mind, agitating the law-makers that were assembling together, exciting stalwart sentiments of liberty, when the Kansas trouble which invoked the use of the Army from another party that was then here in power gave warning to the young and rising State of Wisconsin, and her legislators went to a stout extreme the other way. That was the cause of this legislation that confronts the Senator from Wisconsin and compels him to make such an explanation as I regret to hear from his instructive lips.

I believe, Mr. President, I have no desire further to detain the Senate. I have answered the Senator from New York fully and absolutely so far as I am concerned, and I repeat my answer in closing. I have never intended since this extra session began to vote one dollar to military force to control elections. I see—and I may as well embrace the opportunity; I do not know whether the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] has seen it or not—a statement that I assailed the Senator from Ohio in some committee meeting or conference because he had advised this extra session, and had differed somewhat from myself afterward. Not a word of it, for the best and most powerful reason in the world. I embraced this extra session in the cause of the repeal, or if we could not get the repeal, the negation of the laws which allowed a President of the United States to surround the ballot-box. I was in favor of all the consequences of this extra session quite as much as the Senator from Ohio, and never one word of reproach has fallen from my lips because this extra session has taken place or because of any of the consequences. I say to the opposite side in balancing the question of back-down it will be their back-down and not ours when we close up. I have no fears of going before the American people on the question of a struggle to obtain for them, first, an undisturbed right to vote without the interposition of the Army, and next, to be tried for whatever they may be accused of before juries impartially selected. On those two issues I am ready to go before the people and embrace all the consequences and accept all the results, perfectly assured that if the American people decide against us on this side on those questions they decide against their own liberties, overthrow this Government, and there will be nothing left for freemen to talk about or contend for.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I do not suppose it is the desire of either side of the Senate to go over in any elaborate form the debate that has been twice had in this body on the general question involved in this amendment. What arrests my attention now at the very outset, especially by the speech of the honorable Senator from Indiana, is the attempted strain and effort to correct an imaginary and utterly baseless evil, and to overlook and pay no attention to one that is really a source of very great harm to the elective franchise in a large portion of the country. The Senator from Indiana never saw any troops at the polls——

Mr. VOORHEES. I did.

Mr. BLAINE. When?

Mr. VOORHEES. In 1864.

Mr. BLAINE. Was it that Massachusetts regiment?

Mr. VOORHEES. I saw two companies of a Massachusetts regiment in Terre Haute, my own town; and I will say further, that having failed to defeat me with imported voters the task was accomplished afterward in the shape of an election contest, for which the Senator from Maine is in no wise responsible.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course I do not doubt the correctness of any statement the honorable Senator would make on his own authority; but I never saw a regiment of troops do as much duty as that Massachusetts regiment did in Indiana. I have heard of it at every election and in every debate. It was in every congressional district of Indiana; it was in every town in Indiana; it voted, I am sure, at every shore town on the line of that State, bordering, I think, some two hundred miles on the Ohio River. I heard of it in a debate that took place of some local excitement in Maine, when a democratic candidate for governor in 1866 had all the affidavits about it, and as a concluding and conclusive proof he said, "if you do not believe this, I will show you the photograph of the colonel, and here it is." [Laughter.]

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Maine will allow me a moment?

Mr. BLAINE. This same Massachusetts regiment did duty the other day. I received a paper from Indianapolis, speaking not with perfect respect for my friend on the left, from Indiana, [Mr. MCDONALD,] but going on to show elaborately how he was mistaken in all the facts he stated and how they were absolutely impossible to have occurred in Indiana at that time.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to give him data now that will be a response for which my colleague and myself are responsible, and then he can go on and talk as much as he sees fit?

The Senator from Maine says that he has heard that in all the border towns of Indiana that Massachusetts regiment voted. If he did, he knew that was not true; but his producing that here is not a matter for me to criticise. But now I will state to the Senator what he hears on this occasion. The Sixtieth—if I am not mistaken as to the number—the Sixtieth Massachusetts Regiment happened, not at all by design that I know of, to be stationed at Indianapolis, and on the 11th—I think the election took place on the 11th—of October, 1864, they voted in that town, with the exception of a few of the number who went to a neighboring town to help the godly. Two companies of them were sent down to assist in the praiseworthy effort to beat me in the Terre Haute district. They voted there, and I had personal communication with them. My colleague knows of their voting and conduct at Indianapolis, and a thousand witnesses can be brought to prove what I now state. What I state is the exact truth and the contrary has no truth in it. My colleague and myself are prepared to make this statement good before the Senate and before the country and everywhere. It has never been doubted or pretended to be questioned for a single moment until irresponsible newspapers in the last few weeks came to reply to the statement made by my colleague on this floor.

Mr. BLAINE. The Indianapolis Journal is not what you class as an irresponsible newspaper; but I am not of course putting forth any knowledge of my own, for I have none at all in regard to what took place in Indiana at that time. I am only stating that that paper, not in any disrespectful language—for I would not refer to it on the floor of the Senate if it were that—goes on to show that the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] must have been mistaken in his facts.

Mr. MCDONALD. If the Senator from Maine will allow me, I will send to the desk——

Mr. BLAINE. I did not really rise for the purpose of bringing this case up into any special prominence.

Mr. MCDONALD. I have a letter from General John Love, of Indianapolis, who was the democratic candidate for Congress at that election.

Mr. BLAINE. I took the floor for an entirely different purpose. The Senator will pardon me for the present; I should like to go on.

Mr. McDONALD. Before that is read, I wish to read another letter.

Mr. BLAINE. The honorable Senator can wait awhile and then I will yield to him so that he can have full opportunity. That matter was only referred to by me incidentally. What I said, Mr. President, is that my attention is arrested by the fact that we are notoriously dealing with a case and trying to provide a remedy for a case that does not exist. I do not propose to go over the Army debate; but we are providing, I say, for a case that does not exist, and which every Senator knows is the very height of absurdity. The idea that the Government of the United States has troops enough to control forty thousand polling places! The statement of the case is its absurdity; and the whole effort of the democratic party has been to get up a sham case, to go into court with a case that does not exist in fact at all, and thereupon to excite the country. When the bill was up before, and I offered an amendment to it, the democratic party voted it down in every form, in three different forms, in which it was presented. My amendment was to cure an actual, an admitted, and a serious evil. Now, while I say that in answer to the challenge I threw out during the debate before, I have never yet found the Senator who could produce anybody who had been aggrieved in this regard. In the first place I doubted whether any Senator had ever seen troops at the polls. I did not assert that he had not, but I am very sure that there is no Senator on this floor who can say or pretend to say that any citizen of the United States was ever prevented from voting by a soldier of the United States. I imagine that I am entirely correct when I say that.

Mr. WITHERS. I will state that citizens of the United States have so declared.

Mr. BLAINE. Where?

Mr. WITHERS. In Virginia; in Petersburgh.

Mr. BLAINE. Were prevented by soldiers?

Mr. WITHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. They did not go into the town.

Mr. WITHERS. Yes, sir; they did. The Senator does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. BLAINE. And kept citizens from voting?

Mr. WITHERS. The statement was made that many citizens were deterred from going to the polls to vote by the presence of the military.

Mr. BLAINE. The information in regard to that case was called for, and the President of the United States at that time, General Grant, gave all the information on the subject, and I say to the honorable Senator from Virginia that in all the information and allegations touching that case there never was a suggestion that a citizen was kept from voting.

Mr. WITHERS. That was the statement drawn up by the contestant of the man who was elected.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, of course when you draw up a statement of that kind——

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator denied that such a statement had been made. I asserted that it had been made.

Mr. BLAINE. No, if the honorable Senator comes in here and brings in such a bill of particulars as will be found in the allegations of a contestant for a seat in the House of Representatives, he takes a very queer form of evidence.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator said unequivocally that no such thing has ever occurred. I have a right to state facts.

Mr. BLAINE. Did the House of Representatives find on the inquest that it had happened?

Mr. WITHERS. That was not the statement of the Senator. The Senator did not state that the House of Representatives had ever found that such a thing had occurred, but his statement was broad and comprehensive, that no individual could be found.

Mr. BLAINE. No; I said that no Senator on that side would say that any one had been. I did not challenge the powers of lying of the whole American people. I said that no Senator on that side would say that anybody had ever been prevented. Now the honorable Senator says that some person, eager to contest for a seat in the House that he had no right to, comes up and in his allegations says men were prohibited from voting, and on the inquest of the House what was the result of that? Did he show it?

Mr. WITHERS. I simply stated in reply to the Senator from Maine that there were parties who had said that they were so prevented.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not pretend to deny that half the democratic editors in the South have said it. Senators do not want me to talk mere nonsense here. Half of the democratic editors, and nearly all, I suppose, of their speakers in the South, have said it over and over and over again, have said it in my judgment falsely. I asked if there was a Senator on that side who would say that within his knowledge anybody was ever prevented. I did not say nobody had ever asserted it. That has been the whole gravamen of the allegation before us; they have asserted it, and asserted it, and asserted it, but they have never proved it. They have never produced a man who would come forward and say he has been prevented from voting by soldiers of the United States. Is there any Senator here who knows it? I will take the word of any Senator on this floor without question. I am sure no Senator would get up on this floor and make a misstatement in his place. What I asked was for that form of respectable and responsible testimony, whether a Senator knew or pretended to know that anybody had been prevented from voting by troops.

As I say, this in my judgment (and the country will, I am pretty sure, sustain that judgment) is a sham case from beginning to end, legislating against an evil that does not exist, refusing as the democratic party do to legislate for an evil that does exist, because testimony upon testimony, tomes, and volumes, and reams of it in official reports at the other end of the Capitol and at this end have shown over and over again that personal violence at the polls has kept men by the thousand from voting. Now you are legislating here that no soldier shall go to the polls with a musket in his hands. You want elections made so clear of all violence that you will not let the shadow of the United States power come in the person of a soldier. Now, while you are doing that, I ask to have fair play, just provide that nobody else shall go there with a weapon; just provide that at an election for Representatives to Congress nobody shall go there armed; just provide that red-shirted regiments, red-shirted companies, armed with weapons taken from the United States arsenals really, shall not be present. Just legislate and enact that when you are forbidding any United States soldier to be there, you will permit no State soldier to be there, and that you will permit no individual or combination of individuals to appear there with arms in their hands. Therefore, I am at least going to test the sense of the Senate on this point once more, and I am going to move at the end of the clause of section 6 to insert:

Provided, however, That any person who shall carry a deadly weapon of any kind, openly or concealed, at the polls at any election for Representative in Congress, shall, on conviction thereof, be punished with a fine not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, or with imprisonment for a period not less than six months nor more than five years, or with both fine and imprisonment at the discretion of the court.

When I wrote that amendment before, I put in "within a mile of the polls." There were some Senators who had constitutional scruples as to the right to do that, so extended. In deference to that judgment I have confined this exactly to the language of the section to which it is to be moved as a proviso, "at the polls." The section forbids the United States troops to be at the polls in any event; I want to forbid other armed persons being there. If you are afraid of violence or fire-arms controlling an election, let us have it impartial; and, if the Senator from Indiana is right in saying that the people are out that day in their might, in their majesty, that they are that day, best of all days in the year, prepared to keep order, then certainly there is no need for anybody to present himself armed. Then certainly there is no need of State organizations going armed, or private organizations going armed, or individuals going armed. I want to see whether, after all, the agitation on this question from the democratic side of the Chamber means that you will warn off the United States power from any ability to protect the voters who are choosing Representatives in Congress and that you will leave every other form of violence, whether organized or mere individual brutality and ruffianism, to have its sweet way at the polls and do as it chooses. I move the amendment which I sent to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ROLLINS in the chair.) The Chair will inform the Senator from Maine that there is an amendment pending offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not know that. There is no objection to two I will have it printed and move it as an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be printed.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, in a speech recently delivered by me in this Chamber I stated in substance that a Massachusetts regiment stationed at Indianapolis in October, 1864, was directed to leave its encampment, and that its members with arms not only prevented the citizens from voting but voted themselves. That was the substance of what I said. I should not now call the attention of the Senate to it but for the fact that a contradiction of the statement appeared in the Indianapolis Journal, the special journal of the republican party of the State of Indiana, which has been referred to by the Senator from Maine. I have sent to the Secretary's desk a letter which I received to-day from General John Love, of Indianapolis, who was that day a candidate for Congress in that district, and who has given a statement of what transpired within his knowledge. Before that is read I wish to say that I hold in my hand a letter which I have received from a gentleman in Newburyport, Massachusetts, which reads as follows:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., June 13.

SIR: Seeing this printed piece in the Boston Journal, I take the liberty of sending it to you, and to say that I belonged to the Sixtieth Massachusetts Regiment, and was in Indianapolis when McDonald and Morton ran on their respective tickets, and am conversant of many things that occurred that day, and there is good evidence that I can get that will agree with my own; and I think that the Journal is mistaken when it says that you have drawn on your imagination. If you think it worth while to inquire into this, I should like to hear from you.

Yours, truly,

JOHN BROOKS.

Senator McDONALD.

Mr. BLAINE. Is that the colonel of the regiment?

Mr. McDONALD. No, sir; he is an entire stranger to me; a gentleman who seeing this contradiction of the statement that I had made in the Boston paper, saw proper to address me this note, and I have requested of him his statement. I have not received any further statement, but expect that I shall.

As to the facts stated by me on that occasion, they were stated, as I said then and say now, from personal view. Governor Morton and myself were the contending candidates for governor of that State, and this regiment was there; they were hundred-day men; they belonged to what were called the hundred-day men. They were not there as organized military companies, but they were there as men, and many of them with arms. I will state further that the vote polled on that occasion was about half of the entire population of the city. We had a population then of perhaps a little over twenty thousand, and the vote polled on that occasion amounted to about eleven thousand. Now I ask that the letter of General Love be read from the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the paper called for.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

INDIANAPOLIS, June 14, 1879.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 11th, with reference to our general election in this city on the 11th of October, 1864, is just received. Until recently there has been no question among such of our citizens as were eye-witnesses on that day that a regiment of Massachusetts soldiers held, for the greater part of the day, as complete possession of the election grounds as do our legal voters at ordinary elections, and that they voted as often as they pleased.

There was nothing to indicate that they were soldiers of Massachusetts or Indiana. I only know that the general understanding was that they were Massachusetts soldiers. Frequent acts of violence occurred, such as taking tickets by force from democrats, and by the use of abusive language.

John R. Elder, esq., one of our most useful citizens then as now, was driven from the polls because he was trying to exercise his legal right of challenge, was chased through the streets, and his life saved only through the intervention and assistance of personal friends. My own experience recalls some soldiers who about the middle of the day attempted by force to wrest my tickets from me; that on each attempt when a crowd of excited men would quickly assemble I would retreat, and that finally I was enabled to leave the ground only under cover of a squad of veteran reserves whose commander I was fortunate enough to impress with the idea that my order (to form his men in line and permit no one to pass) should be obeyed. Under this cover I left the ground. For a democrat, under the circumstances, to have attempted to assert his rights as a citizen would have been of the same order of courage as the bull who faced the coming locomotive. I have talked to-day with Judge H. C. Newcombe, whose high character you well know. He came to my house very soon after the events just mentioned with a message from Governor Morton, (with whom I had been so long associated in the military affairs of the State,) and with his own assurance that if I would return to the court-house I should have protection. To have returned there would have been useless, as a complete demoralization had taken place, and as it was reported to me by friends that there was no longer a democrat on the ground—that is, a democrat in the sense of one contesting the election. If it is important to you, all that I have said can be corroborated by hundreds of our best citizens.

Very truly and respectfully,

JOHN LOVE.

JOSEPH E. MCDONALD,
United States Senator.

Mr. BLAINE. How many companies of that regiment were stationed at Indianapolis?

Mr. McDONALD. I think the entire regiment was stationed there at that time.

Mr. BLAINE. No; two companies were accounted for as being down in the district of my other friend then.

Mr. VOORHEES. They were detailed, not stationed in my town.

Mr. BLAINE. They could not have been in Indianapolis when they were down in Terre Haute.

Mr. VOORHEES. But the regiment might be stationed in Indianapolis and two companies detailed at my town.

Mr. BLAINE. It is said two companies were off defeating the honorable Senator in his district; I know that the common allegation was that they were all along the Ohio River; and what I wanted to get at was this——

Mr. McDONALD. Nobody has ever talked about their being along the Ohio river.

Mr. BLAINE. I can show you that such allegations were made. What I want to get at is, how many companies of Massachusetts volunteers, hundred-day men, who were not illustrious from any State for being veterans in the war, how many companies of that sort of troops did it take to hold Indianapolis in terror, a city of sixty thousand people, and those soldiers according to the affidavit did not have any arms, but were only there in uniform, not even in uniform my friend from Kansas says; they were hundred-day men; they had not any arms on; they had given up their uniforms; they were mostly convalescents from the hospitals, and two or three companies of those held the entire democratic party in Indianapolis so that they did not dare to vote, according to the testimony of that letter which has just been read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. McDONALD. The Senator from Maine is talking about that which he knows nothing about whatever.

Mr. BLAINE. I have only taken the gentleman's testimony.

Mr. McDONALD. The statements contained in that letter are not at all as the Senator has undertaken to repeat them. General Love says there was nothing to distinguish them from soldiers of Indiana or any other State. That is his statement. Not that there was nothing to show that they were soldiers. Up to twelve o'clock that day I was on the ground myself. When I went to my dinner there were but few democrats left there, and when I returned there were none.

Mr. BLAINE. These terrible bloodthirsty Massachusetts fellows had run them off the ground!

Mr. McDONALD. Indianapolis at that time was little better than a military camp.

Mr. WINDOM. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana why these Massachusetts soldiers were in Indiana at that time?

Mr. McDONALD. I only know the fact that they were there; I do not know why they were there.

Mr. WINDOM. I have a report on that subject and can tell the Senator perhaps.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will tell you why I think they were there. They were trying to recruit the negroes of Indiana to fill the quota of Massachusetts, as I remember. [Laughter]. They were out there trying to pick up negroes in our State.

Mr. BLAINE. As your constitution forbade the negroes to be there, that was a very laudable undertaking!

Mr. VOORHEES. The Constitution at that time did not take much notice of them.

Mr. WINDOM. There is a different reason, and if I have the floor I should like to give it. I will read some brief extracts from the report of Jake Thompson to "J. P. Benjamin, secretary of state of the confederate government," dated December 3, 1864, showing the reason why these soldiers were in Indiana. He says:

On my arrival here—

Toronto—

I heard that there was such an organization as the order of the "Sons of Liberty" in the Northern States, and my first effort was to learn its strength, its principles, and its objects, and if possible to put myself in communication with its leading spirits. This was effected without much difficulty or delay. I was received among them with cordiality and the greatest confidence at once extended to me. The number of its members was large, but not so great as Mr. Holt in his official report represented it to be. Its objects were political, its principles were, that the Government was based on the consent of the parties to it; that the States were the parties and were sovereign—

Something of the same ideas we hear in the Senate now—that there was no authority in the General Government to coerce a seceding State. The resolutions of 1798 and 1799 were set forth as presenting the true theory of the Government. Its organization was especially military; it had its commanders of divisions, of brigades, of companies.

In the month of June last—

the universal feeling among its members, leaders, and privates was that it was useless to hold a presidential election; Lincoln had the power and would certainly reelect himself, and there was no hope but in force. The belief was entertained and freely expressed that by a bold, vigorous, and concerted movement the three great northwestern States of Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio could be seized and held. This being done, the States of Kentucky and Missouri could easily be lifted from their prostrate condition and placed on their feet, and this in sixty days would end the war. While everything was moving on smoothly to a supposed successful consummation, the first interruption in the calculation was the postponement of the meeting of the democratic convention from the 4th of July to the 29th of August; but preparations still went on, and in one of the States the 20th of July was fixed as the day for a movement.

But before the day arrived a general council of the order from different States was called, and it was thought the movement on the 20th of July would be premature, and the 16th of August was fixed upon for a general uprising. This postponement was insisted upon on the ground that it was necessary to have a series of public meetings to prepare the public mind, and appointments for public peace meetings were made—one at Peoria, one at Springfield, and one at Chicago on the 16th. The first one was at Peoria, and to make it a success I agreed that so much money as was necessary would be furnished by me.

Through Jake Thompson from the rebel government.

It was held, and was a decided success. The vast multitudes who attended seemed to be swayed but by one leading idea—peace. The friends were encouraged and strengthened, and seemed anxious for the day when they would do something to hasten them to the great goal of peace. About this time that correspondence between our friends and Horace Greeley made its appearance. Lincoln's manifesto shocked the country. The belief in some way prevailed over the North that the South would agree to a reconstruction; and the politicians, especially the leading ones, conceived the idea that on such an issue Lincoln could be beaten at the ballot-box. At all events they argued that the trial of the ballot-box should be made before a resort to force—always a dernier ressort. The Springfield meeting came off, but it was apparent that the fire exhibited at Peoria had already diminished; the whole tone of the speakers was that the people must rely on the ballot-box for redress of grievances. The nerves of the leaders of the order began to relax. About this time a large lot of arms were purchased and sent to Indianapolis, which was discovered, and some of the leading men were charged with the design to arm the members of the order for treasonable purposes.

And when it was discovered, I will say to the Senator from Indiana, that these arms had been sent there to arm the Order of the Sons of Liberty, Mr. Lincoln ordered some soldiers to that region of country.

Treachery showed itself at Louisville. Judge Bullitt and Dr. Kalfus were arrested and sent to Memphis.

The day on which the great movement was to be made became known to Mr. McDonald, candidate for governor of Indiana, and believing it would mar his prospects for election unless prevented, he threatened to expose all the parties engaged unless the project was abandoned. Thus the day passed by and nothing was done. The Chicago convention came; the crowd was immense; a general impression prevailed that a reconstruction could be had, and that it was necessary to so far pander to the military feeling as to take General McClellan to secure a certain success. This nomination, followed as it was by divers disclosures and arrests of persons, prominent members, totally demoralized the "Sons of Liberty." The feeling with the masses is as strong as ever; they are true, brave, and, I believe, willing and ready; but they have no leaders. The vigilance of the Administration, its large detective force, the large bounties paid for treachery, and the respectable men who have yielded to the temptation, added to the large military force stationed in these States, make organization and preparation an impossibility.

Jake Thompson thought that sending those soldiers into Indiana prevented the uprising of the "Sons of Liberty" at that particular time, and we have the complaint made here to-day that a Massachusetts regiment was in Indiana for that purpose. Thompson proceeds:

A large sum of money has been expended in fostering these operations, and it now seems to have been to little profit.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from Minnesota allow me a moment? I understood him to say that Mr. Thompson alleged that troops were sent to Indiana to suppress the "Sons of Liberty" and he stated, whether he meant it or not, that he heard complaint made here to-day that troops were sent there "for that purpose."

Mr. WINDOM. No, I said I heard complaint that troops were in Indiana.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator said "for that purpose."

Mr. WINDOM. Let me state it distinctly, so that I may not be misunderstood. I said that I heard complaints made to-day that troops were in Indiana. I read from Jake Thompson that they were there for the purpose of preventing the uprising of the "Sons of Liberty."

Mr. McDONALD. I wish to say that the Senator has not heard any complaint that troops were in Indiana. The complaint he has heard was that troops from another State were there and interfered with our citizens in the election, and that they themselves voted. That is what he heard. Now, the Senator from Minnesota said that he had a report that would show why this Massachusetts regiment was there at that time, and on that pretense he has been reading this fable. That is all that it is, for I say that the people of Indiana through the war at all times were as loyal as the people of any other State.

Mr. WINDOM. Well, Mr. President, I have not disputed that. I was giving the authority of a rebel agent; I was giving the authority of Mr. Jake Thompson for the sending of these troops there. We had heard complaints that troops were at certain places in Indiana at certain times, and I picked up this little scrap of history for the purpose of showing how these troops got into Indiana.

Mr. McDONALD. Oh, no. The Senator will allow me to beg his pardon. The purpose that he has brought this forward for was very different from that; it was not to show why these hundred-day men were there. He had no such purpose as that.

Mr. WINDOM. Well, Mr. President, I apprehend that I know my own purpose, and the Senator has no right to attribute to me any other purpose. I am reading the authority of a distinguished democrat as to why these troops were taken into Indiana at that time. I am reading an authority of a man who I believe was the last democratic Secretary of the Interior. He gives the reason distinctly, which I have read; and I will read only a little more. In accounting to his government for the use of the money which he had expended, he said:

A large sum of money has been expended in fostering these operations; and it now seems to have been to little profit.

That is, the confederacy had wasted a good deal of money in getting up these meetings, these conventions of the Order of Sons of Liberty in Indiana and Mr. Lincoln had sent troops to deter its members and it had not amounted to much, and he was acounting for the loss of funds to the confederate government—that it was a bad speculation on the whole. But now I want to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to this point:

But in reviewing the past, I do not see how it could have been avoided, nor has it been spent altogether in vain. The apprehensions of the enemy—have caused him to bring back and keep from the field in front at least sixty thousand to watch and browbeat the people at home. In this view of the subject the same amount of money has effected so much in no other quarter since the commencement of the war.

That is, the Administration—

By compelling Mr. Lincoln to bring sixty thousand men from the front, as Jake Thompson says, to browbeat the people at home, I presume on election days as well as otherwise, as these complaints are made here, Jake Thompson says that more profit was made than out of the same amount of money expended in any other way by the confederate government.

I was induced to bring up this little item of history simply because we heard that this regiment was there and I wanted to contribute what I could to explain why it happened to be in the State of Indiana at that time. There is a good deal more reading of the same kind here, but I think I will not weary the Senate by going through with it.

Mr. WITHERS. You had better get in all the Rebellion Record.

Mr. WINDOM. If the Senator would like to hear it, I can read the whole of it. There seems to be a desire that I should read a little longer, and I will:

In July last Captain Charles H. Cole, of General Forrest's command, made his escape from prison. He represented to me that he had been appointed a lieutenant in our navy. I sent him around the lakes—

I will not read the rest, because it does not apply to Indiana, and my friend from Indiana would think that I was reading it for some other purpose than to explain why this regiment was there; but it is very good reading for any democrat who wishes to recall any of the events of that occasion to see why we were browbeating the people at the polls in Indiana. I will not read the whole of it.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, some time ago when the Senator from Maine asserted with so much earnestness that no Senator—I cannot quote his exact language—could state any well-authenticated case where citizens were prevented by soldiers from voting at the polls, I took pains to ascertain the facts, thinking I could satisfy even the Senator from Maine that he was mistaken. I thought I had done so. Some weeks passed, and now after proof was piled upon proof, record upon record to satisfy him and the country that citizens were prevented by soldiers from voting at the polls in many of the States of the Union, especially all along the border line, and I supposed that the statement never would be repeated in Congress, he rises to-day and as I understand him asserts that no man can now give any well-authenticated case where citizens were prevented by soldiers from voting at the polls. That is substantially the statement, I believe. If that is correct, then I propose to say that I can give facts so well authenticated that even the Senator from Maine cannot deny them.

Mr. BLAINE. In the case of citizens entitled to vote?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir; citizens entitled to vote. In 1866 the Kentucky Legislature appointed a committee to investigate the legality of the election held in 1865. Lee's army surrendered on the 9th of April, 1865, the war was then over. The election was held in August, 1865, and a committee investigated it. James Harlan, jr., the brother of the associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States and for a long time chancellor at Louisville, Colonel Frank Wolford, who did more hard fighting in the Federal Army than nine-tenths of the loyal men in Congress, and Benjamin F. Buckner, a major in the Federal Army and to-day the judge of my district and one of the ablest lawyers in the State, were three of the committee. They investigated cases growing out of that election—I have the report before me—one in the county of Campbell, one in the county of Garrard, one in the county of Bath. Here is the report in the Bath case. I will read them all three and put them on the record to show that notwithstanding the assertion of the Senator from Maine the Kentucky Legislature by a committee of men as loyal as he or any man on that side of the Chamber declared this state of facts. I will read one report and then give way to a motion to adjourn, but I desire this report of this committee, composed of these men, to appear in the same RECORD in contradiction of the bold assertion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. CONKLING. In what year did this happen?

Mr. BECK. It happened in August, 1865, and was reported to the Kentucky Legislature in 1866, after the war was over, months after the surrender of Lee, so that we get clear of the war part of it:

A majority of the committee on privileges and elections, to which was referred the petition of sundry citizens of Bath County, contesting the right of Lander Barber, esq., to a seat in this house as representative of Bath County, having heard the testimony and the argument of counsel, respectfully report that the following facts are proved in the case:

That at the Mud Lick precinct, on the morning of the election, John A. Rice, who (although a United States deputy collector of internal revenue and a resident of the Owingsville precinct) seemed to have acted as sheriff of the election, read the proclamation of General Palmer, and announced that, as the State was under martial law, he would conduct the election according to General Palmer's order, and when requested by Mr. Lacy, the candidate opposing the sitting member, to conduct the election according to the proclamation of the governor of the State, refused, reiterating his intention to be governed by General Palmer's proclamation. This statement was frequently repeated during the day, and on one occasion was accompanied by the significant remark that while there were many men present at the polls that many of them would not be permitted to vote.

The judges announced at the polls, and in the presence of many legal voters, that they had established a new rule, and that no one would be allowed to vote unless he could prove his loyalty "by two good Union men." Notwithstanding these tests, no one (with perhaps one exception) was allowed to vote whose name appeared on a list in the possession of the judges. The number of men on the list at this precinct was fifty or sixty, and they were not permitted (with the exception above referred to) to vote under any circumstances, notwithstanding many offered to take the oath required by law.

There were ten or fifteen armed soldiers present at the voting place, and one of their number, named Rogers, proclaimed in a loud voice, near the polls, that the next "illegal voter" who presented himself would be arrested and carried to "headquarters." This was about nine or ten o'clock in the morning, and the proof shows that most of the voters present left the polls immediately after this announcement was made, without making any attempt to vote.

The testimony shows that the officers of the election at this precinct, who are all members of the same political party as Mr. Barber, officiated at the last presidential election, and that nearly all the persons whose names were on the list were permitted to vote at that election without question.

Upon the occasion of Mr. Ambrose L. Wright offering to vote, he was informed of the "new rule" adopted by them. He appealed to the judges of the election as his witnesses, and, although they indorsed his loyalty, they refused to permit him to vote. The same man was rudely ordered to leave the polls by Rice, who seems to have assumed the entire control of the election. The testimony also shows that a few days after the election Rice boasted that he had done everything he could to intimidate voters and prevent them from exercising the right of suffrage.

The proof establishes that many legal voters at this precinct left the polls without voting, and that many, hearing of the state of affairs, were turned back before reaching the voting place.

This precinct contains, according to the proof, from 350 to 365 votes, and about 120 were cast—about one-third of the entire vote.

In the Sharpsburgh precinct the polls were surrounded by armed negro soldiers, whose commanding officer sat with the judges at the voting place. This officer read the proclamation of General Palmer at the opening of the polls and produced a list of names, about eighty in number, and the voters were warned by him that if any man whose name was on that list attempted to vote he would be at once arrested and carried to Louisville. The presence of the military and the manner in which the election was conducted prevented about 100 votes from being cast—about one-half of the vote of the precinct.

At Wyoming precinct a list with one hundred names, all legal voters except one, was produced, and about one o'clock p. m. Daniel Palmer and son were arrested by the soldiers present for the offense of voting when their names were on the list. This had the natural effect to drive from the polls many legal voters—especially those whose names were on the list. There are in this precinct over 300 legal votes; about 200 were cast. The proof shows that the presence of the soldiers, their conduct, and the manner in which the election was conducted, prevented at least 50 votes from being cast against the sitting member. The officers of election who presided at this precinct were also officers at the last presidential election, and permitted the persons whose names were on the list to vote without question at that election.

The only white soldiers in Bath County at the election were a company of State troops under the command of the sitting member. He had, a few days before the election, received from the officer commanding at Mount Sterling, orders to send a guard to each precinct to prevent illegal votes from being cast. Upon the reception of the order he communicated its contents to his company, accompanied with the statement that he would not execute the order as he was himself a candidate.

He gave his men (who principally lived in Bath) furloughs a few days before the election to go to their respective precincts and vote at the election. It does not appear in proof that the interference by these soldiers was caused by the sitting member. Nor does it appear in proof at whose instigation, nor by whom, the lists which the judges produced at the voting places were furnished. They came from "headquarters;" but from whose headquarters does not appear.

There were cast in Bath County, before the war, from 1,500 to 1,900 votes. The auditor's report shows that there were 1,491 tithables in 1865, and one of the witnesses says, that, excluding all within the purview of the expatriation act, there were at the August election at least twelve hundred legal voters in Bath County. There were 950 votes cast. Barber's majority was 30. The number of names on the list at Wyoming was 100; at Mud Lick, 60; at Sharpsburgh, 80; at white Sulphur, (estimated,) 60; making 300 in the four precincts.

The question presented to the committee by the proof is not, in the judgment of the undersigned, difficult of solution. We have no hesitation in saying that the election was not free and equal, and that if it had been conducted according to law in any one of the four precincts the result would have been different. Enough men in each of those precincts were prevented from voting for Mr. Lacy, by the unlawful manner in which the election was conducted, to have insured the defeat of the sitting member. Nor do the undersigned think that the affidavit of the sitting member, which was permitted to be read as evidence, can change this result. The evidence there recited consists in a few vague generalities, and is not responsive to the specific facts proved by the contestant's witnesses. For instance, the sitting member expects to prove, by John A. Rice "that he conducted the election at Mud Lick according to law." This vague and unsatisfactory statement should not be permitted to outweigh the positive testimony of several witnesses, that he conducted the election according to Palmer's order; that he refused to permit many men to vote because their names were on the list; that he drew his pistol and had an angry altercation at the polls with a voter, whose only offense seems to have been the pertinacity with which he demanded that he should be permitted to vote; and that he required voters to prove their loyalty by two Union men, &c. None of these facts are specifically negatived by the affidavit; and we, therefore, disregard it wherever it is contradicted by positive and direct testimony proving particular unlawful acts. We therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Lander Barber, esq., is not entitled to hold a seat in this house as representative from Bath County; that his seat be declared vacant, and that the speaker issue his writ for an election to fill said vacancy."

Respectfully submitted.

I. N. WEBB, Chairman.
JAMES HARLAN, Jr.
FRANK WOLFORD.
B. F BUCKNER.

Mr. President, these are reputable, loyal, and able men—I use the word able confidently as to two of them, Harlan and Buckner. I speak with full assurance of what I know, when I say, and the people of Kentucky know, that there are not five men in this Chamber of more ability than either of them—loyal men, officers in the Union Army, who fought through the war, they, speaking of an election held after the war was over, say that troops black and white with prescribed lists prevented men who were legal voters from voting.

The county of Garrard comes next, then the county of Campbell, adjoining Cincinnati. These I will read in the morning, and I will make the proof so clear that even the Senator from Maine will have difficulty in rising in his seat to say that soldiers did not prevent citizens from voting at the polls.

Mr. McDONALD. The Senator yields to me. I desire simply to say one word after the reading of this report, or whatever it is called by the Senator from Minnesota. So far as Indiana is concerned, it is mere fable. He says it was read by him to show why this Massachusetts regiment was in Indiana in October, 1864, and to justify their taking possession of the election polls on that day and those troops voting. That, I suppose, is what he read it for, as some justification for that.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator interrupted me; let me interrupt him to say that I read it for no such purpose. I read it merely to show why the regiment was in Indiana.

Mr. McDONALD. To show why these hundred-day men were in Indiana in 1864 in October.

Mr. WINDOM Why that Massachusetts regiment was there.

Mr. McDONALD. Now, I desire to say that General Love, whose letter has been read from the desk, was at the time the democratic candidate for Congress in that district, and he was also the commander of the Indiana Legion, put in command of it by Governor Morton, it being a State military organization raised and established for the purpose of defending the Indiana border. He is the peer of any man in this Senate Chamber, and so far as the question of his loyalty is concerned, it has never been questioned anywhere.

Now, if what the Senator from Minnesota has read justified driving such a man as that from the election ground on the day of election, forcing him to leave there, and virtually taking possession of the polls by persons who were not citizens of the State, then the Senator has furnished some justification; but unless it reaches that point, the revival of that report is simply to undertake to cast a shadow over the loyalty of a State that stands equal with any State in the Union in point of loyalty.

I want to say further, Mr. President, that there was not a county in the State of Indiana that did not furnish its quota of troops, and there was no part of the State that did not do its whole duty in the late civil war.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator from Kentucky having yielded to a motion to adjourn, I simply wish to state before the motion is made that, in view of the fact that this bill has been practically discussed so frequently, leaving so little to be said about it that was new, I had hoped we could get a vote this evening; but being informed by several Senators on both sides of the Chamber that they desire to be heard on the subject, I wish now to state that I shall to-morrow ask the Senate to secure a vote upon the passage of this bill before adjournment to-morrow.

Mr. GARLAND. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at six o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 17, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced its concurrence in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the fourth amendment of the Senate to joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) to repeal certain clauses in the sundry civil appropriation act of March 3, 1879.

It further announced the passage of a bill (H. R. No. 2252) making appropriations for certain judicial expenses, with amendments in which concurrence was requested.

HARBORS OF NATCHEZ AND VIDALIA.

Mr. ACKLEN. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BAKER. We reserve all points of order until after the joint resolution has been read.

Mr. ACKLEN. Certainly. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on Commerce.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to order a survey, and recommendations thereon, of the Mississippi River near Lake Concordia, Louisiana, and of Cowpen Bend, Mississippi, looking to the protection of the harbors of Natchez and Vidalia by restraining the river from cutting into Lake Concordia and Charenton Canal, in Saint Mary's Parish, Louisiana, out of moneys already appropriated for surveys and examinations by act of Congress of March 3, 1879.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ACKLEN. I should like one minute to explain this matter.

Mr. GARFIELD. We will hear the gentleman's explanation, but reserve all points of order.

Mr. ACKLEN. Certainly. The authority to make this survey is earnestly desired by the Corps of Engineers. Near Lake Concordia the river threatens to cut through the levees and by rushing into Lake Concordia to cause the cities of Vidalia and Natchez to have the same fate as befell the town of Vicksburgh. The State engineers have examined this question, and they report that unless some action is taken within twelve months the river will soon cut into Lake Concordia. This would entail a loss upon the State of six hundred thousand dollars' worth of levees. The Corps of Engineers here cannot make any recommendation until a survey has been made, and therefore they recommend that the passage of the act take place during the extra session, so that the State engineers, together with the engineers of the United States Government resident in New Orleans, can make the surveys and report back to the Engineer Corps before the meeting of the regular session in December. The joint resolution makes no appropriation whatever, but simply authorizes the survey out of appropriations already made.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is this the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. ACKLEN. It is the unanimous report of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONGER. What appropriation already made could pay for this?

Mr. ACKLEN. There is no appropriation made for this specific purpose. The appropriations are made generally in the river and harbor bill for surveys throughout the United States.

Mr. CONGER. Those appropriations are made for surveys which are specified.

Mr. ACKLEN. Precisely; and it rests within the discretion of the Department to apply the money so appropriated to such surveys as in their opinion are most important. Now they are satisfied of the importance of this matter and only wish the consent of Congress to apply a portion of the money already appropriated for the purpose of making this survey.

Mr. CONGER. Does the gentleman claim the engineers of the State are incapable of making a proper survey?

Mr. ACKLEN. They have already made a survey; and acting upon their report the Corps of Engineers here desire the authority to make a survey through their own corps. They cannot make recommendations upon the surveys by State engineers.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose the object of the gentleman is, in having this survey ordered, to make this a public work for which appropriations can be made, and for a service which in the opinion of this House is not proper for Congress to authorize, namely, the protecting of overflowed lands.

Mr. ACKLEN. No, sir; it is not at all for that. If the gentleman will understand the matter he will see it is to protect the harbors of Natchez and Vidalia, where the river threatens to cut through into Lake Concordia and leave them upon a lake; just as when General Grant cut the canal at Vicksburgh. Unless this survey is made and some action is taken the fate which befell Vicksburgh will be the fate that will befall these two towns. This entails no expense on the Government and the resolution is the unanimous report of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONGER. The only objection I have to the resolution is that it authorizes by law the survey of a work having reference to the breaking through of a river and the overflowing of lands, which is a great calamity undoubtedly, but which, with my delicate regard for State rights, I am willing should remain under the charge of the States.

Mr. ACKLEN. But the gentleman does not reach the question exactly.

Mr. CONGER. I think I reach very near the question. I think the gentleman from Louisiana will not dispute that what I have indicated is the ultimate object of this proposition.

Mr. KING. If the gentleman from Michigan will allow me a word I will say that I dispute it with all politeness and with all sincerity. This is not for the protection of the alluvial lands alone, by any means; nor is that the main object. The main object is to protect the harbor of the town of Vidalia and the harbor of the city of Natchez. That is really the object. If in so doing the protection of lands from inundation is incidentally gained, there can be no objection to that, I think.

Mr. CONGER. How can the breaking through of the river destroy property to the amount the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ACKLEN] has stated, of $600,000?

Mr. ACKLEN. Pardon me; I did not say property to that amount; I said it would destroy levees which have already cost that amount if permitted to break through. The lands lying just back are of no value at all. They are swamps, practically speaking.

Mr. CONGER. The levees I understand are the State levees and the lands are the lands which the levees protect.

Mr. ACKLEN. The lands lying back are almost swamps, and comparatively valueless. The object is to prevent the river taking another course and leaving the towns of Vidalia and Natchez practically upon a lake, just as the river taking its course through the canal cut under General Grant's orders left the town of Vicksburgh upon a lake.

Mr. CONGER. I have been at the town of Vicksburgh, and never noticed that it was left on a lake, or even a very wide river.

Mr. ACKLEN. It was left on an arm of the river.

Mr. KING. Has the gentleman from Michigan been at Vicksburgh lately? It is now on a lake.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose the object is to prevent the destruction of the levees.

Mr. ACKLEN. Not at all; and besides, this matter is left to the discretion of the War Department and the Corps of Engineers.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will allow me I will state that I have looked at this bill. Its result, if carried out, will be the laying before us facts so that Congress can judge whether any further action is needed. I see no objection to it, and so far as I am concerned I have no objection.

Mr. ACKLEN. I trust there will be no further objection.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 102) received its several readings, and was passed.

Mr. ACKLEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at thirty minutes past twelve o'clock.

CHANGES OF THE SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a privileged question. I submit the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) to repeal certain clauses in the sundry civil appropriation act, approved March 3, 1879.

The report of the committee of conference was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the fourth amendment of the Senate to the House resolution No. 1, entitled "Joint resolution to repeal certain clauses in the sundry civil appropriation act, approved March 3, 1879," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to said House amendment amended as follows:

In lieu of the sum named in the paragraph "To pay the widow and heirs of Hon. Rush Clark, deceased, to be distributed in the proportion prescribed by the law of descent of the State of Iowa" insert "$6,000;" and in lieu of the sum named in the paragraph "To pay the widow of Hon. Gustave Schleicher, deceased," &c., insert "$6,000;" and strike out from said paragraph the words "two years' salary."

And the House agree to the same.

JNO. D. C. ATKINS,
THOS. R. COBB,
JOS. R. HAWLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

WM. W. EATON,
WM. A. WALLACE,
W. B. ALLISON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. ATKINS. I call for the previous question on agreeing to the report.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to state the substance of this report before he moves the previous question upon it.

Mr. ATKINS. Well, sir, the committee of conference disagreed with regard to the amount voted to the widows of Messrs. Clark and Schleicher—Mr. Clark, late a member of this House, and Mr. Schleicher, a member-elect to this House. The committee agreed to strike out "$10,000" and to insert "$6,000," putting both upon the same basis. That was the only point of difference really of any importance.

There was a matter with regard to the payment of deputy marshals who took the eighth census, involving a sum of some $8,000 or $9,000.

There was also a matter involving some $4,000 for the payment of deputy marshals who took the ninth census, which sums were recommended to be paid by the Secretary of the Interior.

There was also a small matter of $83 for the payment of a young man by the name of Kondrup, a messenger to the reporters.

There was also a small sum of $600 or $800 for the payment of the salary of a judge of Dakota Territory for the balance of this fiscal year.

There was also an amount of about $9,000 for the payment of some parties from whom the Government had leased the Seaton building. It is a matter of damages and rent, which was decided by the supreme court of the District of Columbia to be due them.

I believe these are the only items embraced in the conference report. The only real question of difference in the conference on the part of the Senate and the House was in regard to the amount that should be paid to Mr. Clark's widow and Mr. Schleicher's widow. The committee of conference did not feel willing to pay $10,000 to each, believing it to be rather a dangerous precedent. It was objected to strenuously by some of the conferees on the part of the Senate, and as a compromise we agreed to $6,000. We did not feel that we could separate the two cases, although they did not occupy the same relation to the House for the reason that Mr. Clark was a member of the House and died in its service, while Mr. Schleicher, being a member-elect to the House, died before his term of service began; and from the expression of opinion upon both sides of the House the committee of conference did not feel that they could well separate them, and they agreed to pay to the widows of these gentlemen $6,000 each, feeling that in the future a law on that subject would be placed on the statute-book which will regulate the matter.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 2251) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, with the amendments of the Senate thereto.

The report of the Committee on Appropriations was read, as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2251) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, together with the amendments of the Senate thereto, having considered the same, beg leave to report as follows:

They recommend concurrence in the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 9, 10, 12, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 24, and 32.

They recommend non-concurrence in the amendments numbered 11, 13, 14, 25, 26, 27, 28, 30, 31, and 34.

They recommend concurrence in the amendment numbered 7, with an amendment as follows:

At the end of said amended paragraph, after the word "dollars," add the following: "For newspapers and stationery for the members of the House of Representatives, the officers of the House, and committees of the House, including $6,000 for stationery for the use of the committees and the officers of the House for the first session of the Forty-sixth Congress, $42,675 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

They recommend concurrence in the amendment numbered 8, with an amendment as follows:

Add at the end thereof these words: "And the clause for a foreman and laborers under the heading of 'Public Buildings and Grounds' is amended so that the sum named therein will read $24,000; and the clause for stationery, books, fuel, labor, postage, and other contingent and miscellaneous expenses, under the heading 'Court of Claims,' is amended so that the sum therein will read $10,500."

They recommend concurrence with the amendment numbered 23, with an amendment as follows:

Insert in line 8, page 9 of the bill, after the word "firemen," the words "at $720 each."

They recommend concurrence with the amendment numbered 23, with an amendment as follows:

Substitute for the matter stricken out by said amendment the following:

"That the fifth paragraph of that portion of the act of June 20, 1878, making appropriation for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year 1879, and for other purposes, relating to the District of Columbia, be, and the same is hereby, amended so that the sum of money therein appropriated to pay the workingmen of said District shall be paid to those whose claims are due and unpaid from the District of Columbia for work under the superintendents of the late board of public works, and also from contractors whose accounts against the government of said District had been paid in part or in full prior or subsequently to the act of June 23, 1874, and of those who have not been paid prior to or since said date by the late board of public works or by the commissioners of the District of Columbia; and the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby directed to turn into the Treasury of the United States any moneys now in their possession due or belonging to contractors under the late board of public works who have not paid their laborers or workmen: Provided, That if the said sum of $75,000 in said act mentioned shall not be sufficient to pay all such claims found to be due under the provisions of said act of June 20, 1878, and of this section, then there shall be made the required pro rata deduction of each claim; and the amount to be paid on each claim shall be paid and received in full discharge of the claim of such workman; and that no such claims shall be received, filed, or audited subsequently to the 1st day of July, 1879: And provided further, That the amount or pro rata amount found to be due to each workman shall only be paid as follows: if he be a resident of the District of Columbia, to him in person; if he be a non-resident, by draft on the Treasury to his order; if he shall have died, by draft on the Treasury to the order of his legal representatives."

Mr. ATKINS. I now call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the House that if no separate vote is asked on the various amendments of the Senate, then the question will be taken, first, upon agreeing to the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations so far as they recommend concurrence in the amendments of the Senate; next, on agreeing to the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations so far as they recommend non-concurrence in the amendments of the Senate; and, third, upon those amendments of the Senate which the Committee on Appropriations recommend be concurred in with amendments.

Mr. BAKER. I desire the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for one moment.

Mr. REAGAN. A separate vote can be had upon concurring——

The SPEAKER. A separate vote can be had upon concurring in any amendment of the Senate, or upon non-concurring, or upon concurring with an amendment by the House.

Mr. BAKER. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to this fact. It will be observed that the time within which claims of the workmen of the District of Columbia may be filed and audited is the 1st of July, 1879. That time was fixed when the legislative appropriation bill was originally reported to the House at this session, and had the bill then passed and become a law there would have been several months' time within which to file these claims. But when this bill shall have become a law the 1st of July will be almost at hand. I would suggest that the 1st of September be fixed as the time.

The SPEAKER. If both Houses have agreed upon that date, it cannot now be changed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand that the entire section was stricken out by the Senate.

Mr. ATKINS. The Committee on Appropriations propose an amendment to the Senate amendment. If the House shall adopt the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations, that will leave the matter in conference between the two Houses, unless the Senate shall adopt the House amendment.

Mr. BAKER. I have accomplished all I desire by calling the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the fact.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for a question?

Mr. ATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will not ask the gentleman to explain all the grounds of disagreement between the two Houses upon this bill. I desire, however, to ask him what has become of the question heretofore before the House equalizing the salaries of officers of the House and officers of the Senate for corresponding services?

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman ought to be apprised of the fact that that question was settled the other day when we passed this bill. It was embraced in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill which we passed last week.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If that is all the answer the gentleman desires to make——

Mr. ATKINS. It is a complete answer.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then I want to say this: the bill was passed under a suspension of the rules without opportunity for debate or amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I object to debate now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] yielded for a question.

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, for a question, not for a speech.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Before the demand for the previous question is sustained, I desire the House to have an opportunity to pass on that question.

Mr. ATKINS. I will yield——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The answer of the gentleman from Tennessee is not satisfactory to me. That bill was brought in here and passed under a suspension of the rules; there was no opportunity for any amendment or debate whatever; the bill was passed under those circumstances. This question I regard as a very important one. It seems to me rank injustice has been committed on the House and its officers. The officers of this House are compelled to do far more duty in corresponding positions for less pay than the officers of the Senate. I applaud and commend highly the efforts which have been made by the Committee on Appropriations in the line of economy. Its struggles and the struggles of the democratic House with the republican Senate of the four years past deserve the gratitude of the whole country. But I cannot commend action which will allow the officers of the Senate to receive 20 per cent. pay beyond officers of the House performing the same kind of duty. In my view it would be an act of no greater injustice for the Senate to compel members of the House to accept a reduction of salary below the pay of Senators than for that body to compel officers of the House to receive reduced salaries while the salaries of the officers of the Senate for the same kind of services are maintained at the old rates.

There are a few facts that ought to be in possession of this House before we dispose of this question. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] himself, about one year ago, eloquently and forcibly presented the very point which I am now seeking to bring to the attention of the House. I had the pleasure on that occasion of voting with the gentleman from Tennessee, and sustaining his view. The question arose on the 15th of June, a year ago——

Mr. ATKINS. How long a time does the gentleman want to occupy?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I do not ask for any lengthy time; I merely want to get the facts before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] did not specify the time for which he yielded.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have cold figures and naked facts in my possession which I wish to present to the House. There are but seventy-six members of the Senate, while there are three hundred and three members of the House and Delegates.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether this matter is to be debated generally?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I do not yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. HUMPHREY.]

Mr. ATKINS. I yielded to the gentleman from Illinois, as I thought, to answer a question; but the gentleman and the Chair decided that I had yielded unreservedly. I did not yield to the gentleman to make a speech.

The SPEAKER. The Chair made no decision about the matter.

Mr. ATKINS. I thought the Chair stated that I had yielded to the gentleman from Illinois unconditionally.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Tennessee will listen for a moment——

Mr. ATKINS. I will.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee yielded, as the Chair understood, to the gentleman from Illinois, to answer a question.

Mr. ATKINS. I did.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that the gentleman from Tennessee had yielded for a question, and was about to call the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to order, when the gentleman from Tennessee, having communicated with the gentleman from Georgia, yielded unreservedly as to time.

Mr. ATKINS. I did not intend to do so.

The SPEAKER. No time was specified. The Chair did not make any decision.

Mr. ATKINS, (to Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois.) You have in my opinion abused your privilege.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I leave that for the decision of the Chair and the House.

I wish to call attention to a document which has been heretofore submitted to the Committee on Appropriations. I intend to make no reflection upon the committee, nor do I mean any offense whatever to the gentleman from Tennessee. I highly appreciate the value of his efforts in behalf of economy and retrenchment. I have no reflections for any member of this House, but I insist that there shall be done what I regard as a simple act of justice to the House and its employés, an act demanded by every principle of equity. The facts presented in this paper show that while the Senate has but seventy-six members, and the House three hundred and three Members and Delegates, the cost of the employés of the Doorkeeper's department of the Senate is $74,384, and the cost of all the employés of the Doorkeeper's department of the House for like services is only $63,474—a difference of about $10,000. I wish to call attention further to the fact——

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, have I a right to resume the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair states again that he asked the gentleman from Tennessee how much time was yielded, and the gentleman made no reply. The gentleman from Tennessee is undoubtedly entitled to the floor if he chooses to interrupt the gentleman from Illinois; for he ought to recollect that the Chair cannot regulate the time which shall be occupied by a gentleman to whom the floor has been yielded without condition as to time by another.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am surprised that my friend from Tennessee should desire to prevent a discussion of this question after he himself yielded for a statement.

Mr. ATKINS. There are other gentlemen who want to occupy a part of the hour, and I do not wish the gentleman to occupy the whole of it. I want to occupy some of it myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee, as the Chair understands, claims the right to resume the floor.

Mr. BRIGHT. I rise to a point of order. It is, as I understand, the rule of the House as well as the practice that where a member having the floor yields to another simply for the purpose of asking a question——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Oh, that question has been decided by the Speaker.

Mr. BRIGHT. No, sir; it has not been decided. I say that where one member yields the floor to another for the purpose merely of asking a question, the gentleman to whom the floor is yielded holds it simply at the will of the original occupant of the floor, who has the right to resume the floor at any time.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is only a tenant at will.

Mr. BURROWS. A tenant by courtesy. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will remember that he is holding the floor and speaking in the time of the gentleman from Tennessee and by his consent. As the Chair has already intimated, the gentleman from Tennessee did not limit the gentleman from Illinois as to time; but the Chair thinks the gentleman from Illinois should be reasonable in that respect. [Laughter.] Does the gentleman from Tennessee now resume the floor?

Mr. ATKINS. I do not desire to take the gentleman off the floor if he will only be brief in his remarks. He has now occupied the floor already fifteen or twenty minutes.

Mr. REAGAN. Most of that has been taken up by interruptions. If the gentleman had been permitted to proceed he undoubtedly would now have finished his remarks.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will be brief and I will be pointed.

MEMBERS on the republican side. Let him go on.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish simply to quote the language of my friend from Tennessee delivered just one year ago. He then stated on this floor, and I felt it was greatly to his credit that he said it, [laughter]——

Mr. CLAFLIN. We cannot hear on this side of the House a word that is going on.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. What is it the gentleman wants to know?

Mr. CLAFLIN. Why, we can hear nothing that is going on.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the House will preserve order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will now proceed.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen who are standing in the aisles will be seated.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I hope I will be permitted to go on without further interruption. It will only take a few minutes to make the point I desire.

Members on the republican side. Print! [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman from Tennessee stated a year ago there was as much justice in the Senate demanding larger salaries for like services on the part of their employés as it would be for the members of the Senate to demand $10,000 a year for their own salaries, allowing to the members of the House only $5,000 a year. I say, he then announced a principle of justice. I am here to-day contending for the same principle that he contended for a year ago. [Cries of "Good!"]

I desire to call the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, very briefly to the comparative expenses of the two Houses. The expenses of the Doorkeeper's department of the Senate are over $74,000 a year, while the expenses of the Doorkeeper's department of the House are only a little over $63,000 a year—a difference of nearly $10,000.

What further startling facts confront us? As I have already mentioned, there are seventy-six Senators, while there are over three hundred members of the House. We find that these dignitaries of the Senate have twenty-four laborers to perform the labor of keeping the Senate Chamber in order and other duties——

Mr. STEELE. That must be because they are dirtier than we are. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The Senate have twenty-four laborers. How many do we have in the House? The record shows we have only eleven laborers in this House.

I now come to the question of salaries. In the Senate they have two assistant doorkeepers drawing a salary of $2,592 each. What is the fact here? The Doorkeeper of the House, one of the principal elective officers of the House, gets only $2,500 a year, and his assistant only $2,000 a year. The Doorkeeper and assistant doorkeeper are compelled to supervise the entire labor of the Doorkeeper's department of this House for over three hundred and three members, while the Doorkeeper's department of the Senate is only employed for the purpose of waiting on seventy-six members.

In the Senate they have nineteen pages. In the House we have only twenty-nine. The House pages have three hundred and three members to serve, while the Senate pages have only seventy-six.

I will not go into further details in reference to the Doorkeeper's department except to say the entire force of employés of the Doorkeeper's department of the House does not exceed one hundred, while in the Senate the number is eighty-eight. We have, sir, in the Doorkeeper's department of the House only one officer, we might say, to serve three members, while in the Senate they have more than one such officer to each Senator. Let us look again at the question of salaries. The employés of the House, having in some instances nearly three times the labor to perform that the Senate employés have, are reduced in their salaries on an average about 15 to 20 per cent. below the salaries of the officers of the Senate.

I will before I take my seat call attention to the compensation of some of the employés in the Clerk's department. The compensation of the chief enrolling clerk of the House is $2,250, and of the assistant enrolling clerk $2,000, making $4,250 as the entire expense of the enrolling clerks in the House. In the Senate they have one chief enrolling clerk at $2,592 and an assistant at $2,220, making the entire expense $4,812, some $600 more than in the House. What is the difference between their labor? I am told that the labor of the enrolling clerks of the House is five times as great as that of the enrolling clerks of the Senate.

Mr. BROWNE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has no right to yield the floor, as he occupies it by consent, to be used only by himself.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I come now to another point.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to inquire how much time he has?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee can resume the floor when he chooses.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am nearly through, and will finish very soon if I am not interrupted.

I wish to call attention to another fact. The compensation of the bill and printing clerk of the House is $2,250. The number of bills he is compelled to perform labor upon is sixty-seven hundred and ninety-nine. What do we find in the Senate? They have two clerks for this work, and the compensation of the bill and printing clerks there is $4,450, and they have only nineteen hundred and thirty-seven bills to work upon. I ask gentlemen to note the disparity not only in the labor, but in the compensation given, the Senate clerks having less than one-third of the work, and yet the pay nearly double the salary of the House employés.

Now, Mr. Speaker, from all these facts I deduce this conclusion: great injustice is done to this House or there is extravagance in the Senate. I do not ask that the salaries of the officers of the House shall be raised. I am not asking, Mr. Speaker, for an increase of salaries. What I ask is that the salaries of the officers of the Senate shall be regulated by the salaries of the officers of the House. But if the Committee on Appropriations and the House and the Senate are of opinion that the salaries of the officers of the Senate should remain at the rates fixed at present, then I insist in the name of common justice and of common sense that the pay of the officers of this House shall be placed upon an equality with those in the Senate.

I am in favor of continuing the struggle for economy. I am in favor of real genuine economy; but I am not in favor of confining our economy to the House. I want to apply the rules of economy to the Senate as well as to the other departments of the Government. I recognize the fact, sir, that we upon this floor stand nearer to our only sovereign than those who occupy seats at the other end of this Capitol. We are sent here freshly by the men who are compelled to earn by their sweat and toil the money which pays the expenses of this and every other department of the Government; and they have a right to be heard through their direct representatives upon all questions involving public expenditures. I contend for equality, for justice, and economy. And now, in conclusion, let me say I do not desire to have this bill recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations if it can be avoided, as that course may be considered by some discourteous to the committee. Therefore I trust the gentleman from Tennessee will allow me to offer an amendment to his bill equalizing these salaries; but if he refuses that privilege I give him notice now that I shall move that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to equalize the salaries of the employés of the two bodies.

Mr. ATKINS. It is known to this House, Mr. Speaker, what the gentleman from Illinois has advised the House of, as if it were not known before, that for the last three years I have endeavored to equalize the salaries of the employés of the Senate and of the House. The gentleman says that I made an earnest effort, an earnest appeal in that behalf. I did do the best I could to bring about that equalization. It will be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that the salaries as embraced in this legislative bill to-day for the respective employés of the two Houses are upon the same basis that they have been for several years past, I may say six or eight years; how much further back I am not prepared to say.

Ever since you, Mr. Speaker, were chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and while the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Holman) not now a member of this House was chairman of that committee, and while I myself have been its chairman, efforts have been made to equalize the salaries of these employés of the respective Houses. It will be remembered, Mr. Speaker, at the last session of Congress a bill was introduced to that effect. It was defeated in the Senate. The legislative bill reported at the last session provided for an equalization. The legislative bill reported at the previous session of the Forty-fifth Congress also provided for an equalization. In each session this was defeated in the Senate. It will be remembered, also, that at this extra session the bill as reported provided that the salaries should be equalized; but, sir, that proposition was again defeated in the Senate. Now, with these constant defeats, and with this extra session dragging its lazy length along, with no prospect of our being able to effect an equalization of these salaries, the Committee on Appropriations in presenting this bill did not feel it was necessary to go over the same work which it had twice, thrice, four times attempted without success.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the chairman of the committee yield to me that I may ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to ask if on that occasion there were any assurances given that at the regular session democratic Senators would unite with us in reducing the number and salaries of employés of the Senate?

Mr. ATKINS. I was coming to that. There was great anxiety on both sides of the House to shorten this session, and not believing that an adjustment of this particular item could be had at this session, the Committee on Appropriations, in my opinion wisely, passed it over for the balance of the present session with the view of taking it up at the next session, a resolution, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Georgia, having already been introduced and adopted by the Senate looking to the equalization of the salaries of the employés of the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. ATKINS. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If the Senate is willing to equalize these salaries next session, why should it not be willing to do so now?

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman from Illinois expects me to be omniscient, then he misses the mark a long way. I cannot tell what the Senate's motives are or what the Senate will do. I can only tell what the Senate has done; it has uniformly defeated every effort to equalize these salaries. But it has taken a step that I have just referred to, looking to the equalization of the salaries of the officers of the Senate and of the House. Whether it will do it or not it is for the gentleman to look into the future to see as well as myself. I am not prepared to say that I believe that they will do it.

Now, I will say that I am as ardent a friend of economy as the gentleman, and I trust that the lecture which he has read this morning to the Committee on Appropriations on the subject will be remembered by them, although I do not think they need to remember it, because I think it is the fixed determination of the Committee on Appropriations never to cease to agitate this question until the salaries of the officers of the two Houses are equalized.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will the Senate ever correct this abuse?

Mr. ATKINS. Well, I do not know. We have four times attempted the equalization of these salaries, and have failed. I have already given the reasons, and I do not care to repeat them. I have already explained to the House the reasons why we do not bring up the question at this time. But I repeat the declaration which I made a while ago that it is the determination of the Committee on Appropriations to bring about the equalization of these salaries if it is within their power to do so, and they think it is.

The present adjustment of salaries is manifestly unjust. It was not necessary that the gentleman from Illinois should inform the House this morning that there was an inequality between the pay of the officers of the Senate and of the House. That has been announced time and again by the Committee on Appropriations. The idea is not new. It did not originate with the gentleman from Illinois that this reform should be had. If it is original at all with anybody, as far as he is concerned, it originated with the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Appropriations have time and time again taken action upon the subject.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Allow me to say that I know that this abuse has grown up under radical legislation.

Mr. ATKINS. I would rather not enter into any remarks upon this subject, for I do not know where the discussion would end. I would rather the gentleman would not enter into a discussion, for I do not know where the gentleman would end. If he wants to ask me a question I will answer.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am aware of the fact that this whole system was fixed by the republican party when they were in power, but I desire now, when the democratic party has come into power, to reduce these salaries so that we may accomplish practical economy.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not see any question in that.

Mr. HUMPHREY. There is no question in what was said; it is an attack upon our side of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question or two, and the first is whether there has been anything added to this bill of a political character?

Mr. ATKINS. Nothing at all.

Mr. GARFIELD. My second suggestion is in regard to what I believe is the sixth or seventh amendment. I noticed from the reading that an appropriation was made for stationery and newspapers for members. I wish to ask the gentleman why the word "newspapers" comes in there? As I understand the law, members are not entitled to newspapers.

Mr. ATKINS. We simply followed the formula of the existing law, which came down, I believe, from the gentleman's time.

Mr. GARFIELD. In my time we left out all these perquisites and the allowance of $125 a year for stationery.

Mr. ATKINS. I believe the word "newspapers" is in the statute.

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, I hardly think it ought to be there; there is no authority for it. Members are allowed no newspapers as they formerly were.

Mr. ATKINS. I know that; but the word "newspapers" is embraced in the statute. The newspaper clerk used to be in the habit of subscribing for newspapers for members, and sometimes paid it out of this fund.

Mr. GARFIELD. He may do that now. Of course the law does not give us newspapers.

Mr. ATKINS. Of course not. When the gentleman from Ohio called my attention to that particular paragraph in the bill, I was about to allude to it, so that the House might not be deceived as to what is in the bill. That is the principal amendment in the bill. We have provided forty-two thousand and some odd dollars for the usual stationery for members of the House and Senate for each session. The law entitles them to stationery for each session—not for each regular session—and I desire the House to understand that that provision is embraced in the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to me for a few moments? I desire to call the attention of the House to one or two things in this report.

Mr. ATKINS. How long does the gentleman want?

Mr. REAGAN. About five minutes. I ask the Clerk to read that portion of the report of the committee of conference that relates to the pay of laborers in this city.

The Clerk read the clause of the report of the committee of conference relating to the pay of laborers in the District of Columbia.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that this, as I understand it, is a gratuity given to the citizens of this District, and I would desire very much to see this provision stricken out from the report; and if it be necessary to recommit the report to attain that end I desire to see it done.

Mr. CLYMER. Then vote down that amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to ask why it is that we propose to give gratuities to laborers in this city when we have no such gratuities to give to people elsewhere?

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman allow me one remark?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. ATKINS. This sum of $75,000 for this purpose was appropriated two years ago, I believe. These laborers have not been able to draw their money on account of some informalities and difficulties connected with the execution of the law. This is not an original appropriation at this time; the appropriation has already been made.

Mr. REAGAN. It is a proposition to pay that amount as a gratuity, and I object to regarding this District as a lazar-house. It is unjust, impolitic, and improper. If this amount is to be paid merely for the purpose of securing the favor of the mob, to pay them a price for their favor, then it is costing too much, besides not being the proper principle to act upon. If it is intended as a charity, then allow me to say that this Government is not an eleemosynary establishment, never was so intended, and never has been so recognized. I want in some form to enter my protest against either regarding this Government as an eleemosynary establishment, or the money in the Treasury as a fund to be peddled out for the purpose of securing political support for anybody. The whole thing in every aspect is wrong, and ought to be omitted entirely from this bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I concur entirely in the opposition of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to this provision, or to this character of legislation; but, as has already been stated by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] this money was appropriated in the appropriation bill for the fiscal year of 1879. Then was the time to object to it. It does not originate at all with this Congress.

Mr. REAGAN. If my friend will allow me, I will say that the money is now in the Treasury; it belongs to the people. I would not be an agent in taking money improperly out of the Treasury for an improper purpose. Any time will do to arrest this improper use of the public money, if we are influenced by a regard for just principles of economy.

Mr. BLOUNT. So far as that proposition is concerned I concur entirely with the gentleman from Texas, and I think that the Committee on Appropriations of this House are very much in accord with him. The probability is that when we shall meet in conference with the Senate conferees there will be a result reached to which the gentleman from Texas will not object. The object of this proposition was simply to enable us to review the whole subject in conference—that, and nothing more. That being the case, I trust the House will see fit to accept the report of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Do you think that item is correct and should be agreed to?

Mr. BLOUNT. So far as I am individually concerned I will say that I did not think it correct when the original bill was passed, and I do not think so now.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then why are you in favor of adopting it now?

Mr. BLOUNT. There are two classes of claims embraced in this provision; one class is just and proper, and the other class is improper. That is the reason why we should non-concur in the Senate amendment.

The first class relates to cases where Congress required that the contractors who had not paid their laborers should not themselves be paid, but that the money due them should be retained in the Treasury for the purpose of paying their laborers. I apprehend that no gentleman, neither the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] nor the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] will object to this Government seeing that the laborers are not defrauded by those contractors.

Mr. REAGAN. Will it not——

Mr. BLOUNT. I will yield to the gentleman directly, not now. There is another class of claimants, where the Government has paid the contractors and the contractors have not paid their laborers. The proposition is that the Government shall pay twice for the same work, shall pay the laborers after having paid the contractors. To this I am as much opposed as either of those gentlemen, and I am sure I am in accord with the Committee on Appropriations on that point. But I think it right that we should non-concur in this Senate amendment, in order that we may have a conference with the Senate and agree upon some proposition which will pay those who ought to be paid, and will strike out of this provision what is wrong.

Mr. VANCE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question.

Mr. ATKINS. Very well.

Mr. VANCE. Has the item of $10,000 for a library for the Patent Office been inserted in the bill?

Mr. ATKINS. It has not been.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, as he has heretofore suggested, will submit the question first upon the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations to concur in certain amendments of the Senate.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire a separate vote on the amendment recommended by the Committee on Appropriations giving $125 to each member for stationery for this extra session of Congress.

The SPEAKER. That amendment comes within the third class as indicated by the Chair, amendments of the Senate to be concurred in with amendments.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to offer an amendment to the ninth amendment of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is that in the first class?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. It is amendment of the Senate No. 9, in which the Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence.

The SPEAKER. Then the question will be first taken upon agreeing to those amendments of the Senate which the Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence in, with the exception of amendment No. 9, indicated by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.]

The question was taken; and the recommendation of the committee was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon concurring in the ninth amendment of the Senate.

The ninth amendment of the Senate was, to insert the following:

And the clause for contingent and miscellaneous expenses of the Patent Office is amended so that the sum named therein shall read $35,000.

Mr. CANNON. I move to concur in that amendment with an amendment, to add thereto the following:

For a scientific library for the Patent Office, $5,000.

Mr. ATKINS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman accepts the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot accept it; the House must act upon it.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, and upon a division there were—ayes 53, noes 41.

Mr. REAGAN. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, and Mr. REAGAN were appointed.

Mr. BAKER. This is right; it was agreed to by the Committee on Appropriations, and I hope it will not be objected to.

The SPEAKER. It must be disposed of by the House.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 101, noes 30.

Mr. REAGAN, (one of the tellers.) I will not insist upon the point of order that no quorum voted.

No further count being called for, the ninth amendment of the Senate was concurred in with an amendment.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The next class of amendments, those in which the Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence, will next be voted on.

The question being taken, the amendments in which the committee recommended non-concurrence were non-concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The third class of amendments, those in which the Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence with amendments, will now be voted on.

The amendment proposed by the committee to the seventh amendment of the Senate (on which a separate vote was demanded by Mr. THOMPSON) was read, as follows:

At the end of said amended paragraph, after the word "dollars," in line 24, page 3, add the following:

For newspapers and stationery for members of the House of Representatives, officers of the House, and committees of the House, including $6,000 for stationery for the use of the committees and officers of the House for the first session of the Forth-sixth Congress, $42,675 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations was adopted, and the amendment of the Senate, as thus amended, was concurred in.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment, as amended, was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The remaining amendments of the Senate, in which the Committee on Appropriations recommended concurrence with amendments, were then concurred in with the amendments respectively recommended.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the votes by which the amendments were severally concurred in with amendments; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JUDICIAL EXPENSES.

Mr. McMAHON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table, for reference to the Committee on Appropriations, a bill returned by the Senate with amendments (H. R. No. 2252) making appropriations for certain judicial expenses.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table and referred, with the amendments, to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McMAHON moved to reconsider the action just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OFFICIAL CONTRIBUTIONS FOR POLITICAL PURPOSES.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at twenty minutes before two o'clock. The unfinished business of the morning hour is the bill (H. R. No. 2266) to prohibit Federal officers, claimants, and contractors from making contributions for political purposes. The pending question is the demand of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOSTETLER] for the previous question on agreeing to the substitute recommended by the committee.

Mr. McLANE. I ask the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOSTETLER,] chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform, to withdraw for a moment his call for the previous question that we may endeavor to have some agreement as to the disposition of this bill.

Mr. HOSTETLER. I take pleasure in complying with the gentleman's request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana withdraws the call for the previous question, and yields to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] for how long?

Mr. HOSTETLER. For whatever time he may want.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. McLANE. Mr. Speaker, as I introduced and had referred to the committee the original bill for which they have reported a substitute, I wish to ascertain whether the other side of the House will agree that the bill shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole. I take it for granted the House will agree to some disposition of the bill. If the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] will allow me to refer to him, as he objected originally when the bill was reported, I will take the liberty of asking (as I am interested in the bill and desire its passage, and being quite ready to consult the convenience of the House) whether he is willing to consider this bill at all, and if so, how and when?

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I can only say for myself that I consider this bill the most infamous attack upon the rights of American citizens that I have ever known to be presented in this House. I desire to say further that it is the most infamous attack upon a political party that has within my knowledge been presented here. Without proposing to apply its provisions to the officers of States, of counties, of municipalities, where they should be applied, if they should be applied in the cases here proposed, gentlemen have the effrontery to attack the party to which I belong, and propose to restrict every member of that party from expressing his political views in such way as he chooses and aiding by such means as he prefers to use the establishment of what I consider to be the only principles which can save this country. That is the infamy of this bill; and on this side of the House, I tell the gentleman, we desire to keep it before the country as an exhibition of the infamous purposes and policy of southern gentlemen, aided by their northern allies, to suppress in the North by law, as they have in the South by violence, the expression of the honest sentiment of the republicans in the country.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I withdraw it.

Mr. McLANE. I asked the gentleman from Michigan a question, and I am waiting with all proper patience for his answer.

Mr. CONGER. I am answering in my feeble way. [Laughter.]

Mr. McLANE. Answer my question.

Mr. CONGER. I will conclude my answer and give the reason why if the gentleman has no objection.

Mr. McLANE. The time yielded to me by my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOSTETLER] I propose to use myself, and I have already stated so to the House.

Mr. CONGER. If it is possible that I have said anything to the House which could be in the least offensive to the gentleman on the other side I must repent of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. ACKLEN. Everything you say is generally offensive. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Louisiana has expressed an opinion of my remarks.

Mr. ACKLEN. He has, and will maintain it.

Mr. CONGER. I am grateful to the gentleman for disagreeing with me. It will raise me in the estimation of my constituents and all northern gentlemen that we do not agree. [Laughter.]

Mr. McLANE. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] to have answered my question substantially thus: that he is not willing to consider this bill at all. Now, sir, if I have ever been disposed to have any respect for the political professions of the honorable gentleman from Michigan; if I had supposed for one moment that he or the honorable gentlemen with whom he is associated on that side of the House were ever sincere in their professions of a desire to purify the politics of this country, I might be somewhat surprised at the manner in which the gentlemen have received this bill; but believing as I do that whatever they have of political prestige and power results from the corruption which they have fastened upon the country, results from the exercise of illicit and improper power, and more directly from the use and from the abuse of Federal patronage, believing that the honorable gentleman from Michigan perfectly well understands that is one great secret of success for him and for his party, I am not surprised that he objects to a bill which will curtail that power.

I take not only no exception to the manner of his objection, which, so far as I have any judgment to pass upon it, is perfectly courteous and perfectly proper, but believing that I have the right to read his motives, believing it is perfectly my right to set aside his professions and to judge him by his conduct, believing that is my right, I have no hesitation at all in telling him I am not in the slightest degree surprised that he objects to the consideration of this bill.

Why, sir, if it were not for the political abuses practiced by the republican party in the patronage of the Government, the heavy assessments which they have put upon the office-holders, the enormous sums of money which they have collected and corruptly expended, they would not to-day hold possession of the executive of this country. One great element of their success was the use of that Federal patronage. I shall not take time to read this report which has been handed to me, because the newspapers have day by day given us the testimony of the executive committee of the republican party, and we can there find an account of how much money they did collect. Half a million of dollars would not, in my opinion, exceed the sum they collected from the Federal office-holders; and when we sit upon this floor and hear the gentleman from Michigan turn his face to this side of the House and talk about infamous propositions, it is our right to analyze the proposition itself and to see whether the proposition be honorable and just and reasonable, and whether it is not he himself who is obnoxious to the charge of an infamous political purpose when he proposes to defeat that bill. [Applause on the democratic side.] That is the logical conclusion from what he says.

He says it is an infamous political purpose. Now, the bill itself proposes what everybody whom I have ever heard appeal to the country, of either party, declares to be honorable and right, and if I could find in the whole public life of the President of the United States, "so called," as gentlemen are in the habit of styling him—if I could find in his whole political life any political trait more honorable than another, it is his profession that he desired thus to reform the public service; that he desired to confine the Federal office-holder to his duty as an office-holder and not to permit him to carry his influence and his money into the electioneering schemes of the day. Take the republican party of Michigan or any other State. Let that honorable gentleman deny to me if he can that in that State and in every other State it has been the boast of the republican party they desired thus to reform the public service. And the conduct of that honorable gentleman in opposing the consideration of this bill admonishes the country how much respect he is entitled to in his political professions. Sir, he cannot escape the judgment of facts. No amount of political assurance can relieve him from what the facts put upon him. He is not at liberty to stand on that side of the House and look to this and talk about infamous propositions and infamous bills. Yet he is well taught to do it, because from the beginning of this session to the present day more than one honorable gentleman on that side of the House has talked about the frauds and the low morality of the political party that sits with its representation here on this side.

Sir, I listened in amazement to think that any honorable gentleman sitting on that side of the House dare talk about political frauds or take the moral of any question. Never in the history of this country has it been so entirely put beyond the right of a political party to assume to itself political virtue. I would not say it if I did not think it and if I did not know it to be susceptible of proof. It is not simply your electoral fraud; it is not simply because you availed yourselves of the disorder, of the anarchy which reigned in the South to corrupt the electioneering machinery of Southern States. Monstrous as that fraud was it was a fraud sanctioned by law. It was the mode prescribed by Congress of counting the electoral vote that involved us in that abuse. But greatly in its enormity beyond that fraud is the political corruption which you have fastened upon this country; and for eight long years you have made it a scandal in this country and in every other country.

You stood in this House impeaching your highest Federal officers, for no impeachment could have been passed without the support of the republican party as well as the democratic party; and you carried your Federal officers, the highest in the country, to the other end of this Capitol. And if you did not convict you acquitted upon a technicality. I say again, in your career as a political party you have so scandalized the country as to take away from you the right to take the moral of any political question. [Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has further time.

Mr. McLANE. I do not propose to go on further at present.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman give me a few minutes in reply?

Mr. McLANE. Take the time now.

Mr. CONGER. How much time?

Mr. McLANE. I will give the gentleman half the time that I have myself. How much time does he ask for?

Mr. CONGER. Whatever the gentleman will give me.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour commenced at twenty minutes to two. The gentleman from Maryland has occupied thirteen minutes.

Mr. McLANE. I will give the gentleman from Michigan thirteen minutes, and then claim the privilege of reply.

Mr. HAYES. Giving the chance of reply to that?

Mr. McLANE. I give the gentleman from Michigan thirteen minutes.

Mr. CONGER. I characterized the bill as one which the democrats of this House have presented as a caucus bill [cries from the democratic side, "That is not so!"] and attempted to force upon this House as an infamous measure. Without any very great skill in the use of language, I endeavored to express in that one word my idea of that bill as the most infamous measure that a political party had ever presented here. It is not denied.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Denial is not necessary.

Mr. HOSTETLER. I wish to announce the fact that this is no caucus bill. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CONGER. Not a caucus bill!

Mr. HOSTETLER. No, sir.

Mr. CONGER. There is not a democrat in this House who dares to breathe save by caucus determinations. Tell me it is not a caucus bill! No man goes in or out, eats, drinks, or sleeps, without permission of the caucus. [Laughter.] The country knows it, and he is a bold man on that side of the House who denies it.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. It is not necessary to deny it. Nobody believes it.

Mr. HOSTETLER. I do deny it.

Mr. CONGER. Then the gentleman is a bold man to deny it. I characterize him by that offensive epithet, that he is a bold man. [Laughter.]

That this is an infamous measure is not denied and dare not be denied by any man who circles around the point of sanity and pretends to be within its influence. What does it do, sir? It prevents every free citizen of these United States that holds office under this Government, from the highest to the lowest, from contributing in any way by money, by labor, by a stump-speech, by any process whatever, to endeavor to carry out his political views. Is not that infamous—deadly infamous?

The bill prevents any man who has any claim against the United States from contributing money, labor, or property for the spread and advancement of his political views. Sir, there are 120,000 disabled soldiers, claimants from month to month, and from year to year for this Government, who fought for it, who fought for the right to express their opinions, who fought for the right to contribute of their pittance, if they chose, to sustain this Government and to sustain their political views. And you lay your strong cast-iron hand upon 120,000 pensioners of this Government and forbid them even to circulate posters or circulars of a political meeting, or do anything whatever to forward and maintain the principles for which they fought, for which they suffered, for which they bled, for which a grateful country pensions them. Infamous! Oh, if I could think of a word more damning [laughter on democratic side] I would use it. It does not occur to me.

Now, how does this gentleman who has answered me and who is about to answer me again meet that proposition? He does not argue the bill and say it is right. He does as the little boys do on the streets—when one calls the other a liar, the other runs up and says "You're another."

A MEMBER. Bah!

Mr. CONGER. Did the gentleman say bah? Have I found the lost sheep? [Laughter.] Repeat your favorite expressions, gentlemen. Now, sir, that is the character of this bill, and no man dare deny it. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] has returned to political life, having formerly been in public life; and now an honor to his country, a man of means, and a follower of that invincible old democrat who would speak his mind even against the thunders of heaven, "Old Hickory," and he denies a right to political opponents.

Oh, how has the democracy degenerated in these latter years while the gentleman has been indulging in his Rip Van Winkle sleep [laughter] from what it was when he in former years, as I understand, was the confidential friend of that grandest old Roman, democrat, of them all, who never would put down free speech or free discussion; who invited the strongest and sternest opposition of his opponents, and met them, heroic old man as he was, and did not attempt to strike them by law!

Ah, sir, I have heard how in the Southern States republicans were not permitted to express their views; they were not permitted to contribute for political purposes; they were not permitted to meet and discuss political subjects. Sir, the country has been full of authorized statements of hundreds and thousands of places in the Southern States where republicans were not permitted to express any views at all upon political subjects. Men were murdered and slaughtered and beaten and driven from their homes because they attempted to express political sentiments. They were slaughtered in the cities, they were slaughtered in the fields, they were slaughtered in the cane-brakes for their political opinions. Ay, so general was this that I find in the report of one of the committees of this House that the wives and daughters of missing men who could not find in the cane-brake the husband or father—they tell your committee that failing to find them they waited on the edge of the cane-brake and watched the buzzards hovering over the corpse which was below. No one has denied that kind of work in the South.

You cannot stop northern men from expressing their sentiments or contributing their money in order to express and carry out their political views, and if you attempt to impose by law these restrictions upon them, do you think you can fetter the free people of the North by such a law, such an infamous law as that? Do you think if you pass such a law that you could enforce it in the Northern States? I tell the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. McLANE,] he may not live far enough north to know it, that there are independent and intelligent men that will resist to the death such an infringement on their inalienable rights. He may go but a little way north of the State which he so ably represents, to find that the people would submit to no such law as this. If he would come to the States sleeping among our great lakes and try to enforce such an infamous law as that, there is no man there, either democrat, republican, or greenbacker, but what would hurl the law back upon him and drive him from the State in ignominy and disgrace. [Applause on the republican side of the House.]

Now bring in that law and defend it. We stand here with that law before us. We stand here condemning it and denouncing it as an infamous law against the rights of the people of the United States. We hold it up to the attention of the whole country. The remarks of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] will call the attention of the country to it, and I hope that my own remarks will do so and this bill will be a stump-speech in the hands of every northern man in the coming campaign to show what the democracy would impose upon the free people of the North.

Now the gentleman did not defend this law. The gentleman, so far as parliamentary language and usage would permit, attacked me personally. He went so far as his knowledge of parliamentary law and his shrewd knowledge of the rules of the House would guide him. He attacked the republican party, and that was not unexpected; it was gratifying to us. I tell the gentleman that when any of the upholders of secession, when any man who talks about "temporary anarchy at the South," makes such a remark as that, and attacks the republican party, he is doing us in the Northern States a benefit that he wots not of. We are grateful to him for it.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] and the many others here who represent to-day in this House a "solid South" are doing more than they know of to make the North as solid, as invincible, as unyielding, so that when the ides of November come again for an election this House shall find its boasters of southern rebellion and southern secession in a hopeless minority. Here the people shall again rule, and justice shall again return to these halls. No more infamous bills of this kind shall be thrown on our table or submitted to us for our votes.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McLANE. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] makes a great mistake in regard to this bill, and I shall dispose of his criticism upon it before I follow him in the general current of his remarks. This bill in no wise invades the rights of the free people of this country, North or South. This bill is intended to deal with one great source of political corruption, without regard to either party, without the slightest reference to the republican party any more than to the democratic party.

Mr. DUNNELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. McLANE. Certainly.

Mr. DUNNELL. When the democratic party was in power in this country, did it ever propose any such legislation as this?

Mr. McLANE. When we shall get into power——

Mr. DUNNELL. When it was in power.

Mr. McLANE. When we get into power again—— [Laughter on the republican side.]

Mr. DUNNELL. That is too far in the future. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. Are you not in power in the Senate now, and does this reach the Senate employés? Answer that question.

Mr. McLANE. When we shall get into power again, if you will put this law upon the statute-book now, we will be obliged to follow it.

Mr. DUNNELL. And you will repeal it at the first session.

Mr. McLANE. I think not. And the gentleman, intelligently treating this question, has no right to give it any such diversion. He knows, and the gentleman from Michigan knows, and every honorable gentleman on that side of the House knows, that this country has in almost all of the States sought in some degree to reform this great abuse.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will my friend from Maryland—— [Cries of "Oh, no!"] I want to read from the constitution of Illinois.

Mr. McLANE. Not now.

They know very well that no greater source of corruption exists in this country to-day than this very abuse, this assessment of office-holders, this collection of a fund in every State and in every town.

As the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] reminds me that there must be some restraint upon our language here in order to comply with the conventionalities of this House, I will say to him, that, if I were not thus restrained, I would style it to be the meanest vice I ever heard of in morals to tax these poor office-holders, these free men that he talks of, whose salaries at best afford but a meager support for their families—to tax them for what he and every other man who enters into political life ought, according to his means, to take out of his own pocket. Now, I would like to ask that gentleman how he feels when he looks into the face of one of these office-holders, with a salary of $500 or $1,000 a year, and reflects that he has taken into his own State of Michigan as large a proportion of that assessment as can be found given to any other State of this Union? Does he feel that the office-holder who is thus forced at the peril of losing his office to pay 5 per cent. of his salary to help the gentleman from Michigan to fill his seat on this floor—does that gentleman think that office-holder will consider it a hardship if he is forbidden to give that money?

Mr. CONGER. I say that none of that money, to my knowledge and belief, ever went into the State of Michigan. We can manage the democrats there ourselves.

Mr. FINLEY. The report of the committee investigating this subject shows that $1,000 was given to that State.

A MEMBER. Five thousand dollars.

Mr. FINLEY. No, $1,000.

Mr. CONGER rose.

Mr. McLANE. I ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] to look at the clock and leave me my thirteen minutes. For one as well informed as the gentleman appears to be on political questions, for one as ready to step to the front and take upon himself the political responsibilities that attach to that side of the House, he is strangely ignorant of the events that have taken place at his home. He is also strangely ignorant of the public records and public incidents of his own career here in Congress. Here is a committee now actually sitting and investigating this subject, exposing this great abuse, and it is testified before that committee that out of the sum of $54,000 distributed by the chairman of the republican national executive committee, $5,000, as that chairman swears, he sent to the State of Michigan to be expended in the politics of that State. [Applause on the democratic side.] How much of that went to the district of the honorable gentleman from Michigan? Does he know?

Mr. CONGER. Not a cent of it.

Mr. McLANE. Perhaps if he knew he dare not avow it, because he knows perfectly well that in many of the States a man would not be permitted to hold a seat upon the floor of the State Legislature or of a town council even, if he knew of money improperly or corruptly spent, or of money spent at all, to facilitate his election. And although there may be no law of Congress against it, the honorable gentleman from Michigan knows that these freemen he talks of would hold him in very poor esteem if they believed that that sum of money went to contribute to his election and to send him here as a Representative of the free people of Michigan.

How much freedom, I would like to know, is there in a congressional district, if the Federal money is to be taken there to carry an election? And just there I ask the gentleman to make a distinction, and to remember that this bill strikes at the use of Federal money, it strikes at the Federal office-holder, not at the private citizen. All that declamation about invading the rights of the freemen goes for wind. It is not the independent citizen who takes from his own pocket his own money, but the office-holder who receives the money from the public Treasury, and who either must contribute from it or lose his place, if he refuses to make good an arbitrary assessment upon his salary; it is in fact the public money corruptly diverted to political uses, to perpetuate the power of the political party actually in power.

I say without fear of contradiction, that this bill, instead of being an infamous measure, will, if enacted, exert a most wholesome and salutary influence upon both political parties.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER rose.

Mr. McLANE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for a question.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. As I understood the gentleman from Maryland——

Mr. McLANE. Let the gentleman put his question.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I desire to put my question in shape, if the gentleman will permit me. Time is not particularly precious just now, and I do not occupy much of the time of the House.

Mr. McLANE. It is not material to me at all how much time the gentleman is in the habit of occupying. I have yielded in all courtesy for him to address to me a question; and if he has no question to ask, I beg him not to interrupt me.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I desire to get at the scope of this bill, and I wish to ask the gentleman whether this bill does not include every one of the two hundred thousand claimants for pensions before the proper Department of this Government, and whether if it becomes a law it will not forfeit the claim of every widow, every orphan, every crippled, wounded, maimed soldier of the United States, who now has pending before a Department of this Government a claim justly due for services rendered the country, in case such person voluntarily contributes for political purposes, and whether the gentleman presumes——

Mr. McLANE. I will answer your question, if you will let me.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Whether the gentleman presumes that men who have periled their lives and their fortunes for the establishment of liberty in this country can by law be prevented from rendering an hour's or a day's service or spending a dollar in the preservation of those principles for which they would have offered up their lives?

Mr. McLANE. I answer, no. The bill touches no such claim.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Let me say——

Mr. McLANE. No, no, let me go on.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland declines to yield further.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Let the gentleman read section 4.

Mr. McLANE. Let me go on and answer the gentleman's question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland declines to yield, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania will please take notice of the fact.

Mr. McLANE. I answer the question of the gentleman in the negative. This bill reaches no pension claim of any soldier or soldier's widow. It relates first of all to office-holders. It embraces also claimants applying to the Government for the payment of their claims; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania knows perfectly well what class of men that provision refers to. He does not and cannot confound them with men or women entitled to pensions. It applies neither to widows nor to invalid soldiers. It is confined to office-holders and the general class of claimants seeking payment of their claims from the General Government. It applies, further, to the class of contractors; and if the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not sufficiently informed upon this general question to know the fact that the greater part of this fund of which I speak comes from claimants—if he does not know that every claim going through the Executive Departments is to a greater or less extent made the subject of political assessment—if he does not know that all the great contractors under the Government have been in the habit for the last fifteen or twenty years of paying these assessments, he must have lived to very little purpose in the republican party.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER rose.

Mr. McLANE. Let me go on, if you please. I am answering your question directly. I am stating to what four classes of persons this bill applies, and I cannot answer the question without describing each class. My answer is perfectly responsive to the question; it is intended to be so, and is so.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] talked about this being a caucus measure; and doing himself and the honorable gentlemen on that side of the House great injustice, he talked of this bill as an interference with something that they want to do. Now, as I said in opening, I have never given the slightest consideration or respect to professions of political rectitude or morality from the other side, yet this is the first time in my life that I ever heard a man glory in his own shame and infamy. [Applause.] I never knew either a republican or a democrat in this country to stand up in the face of the world and avow himself the champion and defender of these political vices and corruptions. On the contrary, I have never known a man so mean, so bad, so corrupt politically that he did not seek to wash his skirts clear of all such political reproach—never! And the gentleman from Michigan, in my opinion, (because after all we are obliged to judge each other,) is blinded by his own political partisanship and passion. He is like the mad bull with the red flag flaunting in his face. When he looks to this side of the House he sees nothing but political corruption; he sees nothing but secession and the "solid South." And when he said, Mr. Speaker, we could do him no greater honor and no greater service than to flaunt this bill at him, I say again, sir, he does his people great injustice. He may rage as he pleases, he may flaunt his red flag, he may foam as he pleases about secession and the South, but when they find him the defender of every political rascal, yes, when they find him the defender of every political rascal who can be paid from these assessment funds; when they find him championing the principle that these officers shall be taxed, shall be assessed, they will not sanction his boast that they will approve his conduct.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman has no right to say that.

Mr. McLANE. I have, sir.

Mr. CONGER. The bill does not say tax. There is nothing in it of that kind. The gentleman does himself great injustice by such remarks.

Mr. McLANE. The gentleman says I do myself injustice.

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. McLANE. Now, I have been very careful to say nothing that I do not believe to be not only true but susceptible of proof, and when I say the gentleman from Michigan stands here to-day championing this principle of assessing office-holders, the proof I have of it is that he denounces a bill which prohibits office-holders from being assessed as an infamous bill——

Mr. CONGER. This prevents voluntary contributions.

Mr. McLANE. No tyro who has ever touched a horn-book of logic but knows that the man who denounces a bill which forbids political assessments, and styles that bill an infamous bill, defends political assessments. That is what the gentleman from Michigan has done to-day, and his people have sense enough to understand it. He does them great dishonor and great injustice when he supposes he can throw dust into their eyes by denouncing secession.

Now, a word more. The gentleman from Michigan said further that he wanted no better text than to go to the people of Michigan and use this secession talk, that is, talk about anarchy. What did I say about the South? I said, sir, you corrupted the election system of Southern States, when the South was in anarchy, when the South was without civil law, when the South was, I might have added, under the bayonet rule of the republican Administration; I might have said when the voice of free men, white and black, was stifled. Where did you have any free men, white or black, in Louisiana, when you had the Federal Army at the door of the Legislature and at every crossing-place in the city? At that time I said you were able to defraud the people of their rights, and I said further, bad as that was, it was not as bad as your general fraud and your general corruption. And the reply the gentleman from Michigan makes to that is that he wants nothing better from me than that talk, provided he can say it comes from the solid South. In the first place he has not that advantage; I do not belong to the "solid South." I do not belong to the solid South in the sense in which the honorable gentleman speaks of it, although I might very much regret that I have not had the honor to live in that solid South and to vote with that solid South, for certainly there is no section of this country that I esteem and respect more than that South of which the gentleman speaks.

MEMBERS on republican side. We know that.

Mr. McLANE. There is no mistake about that, but when the gentleman from Michigan thinks that I can be imposed upon by his declaration that his constituents will wallow in the fraud and corruption that he is willing to wallow in, if he thinks he can impose that on me, I tell him I know the people of Michigan better, and neither republicans nor democrats will ever indorse any such atrocious sentiments. Never, sir. There is no man living in Michigan who has any intelligence who will indorse that observation. And that is why I say the honorable gentleman from Michigan does himself injustice. He is blinded by his political passions, more by political habit perhaps than by nature.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman yield to me for one question?

Mr. McLANE. For a question.

Mr. BURROWS. For one question only. I called at the Pension Office this morning to inquire about a pension claim of a wounded soldier in my district. I should like to know whether lines 9 and 10 on page 3, which read as follows: "That any person having any pending claim against the United States"——

Mr. McLANE. The gentleman knows that a pension right is a legal right, and not a claim.

Mr. BURROWS. That does not answer my question whether any person having a pending claim of the character I have referred to is included under the provisions of this bill. Is not that a pending claim?

Mr. McLANE. I answer no. And, what is far more to the point, if that gentleman whose vote I shall look for directly and the gentleman from Michigan think it does mean that, let them amend it. If it does mean that, let them correct the phraseology of the bill. Now, the reproach I address to that side of the House is that they will not consider the bill at all, that they denounce the bill as an infamous bill.

Mr. CONGER. The previous question was called and we could not consider it.

Mr. McLANE. But the previous question is withdrawn, and withdrawn for the very purpose of permiting me to ask the gentleman from Michigan if he would not agree to consider this bill, and if so, how and when; and he replied "No, not at all." And now I want to go on.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman allow me one other question?

Mr. McLANE. I want to go on.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman yield for one other question?

Mr. McLANE. Very well.

Mr. BURROWS. Are these applications for arrears of pensions claims?

Mr. McLANE. No, sir. They are bounties and rights fixed by law. The term claimant I have defined and there is no gentleman on that side of the House who does not understand the term and who does not know very well that if the term used in the bill requires any restriction he can have the restriction inserted. I have stated frankly to what class of claims the bill applies. And now, without going further into these questions which have been addressed to me, I want to conclude with my appeal to this House to consider this bill. I am not at all afraid that the people of Michigan or the people of any other Northern State can be deceived about this. The intelligent people of this country will understand this very well. They saw a splendid empire in Europe put under the feet of a corrupt, a wicked, a bad man. They saw him take the army in the one hand and the church in the other and then with the patronage of the empire they found him holding that country in manacles for twenty years.

Mr. HOUK. With three hands?

Mr. McLANE. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. HOUK. Where did he get the third hand?

Mr. McLANE. His own self and personal will controlled the patronage and constituted the third hand. [Laughter.] I say to the gentlemen on the other side of the House that we are anxious to pass this bill. Our own knowledge of American politics, our own experience in American politics show us that the republican party can find a man in no sense better or less capable of using those corrupt instruments than the man to whom I have referred. We have had at the head of the executive government in this country a man utterly indifferent to, if not absolutely ignorant of, civil life and duties—and that is as good a picture of Louis Napoleon as any man could paint—stolid, apathetic, reckless, and unscrupulous; careless of human life and careless of every moral principle. That is Louis Napoleon.

Mr. Speaker, need I write "horse" under that picture when applied to American politics? Do you not all recognize in it an American President that has been and who, if those honorable gentlemen could have their way, will be again?

Mr. HAYES and others. And he will be.

Mr. McLANE. Will be?

Mr. HAYES. Yes; all the efforts of the friends of Mr. Tilden to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. HUMPHREY. With his barrel of money.

Mr. McLANE. More shame to you if he is, and more shame to the country.

Mr. HAYES. Every man he whipped feels that way in regard to him.

Mr. McLANE. For whatever his distinction, however much he may be honored—and I am as free to honor him as the gentleman before me, and I do honor him as much as the gentleman before me; there is no man living in this country who honors his fame as a soldier more than I do, and all his qualities as a soldier—I want to make no qualification; but while I am thus ready to acknowledge the truth in regard to him, I have stated by this analogy what I conscientiously believe when I consider him as a civil ruler and compare him with any in this or in any other country——

Mr. HAYES. Did you ever know his like or his equal?

Mr. McLANE. No, sir; nor did the gentleman before me whose name I am not able to call and whose State I am not able to indicate.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Why, it is Mr. HAYES, of Illinois.

Mr. McLANE. Very well, the honorable gentleman from Illinois. [Laughter.] I think we were talking about General Grant. I did not name him, but I have always paid my homage to him as a soldier. But now I say to the gentleman from Illinois that never in the history of this country before the time of General Grant did he know the President of the United States sit in the White House having at his side a confessedly corrupt Secretary and regretting his enforced retirement.

Mr. McGOWAN. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has almost expired, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOSTETLER] who has charge of the bill.

Mr. HOSTETLER. I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired unless it is continued by unanimous consent.

Mr. BAKER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] be permitted to finish his remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. McLANE. As I have made my concession to General Grant as a soldier, it is only fair I should be permitted to pass my reproach upon him as a statesman. I spoke of his apathetic indifference to all moral virtue, of his deadness to every high, honorable principle of morals; and in illustration of that I say——

Mr. HASKELL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. McLANE. I decline to yield at present.

Never did the gentleman from Illinois, as I have said to him, know of a President who sat in the White House and had at his side a confessed criminal, a man acknowledging himself to be corrupt, a man admitting he was a peculator, admitting to the President he was a peculator, that he had directly peculated in the public funds——

A MEMBER. Do you refer to Floyd?

Mr. McLANE. That he had conspired with a post-trader to cheat the Government, and confessing it all; because the records of the day tell us that he confessed his guilt to the President and asked to resign; and never before did you hear a President saying under such circumstances, "I accept the resignation with regret."

Mr. HAYES. As the gentleman has referred to me I wish to ask him a question. Was the gentleman asleep when James Buchanan occupied the presidential chair with Mr. Floyd and Mr. Cobb at his right hand?

Mr. HUMPHREY. And Thompson to boot.

Mr. McLANE. I shall deal with this question with all seriousness. I wonder at these gentlemen making such lame retorts. In the name of God what had James Buchanan and Messrs. Floyd and Thompson to do with the case of Grant and Belknap?

Mr. HAYES. You said you never knew so corrupt a President as Grant.

Mr. McLANE. I have to say to the gentleman from Illinois just what I said to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] that he cannot go to the people of his country with any such excuse; he cannot take the cases of Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Floyd, and Mr. Thompson and form any analogy to the case of Grant and Belknap. In the first place, Mr. Floyd and Mr. Thompson have the benefit of their unqualified and indignant denial and public acquittal. They stood before the country and denounced the political calumnies and demanded a thorough investigation. On the other hand, in the other case the guilt was confessed, and when not confessed, was absolutely proven, and you are indebted, gentlemen, to my forbearance that I do not extend the picture. [Loud cries of "Go on!" from the republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, General Grant's name was introduced into my remarks in the most incidental manner. I was frankly addressing myself to the honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House who constitute the republican party. I was reproaching them that they should oppose and misrepresent a bill that had so much virtue in it as this bill has, and I stated only what justified me in that reproach. I say, Mr. Speaker, in all candor that those honorable gentlemen are indebted to my forbearance if I stop with their Secretary of War. [Loud cries on the republican side of the House of "Go on!"] They know as well as I do that it does not lie in their mouths in speaking of the democratic party to call that kettle black.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. McLANE. Now, sir, if I supposed that any gentleman on that side of the House wished me to go on, [loud cries of "Certainly, go on!" on the republican side of the House]—if I supposed that they really desired me to go on, although it would not be to my taste to go on, I would do so.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I desire to ask the gentleman one question. The republican party was made up in the North of democrats and whigs. I want to ask the gentleman who has referred to the Grant administration if he has forgotten in his prime or in his younger days the Swartwout scandal? I want to refresh his mind, to recall it back to the memories of his younger days.

Mr. McLANE. I felt almost sure while the gentleman from Michigan was asking about my association with Andrew Jackson that he mistook me for my father, [laughter;] and now I am perfectly sure that my honorable friend from Wisconsin takes me for my grandfather. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. With the permission of the gentleman from Maryland, I would say a word. It is not unnatural that I should confound one generation with another when they follow up the same kind of business and are in the same line of statesmanship.

Mr. McLANE. The best answer I could make my friend would be to let the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] repeat the very eloquent encomium he passed upon that heroic and immortal man, General Jackson. I understood him to speak in those terms of General Jackson.

Mr. CONGER. I do not claim that General Jackson was the gentleman's grandfather.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I merely wished to recall to the gentleman's mind the fact in that case, where Swartwout was a defaulter to the amount of $100,000, and there was a report of a democratic committee of this House that there was no use in replacing him by a second man, because the second man would steal more than the first. That was the report of a democratic committee of this House.

Mr. McLANE. I have some recollection of the case of Swartwout. I have not been so unmindful of the current political history as not to have noted it. I was going to say that the starry firmament of defaulters commenced and came into being during the last twenty years. There were defaulters in the parties that existed in the earlier and better days of the Republic; there were some defaulters, but I am proud to say that in the history of the country those parties that have passed away, the old Jacksonian party and the old whig party, counted their defaulters few and far between.

And when we come down to our own day, when we come down to the Government now in possession of the republican party, every man knows that he cannot find his way through any of the Departments of this Government without encountering defaulters or corrupt and wasteful expenditure of the public treasure at every step. That is the great trouble to-day. If there is any one thing more than another that attracts attention in this country to-day it is the degraded political condition of the administration of the Federal Government.

A MEMBER. That is true.

Mr. McLANE. A gentleman before me says that is true. Why of course it is true; it is absolutely notorious.

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McLANE. As my time has been extended, I cannot refuse.

Mr. BAYNE. Will you be kind enough to name any republican defaulters that have not been prosecuted and punished?

Mr. McLANE. Why, sir, I have within reach——

Mr. HUMPHREY. And, in connection with that, name one under a former democratic administration that ever was punished.

Mr. SPRINGER. I can name one for the benefit of the gentleman.

Mr. McLANE. Let me go on. I would have closed before this time all that I have to say but for the call to go on and for the inquiries addressed to me. ["Go on!" "Go on!" from the republican side of the House.] It is only to-day that I have read of defaulters, and I think I could name of the one category or another more than a dozen instances.

As to the corruption that I am speaking of, I did not intend it all to be attached to one particular department. But you know, Mr. Speaker, and this House knows, that this administration, this Government has been in the hands of the republican party for twenty years, and it has been in the habit of vaunting itself not only for the great service it rendered civilization and humanity—and I for one will never deny any service which it ever did render to civilization or humanity—it vaunts itself upon having saved this country and preserved this Union. I never will deny it all the credit which belongs to its success in saving this country and perpetuating this Union. If this were the question presented to me, I would not be wanting in the fullest acknowledgment of the truth.

But it does not lie with me to-day to expose to the world the virtues of the republican party. The question with me to-day is its vices. It is my right and it is the incident of the day that I should reproach that party with its vices and with its corruptions. It is a most humiliating spectacle for honorable gentlemen on that side of the House, like the gentleman from Illinois, to have no better answer to make me than to ask me if I recollect Floyd and Thompson and Buchanan, and for the honorable gentleman behind him there to ask me if I recollect Swartwout. Is that all they have to say when we talk of a dishonest government, of the scandal that has gone all over the world? When I look at the escutcheon of General Grant, honored as a soldier but degraded by his political associates, the corruption that existed and was exposed in the Executive Departments of the Government during his administration thereof——

Mr. HUMPHREY. Is the gentleman speaking to the judgment of this House?

Mr. McLANE. If I am not speaking to the judgment of the House I do not know to what I am speaking. [Laughter on the republican side.] You need not laugh, gentlemen; I am speaking to the judgment of the House. The issue is before the House, and the issue is this bill. It is because the republican party in this House will not consider this bill that I think it my right to reproach them with their political corruption.

Mr. CONGER. And we gave you additional time to do it.

Mr. McLANE. I am persuaded that there is no other motive—that is the point—there is no other motive but a corrupt political motive which deters honorable gentlemen on that side of the House from considering this bill.

Mr. CONGER. That is an infamous assertion from the gentleman; I say it to him here in my place.

Mr. McLANE. The honorable gentleman from Michigan is——

Mr. HAWLEY. I call the gentleman to order. I assert that no gentleman has a right under the rules to make that insinuation against gentlemen on this side of the House. I ask that the words be taken down, and that the gentleman be called to order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. And I ask that the words of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] be also taken down.

Mr. HAWLEY. Very well.

Mr. McLANE. Oh, no; only my words.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I insist upon it.

Mr. HAWLEY. In making the point of order I simply desire to remark——

Mr. McLANE. I wish to say——

Mr. HAWLEY. I have the floor now. I have called the gentleman to order, and I desire simply to remark that one wrong does not justify another. If there has been a wrong committed on this side of the House, let that wrong be punished. But I protest, as a member of this House and as one who claims to be an honorable man and a patriot, against that imputation upon gentlemen here.

Mr. McLANE. I am not out of order. Let the words be taken down.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us have the words.

Mr. COBB (addressing Mr. HAWLEY) made a remark inaudible at the reporter's desk.

Mr. HAWLEY. I said that one wrong did not justify another.

Mr. MANNING. Does the desire of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] to have the words taken down extend back to the remark of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] in the outset of the debate to-day?

Mr. HAWLEY. I think I made myself sufficiently clear in the remark that one wrong does not justify another.

Mr. MANNING. It is hardly probable the gentleman is willing to go back so as to have taken down the remark of the gentleman from Michigan in the outset of the debate.

Mr. HAWLEY. I made my point of order upon a remark of the gentleman from Maryland. The gentleman may make as many other points upon other gentlemen as he pleases.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The words will be taken down and read.

Mr. MANNING. I desire to know whether the gentleman from Connecticut desires or is willing that the words of the gentleman from Michigan in the outset of his speech to-day, in which he saw proper to denounce this proposition as "infamous," shall be taken down, or whether he only wants taken down the remark of the gentleman from Maryland, uttered a moment ago in response to the gentleman from Michigan. It seems to me that the gentleman from Connecticut is not so willing as he professes to be—— [Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will suspend until the words are read, as the rule requires.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. McLANE. I am persuaded that there is no other motive—that is the point—there is no other motive but a corrupt political motive which deters honorable gentlemen on that side of the House from considering this bill.

Mr. CONGER. That is an infamous assertion from the gentleman. I say it to him here in my place.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read Rule 61.

The Clerk read as follows:

If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order, in which case the member so called to order shall immediately sit down unless permitted to explain; and the House shall, if appealed to, decide the case, but without debate. If there be no appeal, the decision of the Chair shall be submitted to. If the decision be in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed; if otherwise, he shall not be permitted to proceed, in case any member object, without leave of the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Maryland desire to explain?

Mr. McLANE. I do, Mr. Speaker. In the earlier part of my remarks I made use of exactly that language, explaining at the time to the gentleman from Michigan that we were obliged everywhere in this life as honorable gentlemen to judge each other's motives by the facts, and from the facts to deduce the motive. I told him then that from the facts, from his own observations in opposition to this bill, I deduced the conclusion that his motive was a corrupt political motive. I told him that; and it is in this sense that I have used the remark now. At all events I invite attention to this qualification. That is the sense in which I used the remark. I have done it several times. I have said in the course of my remarks that I endeavored not only to use parliamentary expressions, but to justify, to make good, any assertion I made; and when I say that a political party on either side of this House is inspired by corrupt political motives all that I can be called on to do is to establish that as a reasonable conclusion from what they say and what they do. That is the parliamentary law of the world. Go if you choose to the British Parliament, where men have had the nerve not only to hear such language with patience, but to use it without fear or favor; and it is in that spirit that I have used this language to-day.

Mr. KEIFER. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the gentleman has no right to debate the question.

Mr. HENDERSON. I object to any further explanation.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman is going into a political discussion.

Mr. McLANE. There was no personality in my remarks.

Mr. KEIFER. I insist upon the point of order being decided whether the gentleman from Maryland can go on with this debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that the language used by the gentleman from Maryland applies personally to any member of this House in his representative capacity; but he is willing to submit to the House the question whether the gentleman shall proceed in order.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would like to hear the language read again.

Mr. McLANE. I only want to be understood. I hope it is perfectly well understood by every man in this House——

Mr. HENDERSON. I object to further debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that, to come within the rule, the language used must be personal in the proper sense. The Chair will, however, submit the question to the House.

Mr. GARFIELD and others. Let the language be read again.

The SPEAKER. The language will be read again for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. McLANE. I am persuaded that there is no other motive—that is the point—there is no other motive but a corrupt political motive which deters honorable gentlemen on that side of the House from considering this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now submit to the House whether the gentleman from Maryland shall proceed.

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to inquire whether there has been any appeal from the decision of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. This is the form prescribed by the practice, to submit questions of privileges of the House to the House to decide. The Chair desires to adhere thereto. As many as are in favor of allowing the gentleman to proceed will say "ay."

Mr. GARFIELD. It seems to me the question to be decided is whether these words were parliamentary—whether they were in order. That is the point to be ruled upon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has said that in his own judgment he believes (and he is confirmed in this view by the explanation of the gentleman from Maryland) that the words in question were not intended to refer personally to any member of this House in his representative relation.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Will the Chair inform us whether a political motive is any less proper because it is political?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not go into that branch of the subject.

Mr. BAYNE. I submit the shape in which this proposition is put makes some difference. So far as I am individually concerned I am willing the gentleman should go on, but at the same time I am not willing to say by my vote that words of that sort should be used in regard to members of this House.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman can vote against it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order. The Chair has caused to be read Rule 61. I understand that rule to be that the Chair shall decide on the case whether the language used be parliamentary or not, and if the decision of the Chair be in favor of the member called to order he shall be at liberty to proceed; if otherwise, he shall not be permitted to proceed, in case any member may object, without leave of the House. Now, the Speaker having decided that he was in order he has the right to proceed without submitting the question to the House, and if the Chair has decided his words were unparliamentary he shall not have the right to proceed without the consent of the House. So that condition has not arisen.

The SPEAKER. The Chair gave his judgment in reference to the language used, but prefers to submit the question to the House as to whether the gentleman shall proceed or not, because it involves the privileges of the House.

Mr. CALKINS. Many of us have no objection to the gentleman going on, but do object to his language being applied to us in whole or individually.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can appeal from the judgment of the Chair.

Mr. CALKINS. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. COX. I move to lay that appeal on the table.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me say, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. COX. Is the motion to lay upon the table debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. COX. Then why debate it?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not understand it is parliamentary for any gentleman on the floor to say any one man or any body of men is acting from corrupt motives. I should be sorry to believe that the Chair had so ruled or would so rule, and I do not wish, therefore, an appeal taken unless we know distinctly what the decision of the Chair has been.

The SPEAKER. The Chair said in his judgment the language used was not intended to be personal, and he is confirmed in that position by the explanation made by the gentleman from Maryland, before the Chair gave his judgment thereon, that the language was not intended to be personal as against any member of this House in his representative relations. The Chair adheres to that decision, and the gentleman from Indiana takes an appeal from it.

Mr. COX. I wish to say a word in response to what fell from the gentleman from Ohio. There is no personality in this business.

The SPEAKER. This character of language has been used a hundred times in this House, even to-day.

Mr. COX. Allow me a word. I do not understand why gentlemen on that side, especially my distinguished friend from Connecticut, should be so sensitive about this peculiar language when he heard it charged by the gentleman from Michigan on the very committee which brought this bill in—when he heard a charge of infamy made against that committee, and yet never opened his mouth about it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I beg your pardon. It was not on the committee, but on the bill.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. HAWLEY. One word. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been distinctly and persistently demanded.

Mr. HAWLEY. There have been a dozen explanations since the regular order was demanded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is willing to hear the gentleman if there be no objection. The regular order is demanded, and the gentleman is not now in order.

Mr. KENNA. I demand the regular order.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have made the point of order, and I have not interfered in the discussion, and I think I might be heard to say a word now.

Mr. KENNA. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would hear the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] but is prevented by the demand for regular order, and hence will enforce the same. The gentleman from Indiana appeals from the decision of the Chair in reference to the language used, and the gentleman from New York moves to lay that appeal upon the table.

Mr. CALKINS. I withdraw the appeal.

Mr. McKENZIE. I object to its withdrawal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana withdraws the appeal; and the Chair will now submit the question whether the gentleman from Maryland shall proceed.

Mr. HAWLEY. I rise to make a point of order. Rule 61 reads as follows:

61. If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order; in which case the member so called to order shall immediately sit down, unless permitted to explain; and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case, but without debate; if there be no appeal, the decision of the Chair shall be submitted to.

The Chair decides that the gentleman from Maryland has the right to go on, and no one appeals from his decision. Now, it puts some of us in an embarrassing position under those circumstances to have the Chair put a question not required by the rules. The Chair has ruled that the gentleman from Maryland may go on.

The SPEAKER. That he may go on in order; but the Chair, in the abundance of a wish to be exactly fair between the two sides, proposed to submit the question, which relates to the privilege of the House.

Mr. HAWLEY. I did not doubt the exact fairness of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. But if gentlemen on the left of the Chair do not desire the question submitted the Chair will not submit it. The gentleman from Maryland will proceed.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman from Maryland allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McLANE. I decline to yield at this time.

Mr. HENDERSON. I rise to a question of order. The morning hour has expired.

The SPEAKER. At the expiration of the morning hour unanimous consent was given that the gentleman from Maryland should proceed with and conclude his speech. When the morning hour expired the Chair recognized the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOSTETLER] who was in charge of the bill, and he demanded the previous question so as to continue in possession of the floor and charge of the bill. Then unanimous consent was given to the gentleman from Maryland to conclude his speech; and that consent having been given without restriction as to time, the rule gives the gentleman one additional hour.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would like to inquire what time the gentleman has occupied?

The SPEAKER. Thirty-two minutes of the second hour have been consumed.

Mr. McLANE. If the gentleman from Illinois had not raised the question of order I should have closed what I had to say before now.

Now I only wish to make my acknowledgments to the House, and explain again that from the beginning to the end I have made no allusion of a personal character. And I am amazed that my language should have been so considered by any intelligent gentleman who sat on that side of the House and heard the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] make a speech at the opening of this session in which he stigmatized this side of the House for its cowardly policy of starving the Government to death, commended the brave men who had drawn the sword upon it, and expressed his contempt, his scorn for those who would enter upon the policy we had adopted. We knew perfectly well that he referred to this side of the House. No man of truth would deny that he had reference to this side of the House. We bore with patience that reproach.

Mr. CALKINS. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the gentleman from Maryland should be called upon to discuss the pending question. Since this debate has been permitted to go on the gentleman should discuss the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see the point as the gentleman from Indiana does.

Mr. McLANE. And not only did we bear the denunciation of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, and I need not say that nobody is better fitted than he to hurl denunciation on those to whom he is opposed, he was received on that occasion, as somebody on my left expresses it, as the great gun on the other side, and he gave us all the powder, all the thunder, he was capable of giving. It was impossible for any man to treat a political party with less respect than he treated the party on this side of the House. But, sir, we took our parliamentary resource, and we have through three long months contended upon the issues which he that day denounced; and we have put back upon him his denunciation, his anathemas, and we have proved from the record that whatever there was infamous in our policy, he set us the example, and that we were only following the same tactics that he, as the leader of the republican party, had initiated on this floor. And having put that back on him, and not believing him to be altogether infamous, we do not consider ourselves altogether destroyed by his denunciations.

And now comes the honorable gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] who asked that my words be taken down. I wonder if that gentleman has ever read in the RECORD his own speech in the House. We all know him to be a courteous and honorable gentleman. Does he recollect the distinction which he made between honorable gentlemen on this side of the House individually and as they were politically associated together? Does he remember the terms of contempt and offensive denunciation in which he spoke of us as a political association, although he said, to soothe our souls, that we were a most amiable set of gentlemen when taken individually?

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to say that he does not quote correctly the little illustration which I brought into my speech to which he has referred? If he will go back and read it he will find——

Mr. McLANE. If the gentleman has a copy of his speech beside him he may read that portion.

Mr. HAWLEY. I can just as well repeat it. I stated in substance that a gentleman who had received an individual promise from every director of a bank that his note would be discounted, when they failed to discount he observed that individually they were very worthy and honorable gentlemen, but collectively they were a set of scoundrels. That was the illustration I used, but I could not pretend to apply that to the democratic party literally. But in the aggregate their actions have been such as to suggest the illustration.

Mr. McLANE. I have painted no picture to-day more offensive to the other side of the House than I felt the illustration of the gentleman from Connecticut to be; and if he had not been blinded, as the gentleman from Michigan seems also to have been, he would have taken, with the patience with which he ought to take it, what I said of him when associated with his political associates.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] a question with the view of getting the gentleman's opinion as to the limit of the jurisdiction of Congress.

Mr. HERBERT. I call for the regular order; the morning hour has expired.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If the regular order is insisted on there is an end of my question.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] was permitted to proceed; does the gentleman yield for a question from the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BUTTERWORTH?]

Mr. McLANE. I will yield for that question.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Do I understand this bill as being intended to prohibit contributions for political purposes because that system is bad per se or simply bad when those contributions are made out of the pay which Federal employés receive for their service?

Mr. McLANE. I have already answered the gentleman's question.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Then I will ask another. I only want to get the gentleman's construction of this bill. I understand the salary which an employé of the Government receives is his individual property, which he holds as a citizen and distributes as a citizen, paying it out. Does the gentleman insist that we have a right by legislation to say what that employé may do or may not do with the salary he receives; and if so, if we have that jurisdiction, will he consent to an amendment extending the provisions to the officers of every State, county, and municipality?

Mr. FORT. That would cut off Mr. Tilden.

Mr. McLANE. I answer the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] that I would not consent to any such amendment. The gentleman knows perfectly well that in his own State of Ohio no such amendment is necessary.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. McLANE. And the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] can tell him that no such amendment is necessary in the State of Illinois.

Mr. HAYES. I understand that the chairman of the committee has agreed that amendments may be offered to the bill.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. There may be two States in the Union which in their wisdom have provided against such contributions, but that is not an answer to my question.

Mr. McLANE. I have answered the question; I would not consent to any such amendment.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Why not?

Mr. McLANE. Because we have no power. The gentleman from Ohio will not contend that we have any such power.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I want to make this efficacious as to employés. Under the doctrine of John C. Calhoun you can control their official action and their official duties, but you cannot say what they shall do with their private property.

Mr. McLANE. This bill is confined to Federal office-holders for the reason that we have not the power to extend it to State office-holders, but if this bill passes every State in the Union will have an opportunity to follow the example set by the General Government and adopt the same policy.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I would ask another question. Are you satisfied to include in this bill not only those who hold office under the Federal Government, and are supposed to be appointed with reference to fitness, but their competitors for office, and Members of Congress and Senators?

Mr. McLANE. My answer to the gentleman from Ohio might not be understood if I answered him by a simple negative. I answer him thus: that I would extend the law as far as it is possible to extend it. I would confine it to no party, and no office that I could reach constitutionally; but I have confined it in the original bill, and the substitute has not changed that feature, to Federal officers, because I believe we have no power to carry it further; and now I conclude with this declaration: that instead of asking me questions as to what I would do, or what I would not do, gentlemen on the other side should as honorable and conscientious Representatives of the people take up this bill and do what they are willing to do, and not concern themselves about what I am willing to do.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. You are the author and finisher of this measure.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the regular order has been demanded.

JURORS' TEST OATH, ETC.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 375) in relation to jurors, and to repeal sections 820 and 821 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. HERBERT. Before I move the previous question upon the bill and amendments, I desire to make a proposition. I desire to propose to gentlemen on the other side of the House that if they wish to discuss this question for any reasonable length of time an opportunity will be afforded, if we can only come to an agreement, and they can also have an opportunity to offer any amendments they desire. My purpose is to invite the fullest, freest, and fairest discussion on this question, and I only ask that some agreement shall be made that will bring us to a vote. That is all. I hope to hear from gentlemen on the other side how much time they desire.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HERBERT,] who has charge of the pending bill, to ask the question of those who are opposed to the passage of the bill what their wishes are as to debate thereon and amendment. Has the Chair correctly stated the proposition?

Mr. HERBERT. The Chair has stated it correctly.

Mr. CONGER. If this bill could be referred to the Committee of the Whole, not to be brought up until the next regular session of Congress, when we can have time to discuss and amend it, I presume that would be satisfactory to this side of the House.

Mr. HERBERT. As the gentleman well knows, I could not consent to that. We on this side of the House desire to reach a conclusion of this matter during this session. If gentlemen have no other proposition to make, then I will insist upon the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will ask the gentleman if this bill is not substantially contained in the judicial appropriation bill?

Mr. HERBERT. There are several substantial differences.

Mr. GARFIELD. I know; but the judicial appropriation bill will come back to us to-day from the Senate, and if the gentleman wants to make any modification of it so as to conform it to his ideas, it seems to me that he had better do it on that bill and not require us to consider and have pending at the same time two bills on substantially the same subject. While that judicial appropriation bill is pending in the Senate with amendments (we do not know what they are) it is hardly right for us to take up this bill, and thus be legislating at cross-purposes. I hope the gentleman will at least let this bill lie over until we can know what the other bill has in it.

Mr. HERBERT. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] I desire to state that the RECORD of this morning, which is before every gentleman of this House, states what amendments were offered and adopted by the Senate to the judicial appropriation bill. This is a different bill, differing in several respects from the Senate amendments to the judicial bill, and in one important particular. We present here, unincumbered by any question of legislation attached to an appropriation bill, a bill containing a plain provision for the drawing of a fair jury.

Now, there are many gentlemen on the other side of the House who have expressed to me privately during this session their desire to vote for such a bill. I wish to give them, I wish to give all gentlemen on the republican side of the House who wish to vote for a good jury bill, an opportunity to record themselves upon that issue. If there were no other reasons, that would be a sufficient one for insisting now upon the passage of this bill. If gentlemen on the other side have no proposition to make that looks to a determination of this question, to reaching a vote on this bill this session, I must insist upon the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. In answer to that I desire to say that on this side of the House we will wait until the bill very similar to this, which has passed the House and been considered and amended by the Senate, and which perhaps is here now, has been acted upon. We will then consider what we will do in regard to this bill.

Mr. HERBERT. Then I must insist upon the previous question.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were ayes 80, noes none.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CONGER and Mr. HERBERT were appointed.

Mr. CONGER. I wish the Chair would appoint another gentleman to act as teller in my place.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, then, will appoint the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. McGOWAN.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 80, noes none.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. HERBERT. I move that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. FINLEY.) The question is on the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 52, noes 58.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. DUNNELL called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DUNNELL and Mr. HERBERT were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 78, noes 79.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. HERBERT. I now demand a call of the House.

Mr. DUNNELL. Why have a call of the House? A quorum voted on the last vote.

Mr. HERBERT. Very well, I will withdraw my motion for a call of the House, and insist on a vote upon the previous question on the bill and amendment.

Mr. CONGER. That question has been tried in the only way it can be tried and no quorum voted. The only business now in order is a motion to adjourn or a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum has just voted on the motion to adjourn, and the question now recurs on seconding the demand for the previous question on the bill and pending amendment.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were ayes 42, noes none.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. McGOWAN and Mr. HERBERT were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 66, noes none.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. HERBERT. I move that there be a call of the House.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 66, noes 43.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. DUNNELL called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. McGOWAN and Mr. HERBERT were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 64, noes 79.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. HERBERT called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the House will not now adjourn. We look for the return from the Senate in a few minutes of the legislative appropriation bill, and we want to get a conference on it this afternoon.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I will withdraw the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs upon the motion for a call of the House, upon which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] demands the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—ayes 45, noes 44.

So (one-fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 98, nays 84, not voting 104; as follows:

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 2251) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, had disagreed to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. BECK, Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia, and Mr. WINDOM.

The message further announced that the Senate had concurred in the resolution of the House providing for printing 100,000 copies of Special Report No. 12 of the Commissioner of Agriculture, containing the reports of the commissioners appointed to investigate diseases of swine, and contagious and infectious diseases incident to other classes of domesticated animals.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 671) relating to vessels not propelled wholly by sail or internal motive power of their own.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, joint resolutions of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 34) to print 5,000 copies of the final reports of the United States centennial commission upon the international exhibition and centennial celebration of 1876; and

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 87) relating to a bridge across the Detroit River at or near Detroit, Michigan.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I move by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the message from the Senate asking for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2251) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and to move that the conference asked for on the part of the Senate be agreed to.

There was no objection, and the message of the Senate was taken up, and the conference asked for was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the legislative, &c., appropriation bill, Mr. ATKINS, Mr. BLOUNT and Mr. BAKER.

JURORS' TEST OATH, ETC.

Mr. STEPHENS. I now move that all further proceedings under the call of the House which has just been ordered be dispensed with.

Mr. PRICE. And I move that the House do now adjourn.

GLOVER'S REPORT.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I ask, by unanimous consent, to make a report from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CONGER. Let it be first stated what the report is about. I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. That is the gentleman's right.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Let the Clerk read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the petition of John M. Glover, chairman of the Committee on Expenditures——

Mr. CONGER. That is enough. [Laughter.] I have been watching that, and demand the regular order of business.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. STONE, for ten days from the 19th instant, on account of important business;

To Mr. BLOUNT, for ten days from Friday next, on account of important business;

To Mr. POUND, for two days, on account of important business.

JURORS' TEST OATH, ETC.

Mr. HERBERT. The call of the House has not been dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. It has not; but pending the motion to dispense with all further proceedings under the call made by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] the gentleman from Iowa moved that the House adjourn, which motion is in order and is the first question to be put.

Mr. HERBERT. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. CONGER. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 88, nays 97, not voting 101; as follows:

YEAS—88.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. SHELLEY. I am paired with Mr. WAIT, of Connecticut.

Mr. SMITH, of Georgia. I am paired with Mr. WILBER, of New York. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. MULDROW. I am paired with Mr. DWIGHT, of New York.

Mr. SAWYER. My colleague from Missouri, Mr. DAVIS, is paired with Mr. MCCOID, of Iowa.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. BUTTERWORTH, of Ohio, and Mr. WHITEAKER, of Oregon, are paired.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I am paired with my colleague from New York, Mr. BAILEY.

Mr. RICHMOND. I am paired with Mr. PRESCOTT, of New York. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. AIKEN. My colleague from South Carolina, Mr. RICHARDSON, is paired with Mr. CAMP, of New York.

Mr. JOHNSTON. My colleague from Virginia, Mr. HARRIS, is paired with Mr. CROWLEY, of New York.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. My colleague, Mr. CHALMERS, is paired with Mr. VAN VOORHIS, of New York.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am paired with Mr. HURD, of Ohio.

Mr. LAPHAM. Upon all political questions I am paired with Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, and my colleague, Mr. STARIN, is paired with Mr. MONEY, of Mississippi.

Mr. WARD. Mr. MORSE, of Massachusetts, is paired with my colleague, Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. MCGOWAN. Mr. VALENTINE, of Nebraska, is absent by leave of the House, and is paired with Mr. LE FEVRE.

Mr. WASHBURN. I am paired with Mr. POEHLER.

Mr. BAYNE. I am paired with Mr. FROST.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. My colleague, Mr. KITCHIN, is paired with Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts.

Mr. HUNTON. My colleagues, Mr. TUCKER and Mr. CABELL, are paired with Mr. LAPHAM and Mr. FISHER.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Mr. MULLER, of New York, is paired with Mr. HEILMAN, of Indiana.

Mr. MANNING. My colleague, Mr. MONEY, is absent by leave of the House, and is paired with Mr. RYAN, of Kansas.

Mr. KENNA. My colleague, Mr. WILSON, is still absent on account of serious illness in his family, and is paired with Mr. REED, of Maine.

Mr. HENRY. My colleague, Mr. TALBOTT, is paired with Mr. BALLOU.

Mr. HILL. My colleague, Mr. ATHERTON, is paired with Mr. NEWBERRY, of Michigan.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. STEPHENS to dispense with further proceedings under the call of the House; and being put, the motion was agreed to.

So all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The question recurred on the demand for the previous question; and being put, there were ayes 76, noes none.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. HERBERT. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. No quorum having voted, the usual course is for the Chair to appoint tellers, but pending that the gentleman from Georgia moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I withdraw the motion.

The question recurred upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. Is it in order now to move to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. Then I make the motion.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 84, noes 46.

Mr. HERBERT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 42 members voting therefor.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 86, nays 79, not voting 121; as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was agreed to.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. HUNTON. My colleague, Mr. TUCKER, is paired with Mr. LAPHAM, of New York, and my colleague, Mr. CABELL, is paired with Mr. FISHER, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. SMITH, of Georgia. I am paired with Mr. WILBER, of New York. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. SLEMONS. My colleague, Mr. DUNN, left the House a few minutes ago quite unwell.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I am paired on all political questions with Mr. LORING, of Massachusetts. Two or three times to-day I have inadvertently passed between the tellers, voting on different questions. I decline to vote on this question.

Mr. MANNING. I am paired with Mr. RYAN, of Kansas.

Mr. MULDROW. I am paired with Mr. DWIGHT, of New York, and my colleague, Mr. MONEY, is paired with Mr. STARIN, of New York.

Mr. SAWYER. My colleague from Missouri, Mr. DAVIS, is paired with Mr. MCCOID, of Iowa.

Mr. KENNA. My colleague, Mr. WILSON, is still absent on account of sickness in his family, and is paired with Mr. REED, of Maine.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. My colleague, Mr. KITCHIN, is paired with Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts.

Mr. HILL. My colleague, Mr. ATHERTON, is paired with Mr. NEWBERRY, of Michigan.

Mr. SHELLEY. I am paired with Mr. WAIT, of Connecticut.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to announce that Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, is paired with Mr. NEAL, of Ohio; that Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, is paired with Mr. NILES, of Connecticut; and that Mr. MULLER, of New York, is paired with Mr. HEILMAN, of Indiana.

Mr. BLISS. I desire to state that Mr. BUTTERWORTH, of Ohio, is paired with Mr. WHITEAKER, of Oregon.

Mr. LOUNSBERRY. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. BAILEY.

Mr. HULL. My colleague, Mr. DAVIDSON, is paired with Mr. HARMER, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICHMOND. I am paired with Mr. PRESCOTT, of New York.

Mr. KING. My colleague, Mr. GIBSON, is paired with Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut.

Mr. JOHNSTON. My colleague, Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, is paired with Mr. CROWLEY, of New York.

Mr. SINGLETON. My colleague, Mr. CHALMERS, is paired with Mr. VAN VOORHIS, of New York.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am paired with Mr. HURD, of Ohio, and my colleague, Mr. MORSE, is paired with Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. WASHBURN. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. POEHLER.

Mr. MCGOWAN. I desire to state that Mr. VALENTINE, of Nebraska, is paired with Mr. LE FEVRE, of Ohio.

Mr. BAYNE. I am paired with Mr. FROST, of Missouri.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I am paired with Mr. LEWIS, of Alabama.

Mr. STONE. Mr. STARIN, of New York, is paired with Mr. MONEY, of Mississippi.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the announcement of the result of the vote on the motion to adjourn, leave of absence was granted by unanimous consent as follows:

To Mr. RICHARDSON, of New York, for ten days, to attend court as a witness in an important case.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated; and accordingly (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois: Papers relating to the claim of Washington L. Parvin and Henry A. Green, to be reimbursed moneys expended in raising troops in California in 1861—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. FIELD: The petition of Mary Ann Murphy, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GUNTER: Papers relating to the war claim of the Cave Hill (Arkansas) Presbyterian church—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. KING: Memorial of the constitutional convention of Louisiana, for the passage of the bill establishing a United States district court for North Louisiana—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, memorial of the constitutional convention of Louisiana, asking for the donation of military barracks, arsenal, and grounds in the city of Baton Rouge, for educational purposes—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware: The petition of J. Turpin Moore and 70 others, citizens, vessel owners and captains, of Sussex County, Delaware, that the port of Seaford, in said county, be made a port of delivery—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia: Papers relating to the claim of Samuel Kelly for pay for services as a scout and guide for the United States Army—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 18, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I present the memorial of George D. H. Gillespie and John Wolfe, executors of the will of Joseph L. Lewis, deceased, formerly of Hoboken, New Jersey, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 2046) to authorize a compromise of the claims of the United States under the will of Joseph L. Lewis. As this is a very important case now pending before the Senate, I move that the memorial and accompanying papers be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND. As the bill has been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary the memorial will lie on the table, I presume.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will lie on the table.

Mr. HARRIS. I present the petition of Mrs. R. P. Howell and many other citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1379) fixing the rate of interest upon arrearages of general taxes and assessments for special improvements, now due to the District of Columbia, and for a revision of assessments for special improvements, and for other purposes. I ask that it lie on the table, the Committee on the District of Columbia having already reported the bill back with the recommendation that it pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

Mr. ROLLINS. I present a petition of a like character to that just presented by the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will lie on the table.

Mr. ROLLINS. It is the petition of Robert H. Ryan and others. It is very numerously signed by citizens of the District of Columbia.

Mr. EATON presented the petition of Edwin De Leon, late United States consul-general in Egypt, praying for compensation for judicial services rendered while acting as such from the year 1848 to the year 1852, as provided for by act of Congress of August 10, 1848; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LAMAR presented the petition of William A. Rogers, a soldier of the war of 1812, in the Virginia militia, praying for the passage of a law granting him a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McPHERSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 696) for the relief of William Nephew King, jr., reported it without recommendation.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2274) concerning the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana, reported it with an amendment.

DISTRICT CHURCH PROPERTY.

Mr. HARRIS. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1369) to relieve the churches of the District of Columbia, and to clear the title of the trustees to such property, have instructed me to report it with a recommendation that it pass. I ask for the present consideration of the bill, believing, as I do, that it will not take two minutes, the Senate having passed precisely a similar bill within a day or two of the end of the last session of Congress, and the House now sends this bill to us, it having passed the House.

The bill was read by its title.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Let the bill be read, Mr. President.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of an act of Congress entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874, as was construed to authorize the commissioners of the District to set aside former exemptions from taxation of church property which was actually held and used for the purpose of divine worship, and to enforce a tax upon such property, be, and is hereby, repealed; and the title to such property is hereby declared to vest in the trustees, or such other persons as held the title to the same at the time of the passage of the act of 1874, or their successors in interest, notwithstanding the sale of such property for non-payment of taxes.

SEC. 2. That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they hereby are, authorized and required to refund to the trustees or other proper officers of such church or churches as have paid the taxes assessed against them under the act of June 20, 1874, such sums respectively as were paid by each upon property actually held and used for the purpose of divine worship.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator who reported the bill to tell us what is the occasion of it? If I remember aright, this is the fourth bill that we have had within the last three or four years on this subject, and I should like to know why it is.

Mr. HARRIS. I will state to the Senator from New York that the Senate passed a bill exactly as this bill now stands, one precisely similar to it, during the last day or two of the last session of the Forty-fifth Congress. The House now sends us precisely the same bill that we sent them, but which was not acted upon in the House during that session. I will send to the Clerk's desk, if the Senator desires it, a report that I had the honor of making at the last session of Congress, that will develop all the facts. The report consists of only one page.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not desire it, since I learn that this is similar to the bill we passed. I supposed this was still an additional bill, and I hear bills of its title read here so often that I became very curious to know why there were so many of them.

Mr. BLAINE. Let the bill be read again.

The Chief Clerk again read the bill.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question. I understand that by the provisions of this bill, where a sale for taxes has taken place the proposed law declares the sale to be set aside. How can we do that?

Mr. HARRIS. The church property was bid off to the District of Columbia, I will state to the Senator.

Mr. KERNAN. The bill so states.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Not to an individual?

Mr. KERNAN. No.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill so recites the fact; the fact is that way; not to an individual.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELECTIONS AND APPOINTMENTS IN RHODE ISLAND.

Mr. WHYTE. I am instructed by the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment to report the following resolution and ask its passage by the Senate. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, to whom was referred the memorial of J. B. Greene and others, of Rhode Island, in relation to the alleged violation of sections 1754 and 1755 of the Revised Statutes, and of the alleged violation of civil-service reform in the State of Rhode Island, have leave to sit during the recess of the Senate, with power to employ a clerk and a stenographer, to appoint a sub-committee who may hold sessions at such place or places as may be deemed most convenient for the purposes of the investigation; and that the expenses thereof be paid out of the "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not rise to object to this proposition, but I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maryland how many committees have already been authorized to sit during the recess of Congress and at the expense of the contingent fund? I have noticed a considerable number of resolutions authorizing this to be done that have already passed; and I do not know but that every committee of the Senate has been authorized to sit during the recess.

Mr. WHYTE. I will state to the Senator from Vermont that the usual committees, the Committee on Printing, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and the Committee on the District of Columbia, are the only committees that I know of which have been authorized to sit during the recess of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator name the committees again?

Mr. WHYTE. The Committee on Printing regularly sits during the recess; the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. No; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. WHYTE. It has heretofore done so, when I have been a member of it, and I took it for granted it will require leave to do so during this session. The Committee on Contingent Expenses of the Senate always sits during the recess so as to audit any accounts that may be presented by the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Secretary of the Senate. The Committee on the District of Columbia has been authorized to sit, though it will be but a few days, in regard to the water rates and in regard to the expenses heretofore created in laying the water-pipes throughout the city. That was done at the instance of the colleague of the Senator from Vermont. With the exception of the Wallace committee, the committee formerly known as the Teller committee, I know of no other committee than these that have been authorized to sit during the recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GARLAND asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 703) fixing the time of the next annual meeting of Congress; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McPHERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 704) to explain the Revised Statutes relative to duties on imported merchandise; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 705) relating to the hailing-port of vessels owned in the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 706) to amend an act for the relief of Joseph B. Collins, approved March 3, 1879; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION.

Mr. LAMAR. I move to take up for consideration House bill No. 1847.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1847) to provide for the appointment of a "Mississippi River commission" for the improvement of said river from the head of the passes near its mouth, to its headwaters.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is reported from the Select Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River and its Tributaries, with amendments, none of which have been acted on by the Senate. The first amendment of the committee will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 4, it is proposed to strike out "five" and insert "seven;" so as to read:

That a commission is hereby created, to be called "The Mississippi River commission," to consist of seven members.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, I beg to call the attention of the Senate for a few moments to this amendment. The House of Representatives passed the bill creating a commission of five, to be composed of three engineer officers and two civil officers. The Senate committee proposes to increase the number of the commission to seven, and place upon the commission one officer from the Coast and Geodetic Survey and three from civil life. At the last Congress a move was made to take from the Engineer department the surveys under the direction of Clarence King and others, and the following provision was inserted in the sundry civil appropriation act, approved June 30, 1878:

> And the National Academy of Sciences is hereby required, at their next meeting, to take into consideration the methods and expense of conducting all surveys of a scientific character under the War or Interior Department and the surveys of the Land Office, and to report to Congress, as soon thereafter as may be practicable, a plan for surveying and mapping the Territories of the United States on such general system as will, in their judgment, secure the best results at the least possible cost; and also to recommend to Congress a suitable plan for the publication and distribution of reports, maps, and documents, and other results of the said surveys.

The academy made a report which resulted in taking from the Engineer department the survey under Clarence King and placing that with other work in a general survey. I at that time thought that that was a wrong move; but it was deemed wise by Congress to make the move, and the Engineer department, of course, had to be content with it. The Academy of Sciences in their report used this language:

> The committee consider that the field of inquiry proposed to the academy is intended to embrace only such surveys as pertain to the public domain. They have not included in their plan of organization surveys and investigations, however scientific in method and character, which apply solely to engineering works, such as the improvements of rivers, harbors, lakes, &c.; the irrigation and drainage of public lands, reclamation of tidal lands, and protection of alluvial regions from floods. Such surveys and investigations being inseparably connected with engineering problems, should, in the judgment of the committee, be conducted by the Engineer Corps of the Army. Nor do the committee recommend any change in the organization of the survey of the great lakes, as this is now nearly completed.

Thus it will be seen that the same court to which the question as to surveys was submitted, that is the Academy of Sciences, and which took from the Engineer department the survey of Clarence King, strongly recommended that all matters appertaining to river and harbor improvements and reclamation of overflowed land should be left to the exclusive control of the Engineer department.

As the House passed this bill it created a commission of five, that commission to be formed of three engineers and two civilians. There is no objection to the commission thus constructed, in fact I think it is wise that two civilians should be placed upon it, but the majority should in my opinion be officers of the Engineer Corps, and in that opinion I am sustained by the Academy of Sciences, which had this whole subject under consideration. They in their report state that the whole thing should be in the control of the Engineer Corps; in other words, that this entire commission should be composed of engineer officers.

As the bill came from the House I shall not oppose it, but as it is proposed to change it by the committee of the Senate I shall oppose it. I do not deem it wise to connect two bureaus of the Government, that is the Coast Survey and the Engineer department, in the same work. The work of the commission appertains to engineering, and should be done by the Engineer department; and I say it is unjust to that department and to its officers to place them upon a board constituted as is proposed by the bill as reported from the Senate committee.

Mr. President, I shall not extend this debate any further than I can help, because I do not desire to have the bill defeated for lack of time. I am perfectly willing to have the bill pass in a proper shape. I am in favor of a Mississippi River commission, but I am not in favor of such a one as is recommended by the Senate committee.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President, I think the bill as it comes to us from the House is preferable and is in better form than it will be if this amendment of the Senate committee is adopted. All the improvements of the rivers and harbors of our country are under the charge and direction of the Engineer Corps of the Army. The bill as it passed the House permits that corps to have a majority on the commission and it introduces another element into the commission which will give all the advantages which may be claimed by the friends of the bill. I see no reason why the commission should be enlarged. I think that if it is so enlarged there may be elements introduced which would not be favorable for public improvements of this kind. I hope the amendment will not be adopted and that the bill as it came from the House will be passed.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate more than a minute; I am anxious for a vote on this bill, but I want to say that this same amendment now reported by the committee was acted upon at the last session and received the approval of the Senate. I believe it to be in the interest of the improvement that the amendments reported by the committee should be adopted. I am sorry to disagree with my colleague [Mr. MCMILLAN] in this matter; but it is a very great work, and I believe that a mixed commission will give us a better plan for the improvement than we can procure in any other way. We have tried a mixed commission once before, and it was very successful, as I think. I see no injustice in the amendment to anybody, and I hope it will be agreed to. I certainly have no antagonism toward the Engineer Corps; I would do them no injustice. I recognize their great capacity and ability; but I believe that they will be aided also by the introduction of other elements in the commission. I am in favor of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the first amendment reported from the select committee, to strike out "five" and insert "seven;" so that the commission shall consist of seven members instead of five.

The question being put, there were, on a division, ayes 27.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 36, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—36.

Bailey,	Davis of W. Va.,	Ingalls,	Thurman,
Bayard,	Ferry,	Jonas,	Vance,
Beck,	Garland,	Kernan,	Vest,
Blaine,	Groome,	Lamar,	Voorhees,
Call,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Walker,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Maxey,	Wallace,
Coke,	Hereford,	Randolph,	Whyte,
Conkling,	Hill of Georgia,	Rollins,	Windom,
Davis of Illinois,	Houston,	Slater,	Withers.

NAYS—18.

Allison,	Cameron of Wis.,	Logan,	Ransom,
Anthony,	Carpenter,	McMillan,	Saulsbury,
Booth,	Chandler,	Morrill,	Saunders.
Burnside,	Gordon,	Paddock,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt,

ABSENT—22.

Bell,	Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,
Bruce,	Grover,	Kellogg,	Sharon,
Butler,	Hamlin,	Kirkwood,	Teller,
Dawes,	Hoar,	McDonald,	Williams.
Eaton,	Johnston,	Morgan,
Edmunds,	Jones of Florida,	Pendleton,

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment reported by the committee will be read.

The next amendment was, in line 2, section 2, after the word "appoint," to strike out "five" and insert "seven."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 4, section 2, after the word "army," to strike out "and two from civil life" and insert "one from the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and three from civil life, two of whom shall be civil engineers."

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move to strike out the word "three" in line 3 of section 2 of the bill and insert "four."

Mr. COCKRELL. I would suggest that the amendments of the committee be acted on first. That is not an amendment of the committee. Let it wait until the amendments of the committee are acted on. The Senator seeks to amend the text of the bill.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee which has been read.

Mr. MORRILL. I am quite ready to agree to any measure of the most liberal character for the improvement of the Mississippi River; and yet it seems to me that the propositions embraced in this bill thunder so loud in the index that they are likely to involve the Government in a large expenditure beyond what any government with any ideas of economy could sustain.

It will be seen here that we are to appropriate $175,000 to begin with. In addition to that the bill places at the disposal of this commission a detail from the officers and men of the Army, as many as may be necessary to carry on the work; it makes over all the vessels of the Coast Survey that are now in use on the Mississippi; and in addition to that it authorizes the purchase or lease of such other vessels, boats, or instruments as may be necessary to carry on the work. In addition to all this it will be seen that the proposition is to make investigations and surveys, in addition to those in progress heretofore, topographical, hydrographical, and hydrometrical, of the river from its mouth to its very headwaters, and they are to be made so as to examine "the practicability and feasibility and probable cost of the various plans known as the jetty system, the levee system, and the outlet system, as well as such others as they may deem necessary.

It does seem to me that this is commencing a preparation for a work that will more than absorb all the money that can be devoted to internal improvements for the entire country. It looks to me rather extravagant.

Mr. SAULSBURY. What is the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the third amendment of the committee, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

In line 4, section 2, after the word "Army," strike out "and two from civil life" and insert "one from the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and three from civil life, two of whom shall be civil engineers."

Mr. BURNSIDE. Is it in order to move to amend this amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "one from the Coast and Geodetic Survey."

Mr. LAMAR. I hope that amendment to the amendment will not be adopted, and that the amendment reported by the committee will be adhered to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment reported by the committee, which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the committee was, in line 11 of section 2, after the word "Army," to insert "and the Coast and Geodetic Survey;" so as to read:

The commissioners appointed from the Engineer Corps of the Army and the Coast and Geodetic Survey shall receive no other pay or compensation than is now allowed them by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, in line 14 of section 2, after the word "other," to strike out "two" and insert "three;" so as to read:

And the other three commissioners shall receive as pay and compensation for their services each the sum of $3,000 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, after the word "necessary," in line 15 of section 3, to insert:

And the Secretary of the Treasury shall, when requested by said commission, in like manner detail from the Coast and Geodetic Survey such officers and men as may be necessary, and shall place in the charge and for the use of said commission such vessel or vessels and such machinery and instruments as may be under his control and may be deemed necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the committee are disposed of; and the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island will now be in order.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not propose any amendment.

Mr. FERRY. I move to strike out, in lines 9 and 10 of section 2, beginning with the word "commission," in line 9, and going to the word "Army," in line 10; in other words, I move to strike out "appointed from the Engineer Corps of the Army;" so as to leave the President free to appoint the president of this commission from the whole commission. The President of the United States has the appointment of this commission, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. This clause is rather a judgment that the Engineer Corps are not sufficiently qualified to fill the place of president, and is really a discrimination against them. As the appointing power of the presidency of this commission emanates from the same source that appoints the whole commission, I cannot see why there should be a restriction placed upon the President. It might be possible, for instance, that one of the civil appointees might be fitted for the presidency, having perhaps more efficiency and perhaps as much, if not more, practical knowledge, even if he had not as much scientific knowledge; and he might, in the judgment of the President as well as of the Senate, be better fitted to fill the place of president of the commission than those selected from the Engineer Corps of the Army. Therefore I think this discrimination should be removed, and I think the Senator from Mississippi, who has charge of the bill, will not object to this amendment.

Mr. LAMAR. I dislike very much to oppose any amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan, for I know that he is a friend to the object of this bill; but he is mistaken, I think, in both the intent and effect of this provision. It is not to discriminate against the Engineer Corps, and it was inserted in the bill by both Houses because it was deemed to be proper that that survey should be under the direction of an Army engineer. They will have to execute the work that is ultimately decided upon by the commission and by the Government, and therefore it is deemed proper to express the opinion of this body that it should be under the general direction of a president, vested with the powers conferred upon him in this bill, taken from the Engineer Corps of the Army.

Mr. FERRY. That may be so in a measure; and still the President is not relieved of his responsibility. It seems to me that as we have increased the number of the commission now from five to seven, it would be far better to let the President have the scope of the seven to select from. In making the nomination he will have that in view; but there may be a difficulty perhaps. There may be certain engineers better fitted for certain parts of the work, and he may find a civilian who would be better fitted perhaps for the presidency of the commission. By giving him the full scope and unrestricted power he might frame a better commission than if he were restricted by this clause. I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. LAMAR. I hope the amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. FERRY. No; I want the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think this amendment would not be favorable for this commission. This improvement proposed now is confined to a very limited portion of the Mississippi River but a short distance from the mouth. The Engineer Corps of the Army have had entire charge of the improvements of the rivers and harbors of the country; they have had charge of the improvement of the Mississippi River, and surveys have been made upon that river under their direction covering the whole body of the river. Now it is proposed to organize a commission in which the Engineer Corps of the Army shall be in the minority, so that the civil engineers, the laymen, and the members of the commission from the Geodetic and Coast Survey shall control the movements of the commission.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. LAMAR. I think we shall get through with this bill in a few moments. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. WITHERS. In view of the fact that I yesterday gave notice that I should ask for a vote on the Army bill to-day before adjournment, I cannot consent that it shall be withheld by the bill that has been under consideration unless it can be agreed to have a vote on that at once without further discussion.

Mr. ALLISON. In a few minutes.

Mr. WITHERS. If a vote can be had at once I will yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business, which is the Army appropriation bill, may be laid aside temporarily, subject to call, and that the bill under consideration may be proceeded with. Is there objection?

Mr. CONKLING. Are we to understand that notwithstanding this unanimous consent, if it is given, the Senator from Virginia will insist on a vote to-day on the other bill?

Mr. WITHERS. That is precisely the position I take. I shall ask the Senate to dispose of the Army bill before adjournment to-day.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will hear a suggestion on that point, I should like to make one.

Mr. WITHERS. Certainly I will hear it.

Mr. CONKLING. The legislative, executive, and judicial bill is still in committee of conference——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will say to the Senator that the conference committee have agreed and the report is now in the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend until the Chair ascertains whether or not there is unanimous consent.

Mr. CONKLING. On the contrary if the Chair will allow me I am calling on myself to ascertain whether for one I will give consent or not. That is what I am trying to do. If the Senator from West Virginia will allow me to proceed, I reiterate my statement that the legislative, executive, and judicial bill is in conference committee, as I said it is and as he says it is. It has not therefore been enrolled; it has not received even the signatures of the presiding officers of the two Houses, and has not gone to the President. The judicial-expenses bill has gone back to the House. Therefore there are two appropriation bills, the action on which is not concluded, waiting to be enrolled and carried to the Executive.

Now I submit to the Senator from Virginia that it is not at all likely that he will advance the ultimate completion of the Army bill by one hour if he succeeds in getting a vote this afternoon rather than a vote to-morrow; and further I say to him that I understand there are several Senators on this side of the Chamber who want to make some remarks upon the Army bill, not of course with a view to consuming time but simply to speak to certain features of that bill as it stands which they wish to discuss. Inasmuch as the Army bill has been before the Senate but one single day, and a considerable part of that day occupied by other business, I see no occasion for the Senator's demanding that the bill shall be concluded to-day. I see no occasion for a night session and no need of attempting to incommode or crowd any Senator on either side who wishes to submit remarks on that bill.

Therefore I suggest that the Senator from Mississippi had better have his unanimous consent to conclude the consideration of this bill; and if, when a reasonable hour of adjournment is reached to-day, there be other Senators who want to be heard on the Army bill, in place of trying to incommode each other and sitting out the bill in the night, it had better go over, and the more so because for reasons I have given I do not believe it will make one hour's difference in the end whether we vote this afternoon or whether we vote to-morrow upon the Army bill.

Mr. WITHERS. I have arrived myself at a different conclusion from that reached by the Senator from New York. I think it important that we should have a vote upon this bill to-day. He is mistaken, however, in supposing that I demanded a vote. I simply gave notice of a purpose to request the Senate to dispose of the bill before it adjourns. Of course the whole matter remains with the Senate. If they are in favor of an adjournment, when that motion is made they can adjourn. I shall, however, resist it as the organ of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir; and if the Senator appeals to his party associates to stand with him, that makes a majority against adjournment. If we consent to take up the Mississippi bill, and two or three hours are devoted to it, then the result will be that Senators who want to make some observations about the Army bill will be driven into the night or denied the privilege altogether. I do not think that is fair.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I have looked into the bill somewhat as to a number of amendments that have been acted on and those still pending on the bill now before the Senate. I am satisfied that, having acted on all the committee's amendments, as there is but one more to be acted on so far as the Senate has been advised, we can get through with it in ten or fifteen minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi asks that by unanimous consent the appropriation bill may be informally laid aside subject to be called up at any time, and that the Senate proceed with the Mississippi River bill. Is there objection?

Mr. CONKLING. For one Senator, I will give my consent, and trust to the courtesy of the other side of the Chamber when we reach an ordinary hour of adjournment, if any Senator wants to be heard, that he shall not be cut off or pushed into the night.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator must not trust to my courtesy in the matter, if he alludes to me——

Mr. CONKLING. I did not indicate the Senator from Virginia as one to whose courtesy I would trust.

Mr. WITHERS. I am on "the other side of the Chamber," and as the bill is under my charge I supposed that perhaps I was alluded to.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not select the Senator from Virginia as the Senator to whose courtesy I intended to trust. Therefore I do not think there is any occasion for a reprimand from him.

Mr. HARRIS. I will say to the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from New York that I have the assurance of the Senator from Mississippi that he will not ask for more than twenty minutes. This bill can be passed in ten, I think; but he limits his request to twenty minutes' time.

Mr. LAMAR. I do.

Mr. HARRIS. I appeal to those two Senators to consent to the twenty minutes being devoted to this bill regardless of the notice given by the Senator from Virginia yesterday.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not rise to object to the consideration of this bill even until half past one, but I want to say after what the Senator from Virginia has said that I think we ought to sit this bill out this evening, and there was a sort of general understanding yesterday that it should be done.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think there was a sort of general understanding that we should remain and sit the bill out to-day. I do not know whether the Senator from New York agreed to it or not. I do not say he did; I do not say that other gentlemen did. But there is another view of it. The Senator from New York has said that it will not forward the appropriation bills to pass the Army bill to-day rather than to-morrow. I beg to differ with him on that. It will be one day in advance, I think, and that one day will count in the final adjournment. If we propose to adjourn, I think each day we stay here continues the time that much longer. The Appropriations Committee that has charge of the adjournment resolution from the House has been desirous for several days to propose a day and report the resolution back to the Senate; but they have thought they were not warranted in doing so until such time as all the appropriation bills had passed, and we hope to see them concluded here to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LAMAR. For twenty minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair nears none, and the Mississippi River improvement bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, subject to be displaced by a call for the regular order. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] to strike out of lines 9 and 10 of section 2 the words "appointed from the Engineer Corps of the Army."

Mr. McMILLAN. When I took my seat I was commenting on the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan with reference to the appointment of a person to be the chairman of this commission. As I stated when I was on the floor before, the Engineer Corps of the Army have had under their supervision all the improvements of the Mississippi River during the whole history of those improvements. They have made very important and generous improvements. At the rapids large and important improvements have been constructed by which the navigation of that river has been greatly improved, and throughout the whole course of the river they have adopted a scheme which will result in the improvement of the navigation of the river so that the entire Mississippi Valley and the whole country will be benefited by it. As the commission was organized in the House bill the benefits of the surveys heretofore made and the benefits of the experience of the Engineer Corps of the Army will all be brought into action, and proper effect given to them in the survey proposed in this bill. The commission as proposed by the amendment of the Senate committee will not only be deprived, partially at least, of those benefits, but will have elements introduced into it which will be unwholesome. It is not to be concealed here that this is a part of the extension of the improvement by jetties at the mouth of the river, and this plan will be but a continuation of those jetties.

Now, while I concede the engineering ability of Mr. Eads I do not believe that the survey authorized by this bill should be under the control of influences outside of the Engineer Corps of the Army, because the laymen on the commission with the member of the commission from the Geodetic Survey will control the entire movements of the commission, and a system of expenditure will be undertaken here which will not be justified by the results of the labors of this commission, as I verily believe. If the president of this commission is taken from the Corps of Engineers we shall at least have the benefit in that position of an officer of the Army whose skill in the execution of his duties and in the control and direction of the movements of that body will assure us of some protection in the expenditures and labors of this commission.

I predict, Mr. President, that if this commission provided in the amendment of the Senate committee is adopted, a system of expenditures will be incurred here which will far exceed the anticipation at present entertained by those who have any knowledge of this bill. I do not intend to delay the Senate on the bill. I am heartily in favor of the improvement of the river, and if the bill as it came from the House had been presented to the Senate I should have supported it cordially. As it is I am opposed to this amendment.

Mr. FERRY. It must not be lost sight of by the Senate that they have changed the complexion of this commission from what it was formed by the action of the House. The House sent us a bill for five commissioners, three of them to be taken from the Engineer Corps. The Senate by the decided vote of 36 to 18 have enlarged that number to seven and changed its complexion entirely, taking three from the Engineer Corps and three from civil life and one from the Coast Survey. It would seem to me that in harmony with this expression of the Senate they ought to remove all restriction from the President of the United States in making selection of the president of this commission. I differ with my friend from Minnesota. He has alluded to Captain Eads. I have made no reference to any person. I have only argued this point, that the President, who makes the appointment, ought to be left free entirely, inasmuch as the commission has been enlarged to seven. Thus, by the expression of the Senate, the President has been informed that the Senate believes there ought to be a larger civil element in the composition of this commission. Now, I say, corresponding with this, in harmony with the expression of the Senate, we certainly ought to remove this restriction and leave the President who makes the nomination free to say who shall be president of the commission. In this respect there is no trammel by my amendment, there is no reflection either on the Engineer Corps or the engineers taken from civil life. It strikes me that the best method is to give the President this option, and he will certainly select from the seven the man most efficient, having the most practical mind, to stand at the head of the commission.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I did not propose to say anything on this amendment, because the chairman of the committee has already stated that the committee recommend no change in this respect. In other words, the chairman of the committee recommends that the president of this commission shall be appointed by the President of the United States. I will say, however, that you cannot expect to get for $3,000 a year engineers any one of whom is fit for president of a commission of this kind. It is an absurdity to think of such a thing. But inasmuch as the chairman of the committee objects to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, I hope the Senate will find no trouble in voting it down.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not intend to consume the time of the Senate. I gave my views on this measure in the closing hours of the last session. I then expressed my opposition to this measure, which I regard as one which will prove very detrimental to the interests of the people of this country in the expenditure of money out of the Treasury.

The proposition in my judgment is one that ought to be more carefully and duly considered than it seems likely to be at present. It proposes the appointment of a commission for the purpose of ascertaining and determining what improvements shall be made in the Mississippi River and all its tributaries, a scheme which if carried out in the spirit in which it is conceived, in my judgment, will take more than $100,000,000 out of the public Treasury. It is true this bill appropriates but about $150,000 or $175,000 to defray the expenses of the commission; but that is simply the beginning. The appointment of this commission is simply the inception of a plan of improvements extending over half this continent, improvements which I now state, if carried out in the spirit in which they are conceived, will cost the Treasury of this country more money than has been expended on all the rivers and harbors of the country for the last twenty years.

Look at this bill, Mr. President. What does it propose? It proposes that this commission shall examine the Mississippi River from its mouth to its very headwaters, examine the surveys that have already been made, and make such additional surveys, examinations, and investigations, topographical, hydrographical, and hydrometrical, of said river and its tributaries, as may be deemed necessary by said commission to carry out the objects of this act.

The purpose is, therefore, to go and explore not only the Mississippi River but every river and creek entering into it, and to determine what improvement shall be made in order to insure the navigation of those rivers, and in the language of this bill determine and fix the channel—

> And protect the banks of the Mississippi River, improve and give safety and ease to the navigation thereof; prevent destructive floods.

I do not suppose it is contemplated to stop the winds of heaven and prevent the rains from coming down and overflowing the banks; but it is to guard against them by a system of levees over which these floods shall not roll. Then they are to take into view the "commerce, trade, and postal service" of the country, doing anything to advance either of those great interests, and submit their plan to the Secretary of War, and when approved come here and ask Congress for the money necessary to carry it out.

I wish here and now emphatically to enter my protest against a measure which in my judgment will cost the people of this country more than a hundred millions of dollars in the next ten years. Representing as I do a portion of the tax-payers of the country, I am unwilling to see a measure of this kind commenced when I know that the people of the country have got to pay the expense by taxation imposed upon them. Having submitted my views more at length, however, at the last session of Congress, I shall not trouble the Senate further on this measure, but content myself by recording my vote against the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 47, nays 4; as follows:

YEAS—47.

Allison,	Conkling,	Houston,	Rollins,
Bailey,	Davis of Illinois,	Ingalls,	Saunders,
Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Slater,
Beck,	Dawes,	Jones of Florida,	Thurman,
Blaine,	Ferry,	Kernan,	Vance,
Burnside,	Garland,	Kirkwood,	Vest,
Call,	Groome,	Lamar,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hampton,	Logan,	Walker,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harris,	McMillan,	Whyte,
Carpenter,	Hereford,	Paddock,	Windom,
Cockrell,	Hill of Colorado,	Pendleton,	Withers.
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Randolph,

NAYS—4.

Chandler,	Morrill,	Platt,	Saulsbury.

ABSENT—25.

Anthony,	Farley,	Kellogg,	Sharon,
Bell,	Gordon,	McDonald,	Teller,
Booth,	Grover,	McPherson,	Wallace,
Bruce,	Hamlin,	Maxey,	Williams.
Butler,	Hoar,	Morgan,
Eaton,	Johnston,	Plumb,
Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,

So the bill was passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is——

Mr. LAMAR. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. BRUCE] be allowed to record his vote. He was detained at his house by sickness in his family, and was on his way here to vote on the bill just passed. I ask that he be permitted to record his vote on the bill just passed, House bill No. 1847.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair believes that is against the rule.

Mr. CONKLING. It has been done.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the impression that the rule which prohibits voting after the result has been announced cannot be suspended even by unanimous consent.

Mr. LAMAR. Not by unanimous consent?

Mr. CONKLING. May I remind the Chair and the Senator from Mississippi that near the close of the last session the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] on the occasion, I think, of the passage of the so-called anti-Chinese bill, made a similar request he not being in the Chamber and by unanimous consent he was allowed to record his vote.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say that Senator HAMLIN asked consent.

Mr. CONKLING. That is the Senator to whom I refer, the senior Senator from Maine, and I think nobody objected to it.

Mr. BRUCE. I simply ask unanimous consent to be allowed to record my vote in favor of the bill. I was detained at home, and was on my way here and very nearly here when the vote was taken. Had I been here I should have voted for the bill. I was coming here for no other purpose than that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There would certainly be no objection to that if the rule permitted it. The Chair will read the rule to the Senate:

18. When the yeas and nays shall be taken upon any question, no Senator shall, under any circumstances whatever, be permitted to vote after the decision shall have been announced from the Chair; but a Senator may, for special reasons assigned by him, with the unanimous consent of the Senate, change or withdraw his vote after such announcement. No motion to suspend this rule shall be in order.

Mr. LAMAR. I suggest to my colleague that his object is accomplished by making the request anyhow.

Mr. BRUCE. I am very well satisfied. I simply wanted it distinctly understood that I am in favor of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If it is desired, the Chair will submit the question to the Senate whether it can be done. The impression of the Chair is that the rule cannot be suspended, even by unanimous consent.

Mr. LAMAR. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator can state how he would have voted if he were here.

Mr. BRUCE. Certainly. I have stated that I would have voted "yea."

PAY OF CONGRESSIONAL EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. WALLACE. I wish to make a report from a committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky, who is entitled to the floor on the unfinished business, yield?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. WALLACE. The committee of conference to whom was referred the difference between the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 85) fixing the date on which the pay of the committee clerks, pages, and laborers of the House of Representatives who are paid during the session only shall begin for this session, and for other purposes, have instructed me to make a report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask for action on the report now?

Mr. WALLACE. No; let the report lie on the table for the present.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WITHERS. Regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is House bill No. 2175.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2175) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] on which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I stated yesterday evening that I had not expected to say anything more on the political questions now before the Senate; I intended to reserve what else I might have to say about them till I returned to my constituents in Kentucky, where I expect to be pretty fully and freely heard; and I desire to state now that if any gentlemen on the other side will consent to come to Kentucky to be heard in maintenance of their views or to controvert my statements, I will divide time with them and entertain them as well as I can while there.

Mr. CONKLING. Cannot we hear the Senator without going clear out there?

Mr. BECK. I think you will not care to hear me, but I am afraid you will have to for a few minutes, as I have something more to say in corroboration of what I said yesterday. When the Senator from Maine with great emphasis—I need not say that, because all that he says is said with great emphasis—announced that he believed—I will read his language:

I am very sure that there is no Senator on this floor who can say or pretend to say that any citizen of the United States was ever prevented from voting by a soldier of the United States.

And when the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] gave him reasons for believing that he had reliable information which enabled him to say so, the Senator from Maine said:

I did not challenge the powers of lying of the whole American people. I said that no Senator on that side would say that anybody had ever been prevented.

Again he said:

What I asked was for that form of respectable and responsible testimony, whether a Senator knew or pretended to know that anybody had been prevented from voting by troops.

I stated that I had that character of respectable and responsible testimony which authorized me to say that in my judgment I could show that citizens, legal voters, men who had all the elements necessary to make them competent to go to the polls and cast their votes for whom they pleased, had been prevented from voting by the soldiers of the United States. I read the committee's reports of what occurred in August, 1865, in the State of Kentucky, in the county of Bath; and be it remembered that August, 1865, was months after the surrender of the last confederate soldier. No hostile arm was ever raised against the authority of the United States from the day of that surrender, and no decent excuse for martial law or its continuance existed in any Southern State, far less in Kentucky, in August, 1865.

Even the law that we have been for months seeking to repeal, and which gentlemen on the other side are so earnest to retain for partisan purposes on the statute-book, and which the President has taken the pains to veto the repeal of, was passed on the 21st day of February, 1865. That law declared it to be unlawful for any soldier to be present at the polls in any State except for the purpose of keeping the peace. Be it remembered that no act had been passed in August, 1865, authorizing supervisors, marshals, deputy marshals, or any of the present machinery of the Federal Government to be employed for any purpose, foul or fair, at the polls. The act of 1866 requiring a uniform day for the holding of elections for members of Congress, fixing it for bad purposes on a day in November, when men were required by the Constitution to vote for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, and when nine-tenths of the States elected all their State officers, from the highest to the lowest—even that law had not then been devised. With the law of 1865 prohibiting soldiers from being sent to the polls except to keep the peace, when there was no war raging or rumor of war prevailing in the country, when the last rebel had surrendered, I repeat, by the testimony of as respectable a body of men as ever met together in any assembly—that is, by the recorded vote of the Kentucky Legislature and the report of one of its committees—in the county of Bath legal voters were driven from the polls by armed troops because they would not obey an illegal order of General Palmer, then pretending to control elections, because he was in command of Kentucky, or for some other equally bad purpose, which I believe he has long ago repented of.

I now propose to read what occurred in the county of Garrard, as stated in a report from the same committee, and I need not read again the names of the gentlemen who composed it. I said yesterday that Judge Benjamin F. Buckner was a man who fought through the war in the Federal Army; that Colonel Frank Wolford, who is well known, is one of the most gallant soldiers in the service; that the Kentucky Legislature was composed altogether of men not one of whom had ever joined the confederacy, twenty-odd of whom to my knowledge (and I presume there were many more) fought through the war on the side of the United States—five times as many as there are Senators on the other side who fought in the same cause; and I suppose there were ten times as many if I knew them all personally as I do the twenty that I can speak for. That committee made this report:

On the first Monday in August, 1865, an election was held in Garrard County, at which W. J. Lusk and Daniel Murphy were candidates to represent that county in this branch of the Legislature—

I need not tell men who have ever been in that portion of Kentucky—there are men here who know him—that W. J. Lusk, who was the democratic candidate, was as loyal a man as there is in this Chamber on either side of it—and were voted for by the people of the county for that office.

On the evening preceding the election a force of negro soldiers, fully armed, was sent into the county, and, on the morning of the election, were stationed at or near the various voting places, where they remained during the day.

I need not say in this or any other presence that if there was any body of soldiers who at that day were more offensive to the people of Kentucky regardless of party than any other, it was those who, having been their former slaves were armed and drilled and placed at the polls, in order to arrest and insult their former masters. The thirteenth amendment had not then passed, and the object of the military authorities at that election was to elect a Legislature that would vote for and adopt that amendment; hence it was that the soldiers, and especially the negro soldiers, were sent to the polls in order to prevent all men who were not willing to sustain the proposed thirteenth amendment from being elected to that Legislature. Alabama was the last State that ratified it on the 5th day of December, and the slaves of Kentucky were freed by the votes of Alabama and South Carolina and other States that were afterward driven out of the Union and told they never were States after the war, but were military satrapies, and yet Kentucky, Maryland, and Missouri, and other States, had all their slaves emancipated by the vote of those States, and the determination of the radicals was to make Kentucky do it or make it appear that she had done so, and to prevent the repeal of obnoxious laws which an insanely loyal Legislature had passed during the war.

On the evening preceding the election, a force of negro soldiers, fully armed, was sent into the county, and on the morning of the election were stationed at or near the various voting places, where they remained during the day. Many of the best citizens of the county were arrested by the officers commanding the various squads of negro soldiers at the different voting places, taken away from the polls by negro soldiers, and by them kept under arrest until the polls were closed.

That, be it remembered, is the report of a respectable committee, a highly respectable committee of the Legislature of Kentucky. Their report was sustained, and the man who professed to have been elected was rejected by a vote of 61 to 20 upon a call of the yeas and nays. Not one of the 61 that voted for his rejection was either in the confederate army or had any connection with it.

The committee proceed:

The proof shows that many qualified voters were warned by those acting with the soldiers and in the interest of the sitting member—not to appear at the polls or attempt to vote, on pain of being arrested by the military and sent off under guard to Camp Nelson.

Mr. Murphy—

Camp Nelson was a large fortification on the edge of the county of Garrard, on the Kentucky River, between that and the county of Jessamine.

It is shown that the white men who commanded the negro troops, at several of the voting places stood at the polls with proscribed lists in their hands, and either drove from the polls or ordered the arrest of peaceable citizens and qualified voters, for no other offense than that their names appeared on said lists, and that they desired to vote for Lusk and against Murphy. These lists were used at almost all the voting places in the county, and numbered from forty to fifty names each, all of whom were prevented from voting by the military until late in the evening, when it was ascertained that Murphy was certainly elected. A few of those whose names appeared on the lists were permitted to vote.

Will Senators contend that this took place at a national election where United States troops were or are authorized or required to preserve the peace of the United States? It was at a county election for members of the Kentucky Legislature. Was not the law of 1865 then in force which provided that no officer should take troops to the polls in any State under any pretext, except to keep the peace? All the proof showed conclusively that the election was peaceable and that no man sought to make disturbance.

At Lancaster—

Say the committee—

George R. McKee—

He may not be known to many men in this Senate, but George R. McKee is known all over the West as one of the ablest and most eloquent members of the bar of Kentucky to-day, now living in Covington, practicing law in partnership with General John W. Finnell. His legal ability and eloquence and his standing as a gentleman are second to none in the State.

At Lancaster, George R. McKee, together with some thirteen or fourteen others, were arrested, placed in charge of negro soldiers, who marched them off to an old church in the town, where the most of them were kept under guard by the negroes until after the polls were closed, when they were released and permitted to go to their homes, no charge of any kind being preferred against any of them. This wholesale arrest and imprisonment of men deterred many persons from offering to vote, who otherwise would have voted for Lusk and against Murphy.

At Bryantsville precinct, soon after the polls were opened, and when but few votes had been polled, a Federal officer, accompanied by some four or five soldiers, walked up to the polls and in a haughty and commanding voice ordered those who were near the polls attempting in a peaceable, quiet manner to cast their votes to clear the polls, to stand back and let him in; that it was his intention to manage that election himself. He entered the room where the votes were being taken and ordered the judges of the election to poll no vote without his sanction, at the same time exhibiting a list of names, none of which he said would be permitted to vote and would arrest the first one of them who offered to vote. Under this order Mr. H. Smith, an aged citizen of high respectability and a qualified voter, was arrested and placed in the custody of negro troops, who held him until noon, when he was released, no charge being preferred against him.

Another citizen and qualified voter was arrested soon after Smith was, and held in custody, and was released when Smith was, on conditions that he would not attempt to vote, and would go straightway home, with which conditions he gladly complied.

The proof shows that from early in the morning until it was ascertained beyond a doubt that Murphy was elected, the friends of Murphy, acting in concert with the military, were busily engaged in deterring legal voters from going to the polls, by telling them they would certainly be arrested if they offered to vote; exciting their fears by telling them they would be sent off to some loathsome prison, to be held there for months, and finally be tried by a military commission.

Our people knew well what a trial by military commission meant. So did the people of the West generally.

By such intimidations and threats, both on the part of citizens and the military, many good citizens were prevented from casting their votes at the Bryantsville precinct.

Negro soldiers were stationed at all the voting places; arrests were made at all save one. The judges of the election at some of the polls publicly proclaimed that they were holding the election not under civil but military law. All the witnesses who have deposed state that the election was carried by fraud and violence, threats and intimidations, both on the part of soldiers and citizens.

The depositions from which the foregoing facts were derived were those of strictly Union men, and for the most part of men who had served in the Federal Army and been honorably discharged therefrom.

Not only were the committee men of that class, but the witnesses they examined, all of whom proved the facts I have read, were for the most part men who had served in the Federal Army and had been honorably discharged therefrom. All of them were strictly Union men.

The committee add:

From the facts elicited, the undersigned are of opinion that the election was not free and equal, and was not conducted in conformity to law; wherefore they recommend the adoption of the following resolution, namely:

Resolved, That Daniel Murphy is not entitled to a seat in this house as representative from Garrard County; that his seat be declared vacant, and the speaker directed to issue his writ for an election to fill said vacancy.

I. N. WEBB, Chairman.
B. F. BUCKNER.
FRANK WOLFORD.
M. JEFF. ROARK.

Mr. Finnie moved that the report and evidence be printed.

And the question being taken thereon, it was decided in the negative.

On motion of Mr. Stout, the evidence was read.

And the question being taken on the adoption of said report, it was decided in the affirmative.

The yeas and nays being required thereon by Messrs. Buckner and R. T. Davis, were as follows.

I do not care about giving the names of the representatives, but, as I said of Judge Buckner yesterday, there are those here who have heard him perhaps before the Supreme Court of the United States, men who know him as I do, know that there is no better lawyer or abler man; and R. T. Davis was for many years one of the leading lawyers of his section, the son of Hon. Garrett Davis, who served so long and so ably in this body. When the yeas and nays were called the affirmative vote was 61, the nays 20, and Mr. Murphy was expelled from his seat on the facts set forth in the report.

I have the report as to the counties of Clark and Madison and other counties of the State. Here is one from the county of Campbell, within gunshot of the city of Cincinnati, where there never was a rebel soldier in any organized body, where there never was a company of men with the confederate uniform on, that I ever heard of. In the county of Campbell the same proof was made. I will read only portions of it:

At the Cold Spring precinct, one citizen, whose right to vote was undoubted, voted before the military interfered, and went home. He was sent for and brought back, and kept under guard nearly all day. One citizen was met on the road a quarter of a mile from the place of voting and halted by a sergeant, with a cocked pistol presented at him, which he seized and took from the soldier; but, under the advice of friends, he yielded himself up; when he was taken before Captain Read, who, after shamefully abusing him, had him tied to a tree in full view of the voting place and the big road, and kept him thus tied all day—an act of infamy on the part of this captain which utterly disgraced the uniform he wore, and should bring disrepute upon those who continued him in office after so disgusting an exhibition of his petty tyranny. Another citizen was ordered off without being permitted to vote, and, although he went away in obedience to the order, yet, by command of Captain Read, he was followed and brought back, and tied to a tree in full view of the voting place and the public highway.

Mr. CONKLING. What year was that?

Mr. BECK. Eighteen hundred and sixty-five, in August, in a county where I suppose there never was a confederate soldier publicly seen.

The result of these acts of shameful lawlessness on the part of the military was to deter men from going to the polls to exercise the dearest right the freeman knows.

At Indian Spring precinct two citizens were arrested by the military, one while he was voting, and the other after he had voted.

The committee proceed to state cases of man after man of the most respected citizens of that country who were driven from the polls, all legal voters, and to give the circumstances and the conversations that were had; wherefore they recommend that the radical representatives should not be allowed to hold their seats, because they were elected by force, fraud, and military interference.

I said when I rose that I would read evidence that I thought would be satisfactory, even to the Senator from Maine, that citizens who were entitled to vote had been prevented from voting by the military. If I have not, I confess my inability to do so. Of course the military officers who were in command in Kentucky at that time endeavored to make it appear by all sorts of reasons that they had authority to issue their military orders to show why they should seek to control the people at the polls; but every Senator knows that the courts were then open, the war had closed, the civil authorities prevailed and were in the undisputed exercise of all their functions. That election was held under the civil authorities, and all the efforts to declare or sustain the pretense for martial law were simply null and void; if the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] had never done anything else, his decision in the Bowles and Milligan case would send his name down to posterity with imperishable honor.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question with his permission.

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Did not martial law prevail in Kentucky at that time?

Mr. BECK. Martial law prevailed only to the extent that General Palmer, in command at Louisville, had seen fit to issue an order to that effect, continuing an old order of President Lincoln issued during the war, Mr. Lincoln being then dead.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. And that General Palmer is who?

Mr. BECK. That General Palmer was after that governor of Illinois. He is now, I believe, a democrat. He was a gallant soldier during the war, but exceeded his duty and authority after the war was over, in my opinion. He came to see the error of his ways very soon, and is not like a good many of you—citizens in war and soldiers in peace—who got mad and warlike after the war was over and are getting madder and madder every day when there is no danger. General Palmer is not a man of that sort. General Palmer did wrong in 1865 in Kentucky, or wrongs were done in his name. He will say so, in my judgment, as promptly as I or any other man. I care nothing about that. The Supreme Court of the United States, Judge Davis delivering the opinion of the court, decided that he did wrong, whether he thinks so or not. Let me read what the Supreme Court did say about martial law in the Bowles-Milligan case, and that will make my position clear:

> If armies were collected in Indiana they were to be employed in another locality where the laws were obstructed and the national authority disputed. On her soil there was no hostile foot; if once invaded, that invasion was at an end, and with it all pretext for martial law. Martial law cannot arise from a threatened invasion. The necessity must be actual and present, the invasion real—such as effectually closes the courts and deposes the civil administration.

Was there anything of that sort in Kentucky? The courts were open, the civil authorities were in possession of full power. These very men who deprived citizens of the right to vote in August had been themselves judges of the election in November, 1864, when Mr. Lincoln and General McClellan were the candidates of the respective parties, and a committee of the Kentucky Legislature certified and proved that the very men who were not allowed to vote in August, 1865, had been allowed to vote, and voted for General McClellan in November, 1864, while war was flagrant, by these very same judges of election who deprived them of that right in 1865, under military orders.

I repeat that those men were declared not to be qualified to vote in 1865 under partisan military orders when they were decided to be qualified to vote in November, 1864, by the same men who rejected them in 1865. Mr. President, there is no trouble in knowing who votes in Kentucky. We vote viva voce. Each man, black and white, walks up to the polls and tells who he votes for, and his name and vote is publicly recorded. As I said the other day, and I repeat it again in the hearing of the Senate and the country, no man ever was displaced from office or position or interfered with in any way for the vote he gave, no matter for whom he voted, boldly, freely, and openly; we have no tissue ballots there, no cheating of any sort.

Mr. BLAINE. Where are the tissue ballots?

Mr. BECK. They are not in Kentucky. If they are in Maine it would be well for the people the Senator represents to see to it. I speak for my own people, and for them only. We had no ballots at all until we were forced by Congress to vote by ballot for members of Congress. I hope the Senator will help us to repeal that law, as far as Kentucky is concerned, and let us vote viva voce again, as we had always done.

It follows—

Says the court—

> from what has been said on this subject, that there are occasions when martial rule can be properly applied. If, in foreign invasion or civil war, the courts are actually closed, and it is impossible to administer criminal justice according to law, then on the theater of active military operations, where war really prevails, there is a necessity to furnish a substitute for the civil authority thus overthrown to preserve the safety of the army and society; and as no power is left but the military, it is allowed to govern by martial rule until the laws can have their free course. As necessity creates the rule, so it limits its duration; for if this government is continued after the courts are reinstated it is a gross usurpation of power. Martial rule can never exist where the courts are open and in the proper and unobstructed exercise of their jurisdiction. It is also confined to the locality of actual war. Because, during the late rebellion, it could have been enforced in Virginia, where the national authority was overturned and the courts driven out, it does not follow that it should obtain in Indiana, where that authority was never disputed and justice was always administered. And so in the case of a foreign invasion, martial rule may become a necessity in one State when in another it would be "mere lawless violence." We are not without precedents in English and American history illustrating our views of this question; but it is hardly necessary to make particular reference to them.
> From the first year of the reign of Edward the Third, when the Parliament of England reversed the attainder of the Earl of Lancaster, because he could have been tried by the courts of the realm, and declared "that in time of peace no man ought to be adjudged to death for treason or any other offense without being arraigned and held to answer, and that regularly when the King's courts are open it is a time of peace in judgment of law," down to the present day, martial law, as claimed in this case, has been condemned by all respectable English jurists as contrary to the fundamental laws of the land and subversive of the liberty of the subject.
> So sensitive were our revolutionary fathers on this subject, although Boston was almost in a state of siege when General Gage issued his proclamation of martial law, they spoke of it as an "attempt to supersede the course of the common law, and instead thereof to publish and order the use of martial law." The Virginia Assembly also denounced a similar measure on the part of Governor Dunmore "as an assumed power, which the King himself cannot exercise, because it annuls the law of the land and introduces the most execrable of all systems, martial law."

So in Virginia, so everywhere, as the court shows. If General Palmer or anybody else in August, 1865, declared martial law in Kentucky, as the courts in Indiana undertook to do in regard to Bowles and Milligan, as they attempted to do in many other cases, the act was illegal, null, and void; it was violative of the Constitution of the United States and of the law of February 18, 1865, about which we had so much controversy, that prevented soldiers from going to the polls except when they were there simply to keep the peace while elections were being held, and which prevented them from interfering when elections were being held for men to represent the counties in the lower branch of the State Legislature. This was so certified, so proved, so voted upon by men as loyal, I repeat, as gentlemen on either side of this Chamber or anywhere else, and it was because I knew these facts to be true from the records of my own State that I made the remark I did some days ago and repeated it yesterday when it was denied again by the Senator from Maine. I might speak as to what I know personally, but if I knew of a hundred cases I would not speak of them on this floor, for I am not as a witness to be catechised, nor will I volunteer testimony. I rely upon the record of the Kentucky Legislature to sustain my assertions, and it sustains them fully, as all impartial men will agree.

I have shown already in this debate, by the message of the governor of Pennsylvania, that elections in his great State had been interfered with by United States soldiers in 1872. I showed by the message of the governor of New York to his Legislature that elections in his still greater State had been so interfered with. Other gentlemen proved the same things elsewhere. I showed the outrages committed in my State during the war, when Mr. Wickliffe and Governor Bramlette were opposing candidates, how the polls were closed in many counties against the democratic candidate and opened to his opponent; and, I repeat, the judge of my district, Judge Buckner, himself a member of the Legislature, himself one of the committee that acted upon the contested-election cases, one of the leading lawyers in my State and as intelligent as any Senator here, sent to me those records which I have just read in order to prove, as they have, every word I have said to be true, which was that the military had interfered before the law of 1865, and after the law, under pretense, if you please, of martial law—in violation of all the rights of citizens and freemen. On these facts I have always maintained that it was the duty of the democratic party, whenever it had the opportunity, whenever it had the power, to repeal all laws which under any pretense seek to give to military commanders any such authority anywhere or under any circumstances. So far I admit we have not succeeded.

The bill that we passed first was vetoed. I said when I spoke upon that bill that I did not expect it would be vetoed. I was disappointed. I had seen the present President of the United States, when a member of Congress from Ohio, in 1866, on a rider or amendment to the Army appropriation bill vote to deprive Andrew Johnson, then President of the United States, of all control over the Army of the United States, and require the commanders of corps and companies to report to the General of the Army, U. S. Grant. I had seen him as a member of Congress, when he and his party had deprived eleven States and nine million people of the power to call upon or ask aid or benefit from their militia, when they were left by Congress to the mercy of their former slaves and the marauders sent there by Congress. I had seen him twice on a call of the yeas and nays, on the resolution offered by James M. Ashley, of Ohio, vote to impeach President Johnson because of his improper and so-called corrupt use of the veto power. Could I expect for a moment that the bill to keep soldiers from the polls would be vetoed by a man with such a record as that, backed by a cabinet nearly every one of whom had denounced every act that we denounce in language more emphatic than we have—from his prime minister, Mr. Evarts, and the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Schurz, who has been often heard on this floor, to his Postmaster-General, himself unable to-day to sit on a jury in the State from which he came? Could I expect men with such records to advise and consent to the veto of such laws as we have sought to pass—laws merely repealing acts unjust, unconstitutional, and fraudulently inserted and retained upon the statute-books?

Of course I never suspected any such thing. It has been done, I admit it, done for what purpose I know not; or if I do, it may not be proper to state my belief; but I know this, that when I go before the people of Kentucky and the people of the West and tell them that we have made an honest and earnest struggle, knowing that we did not have two-thirds of both Houses, knowing that we could not pass any bill over a presidential veto, having the right to believe that we could not justly be deprived of the right to repeal laws in the same way that they were placed upon the statute-books, and when I tell them what is the fact, that we are honestly and earnestly seeking to keep the soldiery from the polls, that we are seeking to keep the deputy marshals who are brought from the prisons and the slums and the rat-pits, as the Senator from New York calls them, to interfere with free election by the people, and that we demand honest juries in the jury-box, and that the ignorant and fraudulent ones now placed there shall be taken from them, every man in my region of country will say we were right, and the people of America will say we were right, if they desire to perpetuate their ancient rights and liberties.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator from Kentucky let me ask him a question there?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire, perceiving entirely the spirit in which the Senator speaks why the effort is made to cover up by ambiguous words in this bill his intention? May I ask him what the purpose is of putting in the bill "as a police force," in order to deceive, (I do not speak of the intention but of the effect) those who read the bill and make them believe that the Senator and his associates were willing that the troops should be used to keep the peace at the polls, if they can say that they should not be used as a police force at the polls? What is the object of that? Why not say out flat-footed, as the Senator does now, what they mean?

Mr. BECK. I hold in my hand a speech, and I wish I knew how to express it, as the Senator from New York does so well, so as to keep within the rules. I have tried that experiment two or three times and always made a bungle of it, and I am afraid now to attempt it; but I hold a newspaper in my hand that is not as suspicious as the other, [laying his hand on the RECORD,] yet when compared with the other I think it will be found so much like it that it would be hard to tell them apart, in which the purposes of this bill were well stated by a man as distinguished elsewhere as the Senator from New York is in the Senate, and that is exhausting comparison, and who stands, I suspect, a good deal closer to the distinguished—officially distinguished—gentleman at the other end of the Avenue than the Senator from New York does.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not see how that can be.

Mr. BECK. I am not at liberty under the rules to say where the statement was made, but that distinguished gentleman said in a very distinguished place—and I think it answers the question put to me by the Senator from New York on this subject perhaps better than I can; it ought to have more weight with him than anything I can say:

> I do not know of a man in this House who is in favor of using the Army of the United States as an ordinary police force to run elections.

Mr. CONKLING. As what?

Mr. BECK. "As an ordinary police force to run elections."

Mr. CONKLING. But the "ordinary" has been left out of this bill.

Mr. BECK. He proceeds to say:

> That no one may misunderstand me, let me put the case thus: Suppose some one should offer the following as a substitute for this section:
> "Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to use the Army, or any portion of it, as a police force to keep the peace at the polls at any election held within any State."
> Is there a man in this House that would vote to make that a part of our law? If there is one, let him speak.

A gentleman by the name of FINLEY said:

> Did not the gentleman vote for a proposition substantially that?
> Mr. GARFIELD. Never in my life, nor anything like it.
> Mr. FINLEY. The vote of the gentleman last session was precisely that in effect.
> Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is utterly mistaken. Now, if no one would vote to enact into law the thing which this section says is not appropriated for, how can any one hold that the section prohibits anything that ought to be done? The proposition to use our Army as a police——

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. EATON in the chair.) The Senator from Kentucky will suspend.

Mr. BECK. Let me finish the sentence.

Mr. CARPENTER. The point of order is against the sentence.

Mr. BECK. I want to read it.

Mr. CARPENTER. I have no objection in this particular instance. The rule of this body, however, prohibits Senators from alluding to what took place in the other House of Congress. If it is done on one side of the Chamber it will be done on the other, and the rule will be practically trampled under foot. I make the point of order.

Mr. BECK. I have read from a paper published in the city of Washington.

Mr. CARPENTER. What does the Chair rule on the point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin has made the point of order that the rules do not permit a member of the Senate to read and use the language of a member of the House. The Chair understands that to be the point of order which is raised by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CONKLING. Not to report what is said upon the floor of the House during the present session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the present occupant of the chair the point of order is well taken. The Chair thinks that the Senator from Kentucky ought not to allude by name to language used by a member of the other branch during the present Congress. Without looking at the rule, that is the opinion of the Chair at first view.

Mr. BECK. I will simply ask a question. Suppose that the gentleman had made the speech from which I am reading in front of Willard's Hotel or in Lincoln Hall, would that be a violation of the rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When a point of order is made against an expression used in front of Willard's Hotel or at Lincoln Hall the Chair will rule on that point of order.

Mr. BECK. I desire to know of the Chair if I have said in the most remote possible way that this language was used in the House of Representatives?

Mr. CARPENTER. I rise to a point of order. I understand that after the Chair has ruled upon a point of order the only way that it can be debated is by an appeal. I do not understand the Senator to appeal, but he is proceeding to debate the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not know from what the Senator from Kentucky was reading, but the Senator from Kentucky had announced the names of two members of the House as having uttered in debate certain language, and therefore it was that the Chair ruled that the allusion was not in order.

Mr. BECK. Not having said that it was what occurred in the House and not being called upon to deny that it did occur in the House, I should like to have the proof that it did take place in the House, because without that being shown I suppose I am not out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly not.

Mr. BECK. Then I can compare the paper I hold in my hand with the language that will be read as having been delivered in the House.

Mr. CARPENTER. The RECORD is published by authority of Congress, and is laid on our tables every day, containing the debates of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BECK. I will send to the Chair the newspaper from which I read.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not care what the Senator read from; the Senator gave the substance of proceedings in the House, as shown in the RECORD of the proper date. That is out of order under the rules. I do not care anything about it in this particular instance except that if this course of proceeding is indulged in on one side of the Chamber, it will be on the other; and the rule is a proper one and ought to be enforced.

Mr. BECK. I will submit to the ruling of the Chair rather than take the time of the Senate, and will endeavor to see if I cannot ascertain hereafter exactly how to use language without being out of order. I am only sorry it prevents me, therefore, from answering as fully as I could have done the question of the Senator from New York; but if he will turn to the Post of Tuesday morning, June 17, 1879, he will find that a far abler man than I am, and one who knows far more about all those things than I do, and I will not call his name this time, said somewhere:

> The proposition to use our Army as a police, to send them out and station them one by one at the polls to run the elections as a police, is a fiction so absurd that I trust no man on this side of the House will give the least color to the assumption that he favors it by holding that this sixth section repeals, suspends, or modifies any existing statute.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BECK. I am done now.

Mr. CARPENTER. I will, with the permission of the Chair, state the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin will state the point of order.

Mr. CARPENTER. I made my first point of order merely out of respect to the rule. I make this point of order merely out of respect to the ruling of the Chair, that when the Chair and the Senate have ruled that the Senator is out of order in quoting in the Senate what was said in the other House of Congress by any member, he cannot evade it nor escape from the ruling by dropping the name and saying that it was somewhere, and then read from the very speech itself, which shows it to be language used in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BECK. Now, I will ask the Senator from Wisconsin how he knows that I have read from the same speech?

Mr. CARPENTER. I have read the speech in the RECORD. That is the way I know you read it correctly. I am speaking to you, not to the Chair, for I would not refer to what took place in the other House myself. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that he has no doubt the Senator from Kentucky will now proceed in order.

Mr. BECK. I will endeavor to proceed in order.

Mr. CONKLING. Why will not the Senator answer my question?

Mr. BECK. I have answered it as well as I know how.

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will pardon me, I see that he has been sincere in trying, but I was not asking what such a man as he has been describing thought; I do not know of any such man on earth; but if I did I was not asking about him. I was asking the Senator from Kentucky, the Senator now on the floor, in the midst of his speech, why he does not legislate in the spirit of his argument, why he does not legislate to say that troops shall not be used to keep the peace at the polls on election day; and why he does cover up that idea, hide it away under a confused juggle of words, good for nothing except to deceive somebody? That is my question. It is no answer to that to read what somebody else, who he says was a great man, said somewhere else.

Mr. BECK. The section speaks for itself, and it reads thus:

That no money appropriated in this act is appropriated or shall be paid for the subsistence, equipment, transportation, or compensation of any portion of the Army of the United States to be used as a police force to keep the peace at the polls at any election held within any State.

The language is unambiguous. We decline to make any appropriations for that purpose. That is all we do; and we assume that the various departments of the Government will have sufficient respect for the power and the authority and right of Congress to support and maintain armies, or to furnish appropriations for any other purpose, to obey the laws we pass, so that in view of the existing law that money shall be expended, and expended only for the purposes for which it is given; that it shall not be used for any other purpose; that when we say it shall not be used for this purpose we hope, trust, believe, and will endeavor to see to it that our will is obeyed. Whether we might not have gone further is another question. We have not. The section I have read shows all we have done. Whether we have done it properly, rightfully, or wrongfully, is to be determined hereafter.

But, Mr. President, while turning my attention to that paragraph a little while ago, and while waiting on the Senator from Wisconsin, another thing occurred to me, as I have said so much about supervisors and deputy marshals, and as so much has been said in their defense by the President and others, I propose to read from what I know to be a highly intelligent and respectable paper, published in my own State, one of the ablest newspapers, if not the ablest, in the South or the West, the Louisville Courier-Journal, of Monday morning, June 9, 1879, in regard to the character of the men who are and have been appointed to control State elections under the great desire of the powers at Washington to maintain the national peace at the polls and to maintain the purity of national elections, and all that sort of things that I do not believe in. I believe it is solely within the power of the States, and the authority of the States, to keep the peace at the elections of the State that it is their peace and their elections, not those of the United States. That is the objection I have, I may state by the way, to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine, because he is seeking by Federal authority to punish men who violate State laws and thus usurp State authority. I desire to say in this connection, before I read the paper to which I alluded, that whenever anything is required to be done by the Federal authority, whether it is to make war, or maintain foreign relations, or to regulate commerce between the States, or to do any great national act that no one State can perform, no man will go further than I to maintain the Federal authority; but when it comes to matters pertaining to elections in the States, to keeping peace at the polls in the States, to doing police duty for the States, without the request or consent of their authorities, then I maintain that all interference is a usurpation of and infringement upon the duty and the authority of the States. Much as I respect the Federal Army, if I thought it was to be prostituted for this purpose, I would vote millions to arm the militia of the States, I would vote millions to arm the men on the frontier to protect themselves against the Indians, I would reduce the Army of the United States down to the lowest possible point and remit its officers to civil life, hard as that might be, as I regard the liberties of this country and its people as being higher and above the maintenance of the highly respectable and, if let alone, patriotic Army we now have. This is an effort to see that those gallant men who do not desire to do that duty shall not be prostituted or used for such base purposes—purposes for which they were never intended. But as to the supervisors in 1872, it seems the New York papers published the history of the fellows we seek to get rid of, the set who were complained of by the governor of New York and the governor of Pennsylvania. Let me read again what the governor of New York said then:

A large number of United States deputy marshals and supervisors were appointed, many of whom were men of well-known disreputable character, and some of whom had been convicted criminals; a class of dangerous men never before chosen by any ruling authority, in any community, as conservators of the peace. They were instructed, under advice of the Attorney-General of the United States, to submit to no interference from any quarter under State or municipal authority. Orders were issued which authorized them, in the discretion of each one of them, to arrest at the polls citizens claiming the right to vote, as well as the inspectors who were charged by law with the custody of the ballot-boxes. These arrests were to be effected without process of law issued upon formal complaints.

To show that the governor of New York did not exaggerate, let me read. This is the character of the men, as the Courier-Journal furnishes the list, who were intrusted with this great duty:

Theodore, alias Mike, Anthony, alias Snuffy, of 24 Cherry street; a laborer, thirty-five years of age, married, and cannot read or write; Anthony was arrested by Detective James Finn, of the fourth precinct, on July 24, 1870, for larceny from the person, and was held in $2,000 bail for trial by Justice Hogan. He was indicted by the grand jury on the charge on the 22d of August last.

Henry Rail supervisor Eighth ward; one of the principals in the Chatham-street saloon murder; went off West to escape punishment, and has only been back a few weeks.

James Moran, supervisor third district, Eighth ward; arrested on Sunday last for felonious assault.

William, alias Pomp, Harton, colored, marshal Twenty-second; arrested a few days since for vagrancy.

James Miller is the keeper of a den of prostitution in the basement of 337 Water street.

James Sullivan, alias Slocum; keeps a house of prostitution at 330 Water street, which is a resort for desperate thieves.

Frank Winkle keeps a house of prostitution at 337½ Water street. The police are frequently called in to quell fights in Winkle's place, and it bears a hard reputation.

Richard O'Connor, supervisor seventh district, First ward; has been for years receiver of smuggled cigars from Havana steamers.

L. H. Cargill, supervisor ninth district, Ninth ward; tried in United States court for robbing the mail.

John Van Buren, supervisor twelfth district, Eighth ward; was at one time in sheriff's office and discharged for carrying a load of seized goods from the establishment of Richard Walters in East Broadway.

Mart Allen, marshal Eighth ward; served a term of five years in State prison; sentenced to Sing Sing for five years by Judge Bedford. His case was appealed, and while waiting for a decision he managed to get out on bail. His case has been decided against him, and he has fled to parts unknown to ply his vocation and help the radicals elsewhere.

John McChesney, supervisor fourth district, Ninth ward; associates with thieves; bears a bad character generally.

William Cassidy, supervisor twelfth district, Ninth ward; is a street bummer without any visible means of support.

Thomas McIntire, marshal Eighth ward; has been frequently arrested for beating his aged mother; sent several times to Blackwell's Island.

Timothy Lynch, marshal sixth district, First ward; a Washington market lounger.

Peter Mose, marshal Sixth ward; habitual drunkard.

John Conner, supervisor first district, First ward; keeps a disorderly gin-mill, resort of lowest characters.

Francis Jordan, supervisor sixth district, First ward; lives in New Jersey; was turned out of the post-office by Postmaster Jones for bad conduct.

Bernard Dugan, supervisor eighth district, First ward; habitual drunkard. His wife left him on account of his drunkenness, and procured a divorce on that ground.

John Tobin, supervisor ninth district, First ward; arrested about six months ago for grand larceny.

Patrick Murphy, supervisor fourth district, Sixth ward; two years ago distributed fraudulent naturalization papers, and would furnish them to anybody who would promise to vote for Grant.

Edward Slevin, jr., supervisor second district, Fourth ward; has an indictment now pending against him in court of general sessions, for cutting a boy named Kilkenny.

Michael Foley, supervisor fourth district, Fourth ward; well-known repeater, voting for anybody that will pay.

James F. Day, supervisor seventh district, Fourth ward; shot a man in a fight between the Walsh association and a gang from Water street.

John Conners, alias "Jockey," supervisor third district, Fourth ward; a well-known desperate character.

Michael Costello, marshal, Sixth ward; bounty-jumper during the war.

Harry Rice, supervisor thirteenth district, Sixth ward; was connected with the Chatham street concert-saloon murder, and fled to Nebraska to escape punishment.

Thomas Lane, supervisor seventeenth district, Sixth ward; formerly keeper of a notorious den at Five Points, headquarters of thieves and robbers.

John Lane, supervisor twenty-second district, same ward; was indicted for receiving stolen goods; has served a term in Sing Sing.

Edward Foley, supervisor sixth district, Ninth ward; arrested last year for stealing a watch.

Humphrey Ayers, supervisor eighteenth district, Ninth ward; arrested six years ago for robbing the United States mail.

John Dowling, supervisor nineteenth district, Ninth ward; arrested August 20, 1869, for till-tapping.

James Fitzsimmons, supervisor twentieth district, Ninth ward; arrested August 1, 1868, for robbery.

John Martin, supervisor fifth district, Twelfth ward; arrested a few years ago under an indictment for arson.

Samuel Bich, supervisor fourth district, Thirteenth ward; served a term of two years at Sing Sing for a felonious assault.

John alias "Bucky" McCabe, supervisor eighth district, Fifteenth Ward; charged with shooting a man with intent to kill, about a year ago.

William P. Burke, supervisor twentieth district, Eighth Ward; served his term in the State prison of Massachusetts, also two years in the New York State prison.

James McCabe, supervisor fourth district, Eighth Ward; now confined in the Tombs under indictment for highway robbery.

William Irving, supervisor fourteenth district, Eighth Ward; has served a term in Sing Sing for burglary committed in Eighth Ward, and never has been pardoned.

Patrick Henry Kily, alias Fred. Williams, supervisor twenty-second district, Eighth Ward; keeper of a house of ill-fame, resort of the lowest and vilest characters.

Patrick Hefferman, supervisor of the tenth district, Sixth Ward; arrested some time since for attempted murder.

Frederick Sterringer, supervisor Eighth Ward; has been arrested several times for keeping disorderly house.

J. F. Baderhop, supervisor Tenth Ward; arrested for murder a few years since.

Ed. Weaver, marshal in Eighth Ward; has been but a short time out of State prison, where he has been serving out his sentence.

Walter Prince, (colored,) marshal Eighth Ward; now in prison awaiting his trial for highway robbery.

Andrew Andrews, alias Hans Nicols, marshal; panel-thief, been sentenced two or three times to State prison, and has just returned from Blackwell's Island.

What a lot to keep the peace, preserve the purity of elections, and maintain the honor and dignity of the United States!

These are specimens of the so-called gentlemen who are to keep the national peace, and to preserve the purity of the polls! The States, even loyal New York, cannot be trusted. These creatures are guardians of the honor, dignity, character, and justice of the model Republic as published at the time, and heralded to the world.

I said when I rose I did not intend to say much, but one thing suggests another. I had some other things I intended to say, but the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] to whom I intended to address some remarks, does not seem to be in his seat, and I do not like to say anything behind his back, such is my respect for his character and position. I regret that the Senator from Vermont, the former chairman of the Committee on Finance, is not in the Chamber now. In his speech made the other day, published in the RECORD of Friday, June 13, he makes a general attack upon the whole democratic party, first going over by name the Southern members of the House and then of the Senate, calling us by name and telling the world all we have done and what terrible fellows we are, how we are seeking to break up the Government of the United States. Among other things he takes occasion (other gentlemen can speak for themselves) to call my name to show what horrible things I have done; and no doubt up in Vermont or somewhere else they will think when they read his speech, that I am a monster of iniquity, who devotes all his energies to break up the best government the world ever saw. What does the Senator say I have done?

Senate bill No. 31, (Senator BECK,) for the removal of all disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution.
This of course includes Jefferson Davis.

That is one of the horrid offenses the Senator says I have committed. I showed the other day that the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] six years ago, then the chairman of the Committee on Rules of the House, reported a bill for the removal of all political disabilities. [Mr. MORRILL entered the Chamber.] I am glad the Senator from Vermont has come in. I was just starting to read the enormities I was charged with in the speech of the Senator from Vermont. There are a great many of them, and among other terrible things I was charged with having introduced a bill to remove all disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. This of course, he said, includes Jefferson Davis. Now I want the Senator from Vermont to know, and I want the people of Vermont to know, and the republicans generally to know, that the bill I introduced is precisely the bill that was passed by a vote of 141 to twenty-odd on the 8th of December, 1873, reported unanimously from the committee of which the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] then Speaker of the House, was chairman, including Jeff. Davis and all. Attention was then called to that fact by General Butler, of Massachusetts, Judge Hoar, of Massachusetts, and others. Instead of holding me up now in 1879 as having done a monstrous thing, why did not the Senator tell the country that his own party had in the House done what I now propose as early as December, 1873, by a vote of 141 to twenty-odd in the House of Representatives? Why did he not read a bill that passed the Senate on the 13th day of May, 1872, providing that all political disabilities imposed by the third section of the fourteenth article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States shall be removed from all persons whatsoever except Senators and Representatives of the Thirty-sixth and Thirty-seventh Congresses, officers of the judicial, military, and naval services of the United States, heads of Departments and foreign ministers of the United States, which bill was then passed by a vote of 39 to 2, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] himself voting for it on a call of the yeas and nays. That bill relieved everybody—Mr. STEPHENS is in the House now under it—but those few who happened to be in those two Congresses and a few others. Now, I want the people of Vermont and the republicans generally to know that as early as 1872 the republican Senate and the republican Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] voted for the bill which I have just read. Again, I am arraigned by the same Senator for introducing another bill. He said:

S. 71, (Senator BECK,) to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which provides that "no person who has served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army of the United States."
This is intended to open the way for a restoration or appointment of officers lately in the service of the so-called Confederate States.

I had stated on this floor that I knew of cases making the repeal of this law proper, and I will refer to them again, showing that there is neither decency nor propriety in keeping a law of that sort upon the statute-book. The son of Jefferson Davis to-day, if he has one, then a boy, if you please, fourteen years old, or the sons of Robert Toombs, or the sons of any of those distinguished gentlemen now here who were in the army, if from twelve to eighteen years of age, and not old enough to take part in the service, can be appointed as officers in the Army and Navy of the United States and hold the highest places. It is only the poor boys of the South who had to work for a living—because none of the men who were old enough nineteen years ago to be officers in the Army are seeking promotion in the Army or Navy now—it is only the young men of the South who, like the young men of the North and West, are anxious to be in positions everywhere. The section as it now stands only excludes the sons of poor men who had to get places for their boys as pages on the floors of the Legislatures and to do other menial service in the employment of the Confederate States or in the employment of any of the States constituting the confederacy, they cannot enter the Army or Navy because they were so employed, while the sons of Mr. Davis or of Mr. Toombs or of any of the Senators here who were generals in the confederate army and could educate and support their sons can obtain places in the Army and Navy, and they do so obtain them. Am I to be told that I am a revolutionist because I want that section repealed? I am in favor of equal rights to all men. I am in favor of wiping out all distinctions between men North, South, East, and West, rich and poor. I am opposed to any law remaining upon the statute-book that is a disgrace to the country or discriminates against its humblest citizens.

I am charged again in the speech of the Senator from Vermont with introducing a bill to pay J. Milton Best $25,000 for his house destroyed by the commanding officer of the United States forces at Paducah, Kentucky, in 1864. The comment is that this claim was once vetoed by General Grant. That was a claim brought here years ago by Senator Davis, of Kentucky, advocated by him with great ability, and which passed both Houses; it is as honest a claim as Congress ever did pass. A republican House passed it, and a republican Senate passed it on the 8th day of April, 1872, on a call of the yeas and nays—27 yeas, 12 nays—Messrs. LOGAN, of Illinois, and WINDOM, of Minnesota, being recorded among the yeas. I ask the Senator from Vermont did he vote against that bill? I am charged with gross impropriety for again bringing it up, and yet the Senator from Vermont did not vote against it, although he was in his place in the Senate, and Senators as conscientious as he, and among them two now sitting before me, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] and the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] voted for it. The bill, I repeat, passed both Houses of Congress, and I am now to be arraigned because I have reintroduced it on behalf of one of my own constituents.

My friend from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] who sits by my side is arraigned, and so am I, among other things for seeking to authorize the payment of customs dues in legal-tender notes. There has not been a session of Congress since I have been in Congress that I have not tried to have that done; we have tried to do it according to law. The Secretary of the Treasury, whom the Senator from Vermont is lauding so highly, is receiving these notes now for customs dues in violation of law, and he and his republican friends are resisting us when we try to pass a law to make the Secretary obey the law. He is lauded to the skies, and we are charged with embarrassing resumption because we are seeking to dispense with a sinking fund and other things that the Secretary is paying no attention to; in short, because we ask to have the law enforced.

Let me say here, whether I am right or wrong, I honestly believe that if the Secretary of the Treasury had consented to the receipt of the legal-tender notes of the country for customs dues five years ago paper money and gold would have been at par without going through all the distress and bankruptcy that the country has had to go through in the last five years to bring about what is now called resumption, which is assumed to be such a glorious result. If that Secretary had used the silver dollar that we gave him honestly to pay the debts of the country to bankers and bondholders, as the law requires, we would not have had any such trouble over the silver bill as we are now having; and if that Secretary had allowed the people to take the loans as they were offered, he would not have had to pay, as he has done in the last three years, $6,000,000 temporarily to increase the bonded debt of the United States $300,000,000, paying, as he has, half per cent. commission and ninety days' double-interest to syndicates and others who are the pets of the Secretary. The very moment he threw open the doors to the lowest loan of 4 per cent. certificates he had to employ policemen to drive the people away, so anxious were they to get it.

Yet, because I have seen fit to differ with the Senator from Vermont about these things, I am called out by name in the Senate as a dangerous revolutionist, and the bills I introduce are paraded by him here as though I had been guilty of a great criminal wrong. I do not intend to allow that speech to go on the record unchallenged. There are some gentlemen who are so in the habit of saying bad things that I let them go, but the Senator from Vermont is generally so careful and his statements produce such an impression, especially upon the financial world, that I desired the country to know and the Senate to know that the things I have done mean nothing except to carry out my honest convictions of what is best for the country.

But, Mr. President, I have spoken very much longer than I intended. My purpose when I arose yesterday evening was simply to satisfy the Senator from Maine if I could in contradiction of his statement that many citizens have been prevented by soldiers from voting, in clear violation of law, and believing I have done that, though I doubt whether he will admit it, I beg pardon for saying as much as I have.

PAY OF CONGRESSIONAL EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

Mr. WALLACE. Will the Senator from Maine give way to allow me to have the action of the Senate upon a report of a committee of conference made a while ago?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask that the present bill be postponed temporarily that the report of the committee of conference on House joint resolution No. 85 may be taken up and considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the bill will be postponed temporarily and the report will be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the House resolution No. 85, entitled "Joint resolution fixing the date on which the pay of the committee clerks, pages, and laborers of the House of Representatives who are paid during the session only shall begin for this session," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 5, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1 and 2.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 3, and agree to the same, with the following amendment, namely:

In lieu of said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That the officers, clerks to committees, and employés of the Senate, including the Capitol police, who were employed previous to the 4th day of March, 1879, and who continued in said employment to and including the 4th day of April, who have since ceased to be so employed, or who may cease to be so employed prior to December 1, 1879, shall be paid a sum equal to one month's pay at the rate per annum they were paid when their employment ceased; and a sufficient sum for this purpose is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 4, and agree to the same, with the following amendment, namely:

After the word "under" in line 8 of said amendment insert the words "section two of."

And the Senate agree to the same.

WM. A. WALLACE,
H. G. DAVIS,
J. G. BLAINE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
DANIEL M. HENRY,
E. L. MARTIN,
A. HERR SMITH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the second and third amendments and non-concurred in the first amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 2252) making appropriations for certain judicial expenses.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2251) making appropriations for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2330) to correct an error in "an act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1879; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 104) defining the meaning of section 2 of the act of Congress entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of arrears of pensions granted by act of Congress."

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) to repeal certain clauses in the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1879, and for other purposes;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 34) to print five thousand copies of the final reports of the United States centennial commission upon the international exhibition and centennial celebration of 1876; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 87) relating to a bridge across the Detroit River at or near Detroit, Michigan.

APPROPRIATION FOR JUDICIAL EXPENSES.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 2252) making appropriations for certain judicial expenses disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and

On motion of Mr. WALLACE, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives and ask a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. WALLACE, Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia, and Mr. BOOTH.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2175) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I am sorry to say the honorable Senator from Kentucky has not satisfied me that I made a wrong statement yesterday. I then stated my belief that no Senator on that side could bring forward the name of any voter who ever had been deprived of his vote by the action of United States soldiers. The Senator from Kentucky took up the gauntlet and proceeded with some documentary proof, which he seemed to think entirely annihilated my position. But the Senator did exactly what every democratic Senator, with the single exception of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS,] has done in this debate—he located the interference of the military away back in the period of the civil war. If you ask the Senators on the opposite side of the Chamber when did soldiers interfere in elections, they reply in 1864. The Senator from Kentucky comes down one year later. He says he can prove that voters were interfered with in Kentucky in 1865.

In 1865, Mr. President, the State of Kentucky was under martial law, and the Senator from Kentucky will observe that it was not martial law proclaimed by General John M. Palmer; it was martial law proclaimed by Abraham Lincoln; and the State continued under martial law after that election to which the Senator refers had been over and gone for two months—I beg the Senator's attention to that fact—until the election to which he refers had been held and until two months' time had passed; and then in the October following Andrew Johnson issued a proclamation revoking the former proclamation of Mr. Lincoln and declaring Kentucky to be no longer under the domination of military law.

Mr. BECK. What day did Mr. Lincoln die, does the Senator remember?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Lincoln died on the 14th of April, 1865, and Andrew Johnson's proclamation revoking the martial law which Mr. Lincoln had proclaimed (I think I have the date of it right here) was October 23, 1865, I believe. The election to which the Senator from Kentucky refers in 1865, is one which if I were in his place I would not bring up. Of course the honorable Senator is a very independent man and he does not ask my advice, and he would not follow it if I gave it to him; but if I were a Kentuckian illustrating what I thought an election ought to be I would not bring up the election of 1865 and the events consequent thereon. What was the condition of Kentucky at that time? Her quota in the confederate army, I believe it was the Senator's precedessor, Mr. Powell, who boasted that Kentucky's quotas in both armies were full—her quota in the confederate army had just returned from the war. They got back, how many thousands of them I do not know, but a great many thousand confederate soldiers had returned, and it was not military authority that proceeded to arraign them—and I want the attention of the Senator from Kentucky—it was not military authority that proceeded to arraign those men and declare that they should not vote, but it was Governor Bramlette, a civil magistrate, a man who, I believe, stood high in the confidence of the democratic party of Kentucky. Governor Bramlette on the 19th of July, 1865, issued a proclamation, and I will read that proclamation; it is brief, and I will read it because it covers the case:

The purity of the elective franchise can only be preserved by a faithful enforcement of the laws governing the same. For their enforcement the officer will be held responsible. Every free white male citizen, twenty-one years of age, who has resided in Kentucky two years, and whose residence has been in the district where he offers to vote for sixty days preceding the election, and each male white citizen who, not having two years' residence in the State, but has resided one year in the county and sixty days in the precinct where he offers to vote, next preceding the election, is entitled to vote; provided he has not expatriated himself and lost the elective franchise by coming within the provisions of the following act:

And that act says:

SECTION 1. Be it enacted, &c., That any citizen of this State who shall enter into the service of the so-called Confederate States in either a civil or military capacity, or into the service of the so-called provisional government of Kentucky, in either a civil or military capacity, or having heretofore entered such service of either the Confederate States or provisional government, shall continue in such service after this act takes effect, or shall take up or continue in arms against the military forces of the United States or the State of Kentucky, or shall give voluntary aid and assistance to those in arms against said forces, shall be deemed to have expatriated himself, and shall no longer be a citizen of Kentucky; nor shall he again be a citizen, except by permission of the Legislature, by a general or special statute.

And that excluded the entire list of Kentucky confederates. I do not know how many—forty thousand I have been told—forty thousand Kentucky democrats who went into the war, and when the war was over returned and demanded the right in the face of that law to vote, and Governor Bramlette issued his proclamation declaring that they had no right to vote, and should not be allowed to vote.

The election was held, and it was carried by the democrats; and not satisfied with having elected their men they proceeded to turn out of the Legislature men who were elected on the Union side; there was no republican ticket so called. They proceeded to turn out men who were elected on the Union side. I do not care what the Senator from Kentucky says about the character of those men who ruled the Legislature; I am not assailing the personal character of any gentleman. We all know where partisan votes will carry us on contested elections. The Kentucky Legislature proceeded to expel men and give the seats to the others because these men had been excluded from voting, and excluded under the laws of the State.

That is the history of that election, and the Senator from Kentucky was strangely oblivious of the facts of his own State when he said that in the election of 1865 men were refused the right to vote who were allowed to vote for McClellan at the presidential election the autumn before. The figures are entirely against the Senator. In the election of 1864, when McClellan was candidate for President, he only polled 27,786 votes against 64,301 votes for Mr. Lincoln; but in the election to which the honorable Senator refers, the democratic candidate got 57,562 votes, more than twice as many as before, and the republicans or Unionists got 54,002.

Therefore the Senator's allegation that in 1865, under bayonet law, citizens of Kentucky were refused the right to vote who had been accorded that right in 1864, is not sustained by the election returns of his own State. It is not for me to defend or vindicate John M. Palmer, but the proclamation of John M. Palmer which the honorable Senator from Kentucky has visited with such strong objurgation was nothing in the world but to carry into effect the proclamation of Governor Bramlette which I have read. It was simply bringing, in a time of martial law, the aid of the Army of the United States to uphold the civil proclamation of the governor of Kentucky. The concluding part of Palmer's proclamation was in these words:

It will be given to the civil authorities to enforce the laws and to preserve the peace. Any person who shall counsel, advise, or encourage any judge of any election, or any other person, to disregard or disobey—

What? "My orders?" The orders of the Army? The orders of any military authority? No, sir—to disregard or disobey the law as declared in the proclamation of the governor of the State will be at once arrested.

The Senator from Kentucky has really been arraigning Governor

Bramlette and his policy and not the proclamation of John M. Palmer, for all that John M. Palmer did in that matter was to issue a proclamation to sustain what Governor Bramlette had issued in his capacity as a civil magistrate; and that was simply that the confederates who had gone from Kentucky and been four years fighting against the Government of the United States should not go home and carry Kentucky over into the hands of the ex-confederates on the eve of the reconstruction following the war.

Governor Bramlette deserves honor for standing by the Union of the States, and John M. Palmer as a military commander in a district that was under martial law by proclamation of Abraham Lincoln would have been guilty of a gross dereliction of official duty if he had not done precisely what he did do. So the Senator from Kentucky has not satisfied me that people in his State were deprived of their privilege of voting except those that ought to have been deprived of it; and I do not believe that he can show that a citizen of Kentucky entitled to vote under Governor Bramlette's proclamation was deprived of his vote.

I turn now to another point, and I regret that I do not see the honorable Senator from Virginia who has charge of this bill in his seat.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will try to answer for that Senator.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from West Virginia is willing to answer for him, and therefore we will take him as representing for the present East Virginia.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will say to the Senator from Maine that the Senator from Virginia has just stepped out of the Chamber and will be back again in a moment; and perhaps it will suit the Senator just as well to wait until the Senator who has charge of the bill comes in.

Mr. BLAINE. I would rather speak when he is here. I observe the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] is present. Yesterday we had a very doleful account of the rough-shod manner in which the patriotic democrats in Indiana were trodden under the military hoof of despotic authority in 1864. You would have believed from the statements made here by the two Senators, and especially by the Senator whom I regret not to see in his seat, [Mr. MCDONALD,] that there was the merest shadow and mockery of an election in 1864 when the senior Senator from Indiana was the democratic candidate for governor. You would have believed from their statements and from certain affidavits sent here by one General Love that it required a good deal more nerve and pluck to vote the democratic ticket in Indiana in that year than it did to face confederates on the field of battle. Among other things, you know, there was a Massachusetts regiment let loose without arms.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Hundred-day men.

Mr. BLAINE. Hundred-day men, convalescents from the hospital, and according to this letter of General Love they so drove the democrats of Indianapolis that at one time in the election they had utterly given up and nobody pretended to make a stand and to vote. General Love asserts that any attempt to resist this wild, bloodthirsty regiment from Massachusetts would have been as reckless as it was for the bull to stand before the locomotive.

This narrative was so extraordinary and the statement of facts was so startling that I thought I would test it by the figures, and I merely went and looked at the election returns, and what is my surprise, my unfeigned astonishment, to find that in that very year the democrats of Indiana cast a heavier vote for JOSEPH E. MCDONALD, their candidate for governor, than they had ever cast since the organization of their party.

Mr. DAWES. And still the Senator will not be satisfied.

Mr. BLAINE. And still he will not be satisfied. I thought probably this vote might have been made up in the country districts, and that in the county where Indianapolis is situated this robbery of men's rights and this riotous conduct on the part of the troops had driven the democrats away from the polls; yet when I come down to Marion County—I believe Marion County is the one in which Indianapolis is situated—I find that in that county Mr. MCDONALD had 3,321 votes, when Stephen A Douglas, in a time of profound peace, four years before, when nobody was away in the war, and when Mr. Douglas certainly had as large and enthusiastic a following as any democrat ever had in this country and was the especial idol of the democratic party in Indiana—Mr. Douglas, I say, in this same county of Marion, had but 3,251 votes. So that in that very county in which all this outrage was committed the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MCDONALD,] then running for governor, received a larger democratic vote right in Indianapolis than was given for Stephen A. Douglas. The intimidation practiced by this Massachusetts regiment must have been desperate in the extreme.

The Senator was impatient at the slightest idea that somebody was reflecting on the loyalty of Indiana and on the bravery and the character of Indiana's troops. I certainly intended nothing of the sort. I do not believe any State sent to the war a better class of troops than Indiana sent. They do not need my poor approval at this late day; their heroic deeds on the battle-field speak for them; and it was news to me that any person in the world was reflecting upon them until I got hold of a school-book from the South, one of those which we had the assurance from several Senators on that side did not exist at all. I hold in my hand a school-book in the form of a reader that is calculated and adapted entirely to southern latitudes; and to what it says, not of the late war, but of the war with Mexico, I beg the attention of the honorable Senator from Indiana. I read this. It is the only arraignment of the gallantry of Indiana troops that I have ever read. This reader is published in Baltimore, and the authors are Mr. J. S. Blackburn, principal of a high-school in Virginia, and Mr. W. N. McDonald, principal of a high-school in Louisville, Kentucky. In giving the account of the Mexican war, this school-book, which is intended to be put in the hands of the rising generation in the South to cultivate a spirit of amity and respect for all the States, says, in describing the battle of Buena Vista:

> The Mexicans, knowing that they had nearly five men to our one, fought more bravely than they had ever done before. At one time they broke General Taylor's left flank, completely routing the Second Indiana Regiment, which never rallied during the progress of the battle. Colonel Jefferson Davis commanded a Mississippi regiment just in rear of the Indiana regiment. When the latter broke and fled, Davis ordered his men to open their ranks and let the runaways through, and then closed their line to meet the enemy.

That is the stuff, the miserable, slanderous stuff, that is taught to southern children. Davis's bold and untamable regiment from Mississippi opened their ranks to let the runaways from Indiana get off the field, and then they closed their ranks and behaved of course with the prowess that belongs to them. Just think of it!

I have here a modern school-book which I got from the Library with the imprint of 1879. The honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] was good enough to assure me that any books of that character belonged to a past day and had faded out. I am very sure that he would be the last Senator to make a misstatement.

Mr. VANCE. If the Senator will permit me, I assured him I did not know of the existence of any such literature.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I do. My information in regard to southern matters on that particular point is wider than that of the honorable Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. VANCE. Does the Senator from Maine say that he knows the book which he holds in his hand is used in the schools of North Carolina?

Mr. BLAINE. No, I do not know that this particular book has yet been introduced; but I know that at the very time the Senator from North Carolina was giving me the assurance that he did not know about it there was a very lively controversy going on in the town of Greenville in his own State between different members of the board of supervisors of schools as to whether this class of books should be kept in; and that was to me a very encouraging symptom, for it began to be the dawn of a better day in that respect. But here is a book published by A. S. Barnes & Co., of New York, Chicago, and New Orleans, as the imprint shows. They are a very large firm; they are a very respectable firm. It is a book called "The Southern Student's Handbook of Selections for Reading and Oratory," edited by John G. James, superintendent of the United States military academy at Austin, and is just now fresh from the press. Whether it is published as a mere amusing thing or whether it is intended for southern circulation the Senator himself will better inform me than I could inform myself.

Mr. VANCE. I have never seen the book before.

Mr. BLAINE. It is just from the press.

Mr. VANCE. I will take a glance at it as soon as I can. I see it comes from Chicago. I believe that is not a southern city.

Mr. BLAINE. It is published simultaneously in New York, Chicago, and New Orleans, that is the imprint, 1879. I suppose New Orleans ranks as a southern city still.

Mr. VANCE. Yes, but it is printed in the North for the purpose of meeting the prejudice of some people in the South, to make money out of it, just as the British manufacturers used to manufacture idols to send out to the Hindoos for sale in the same ship with the missionaries.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator will permit any such suggestion, I will state that generally the place where a book is printed does not tell of its character. I am quite free to maintain that this is one of the most remarkable books that I ever came across within the limited sphere of my own reading. It quite goes beyond this other book about the heroic conduct of Jefferson Davis and the bad conduct of the Indiana regiment at the battle of Buena Vista. It is a book for southern students, as though southern students needed and ought to have some other sort of English classic reading than belongs to those generally that speak the English tongue. The authors of the book evidently have a sovereign contempt for Addison, and Steele, and Johnson, and Thackeray, and Dickens, and Macaulay, and Carlyle, and all those illustrious writers who have been thought well of on the other side of the Atlantic, and a still greater contempt for Prescott, and Motley, and Longfellow, and Whittier, and Holmes, and Hawthorne, and Emerson, and Washington Irving; men whom we in our blindness in the North have supposed to have done something worthy of literary fame not only in their own generation but in the years to come. They have made this an exclusively southern book, and, not content with making it a southern book, they have made it a southern book of the era of the rebellion. They would not even take anything southern of the ancient and great days of the South. Here I find an index to the authors. Every one of these authors is taken from the Southern States. Let me read to you a list of those who are taken from Virginia: G. W. Bagby, James Barbour, B. J. Barbour, A. T. Bledsoe, J. Esten Cooke, P. P. Cooke, J. L. M. Curry, J. W. Daniel, M. Schele De Vere, F. R. Farrar, F. W. M. Holliday, R. M. T. Hunter, A. Hunter, Moses D. Hoge, J. P. Holcombe, W. W. Henry, J. B. Hope, John Janney, W. P.

Johnston, James L. Kemper, R. E. Lee, T. M. Logan, W. G. McCabe, W. H. Payne, Mrs. M. J. Preston, T. R. Price, B. Puryear, Innes Randolph, R. Stiles, W. H. Taylor, John R. Thompson, J. R. Tucker, T. D. Witherspoon. It is a book made up out of Virginia's celebrities, that yet found no place in a reader for the use of the South in anything ever written by Washington, or Jefferson, or Madison, or Monroe, or Chief-Justice Marshall, or Littleton W. Tazewell, or Benjamin Watkins Leigh, or John Randolph of Roanoke, that great and almost illimitable list of worthies who adorned the pages of Virginia in earlier generations. In Missouri I find they have taken D. C. Allen and T. G. C. Davis. I confess at once that my reading is not sufficiently extensive to take in the celebrity of those names.

I say, Mr. President, even at the risk of exposing my own ignorance, that I never heard of either of these persons. I know something of the State of Missouri. I think there is not a person who speaks the English tongue who has not heard of Thomas H. Benton and many other distinguished men who have adorned the annals of Missouri. If they had been selecting something worthy for a reading-book, if they had taken Mr. Benton's Thirty Years' View and merely transferred to its pages his magnificent description of the character of Nathaniel Macon, they would have done more for the southern youth than is contained within the four hundred pages of this volume.

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if he makes that criticism as a Senator or as a schoolmaster as to what would be most conducive to the instruction of southern youth?

Mr. BLAINE. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. VANCE. The Senator says that if the author of that book had inserted certain things from Benton's Thirty Years' View, he believed it would conduce more to the instruction of southern youth than all that it contains. I ask him if that advice is as a Senator or as a schoolmaster?

Mr. BLAINE. Either, as you choose to take it, if it will only lodge in the southern mind.

Mr. VANCE. Allow me to ask the Senator if he objects to what is in the book or to what is not in it?

Mr. BLAINE. I object to what is in it; and I will come to that.

Mr. VANCE. So far we have had nothing of the contents of the book except the names of some gentlemen from whom selections have been made.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator from North Carolina will accept the suggestion that I have the floor, and that I have under the rules of the Senate the right to speak as I choose myself, he will observe some law of courtesy which just at this moment he is not obedient to.

Mr. VANCE. I accept the suggestion with the greatest pleasure in the world, if the Senator will allow me to remark that I have observed it has been his invariable habit to interrupt any gentleman on the floor and to yield to any gentleman who desires to interrupt him.

Mr. BLAINE. Always, but not to have a caustic remark made as to what line of speech I shall take. I shall select that myself, with the Senator's permission.

Mr. VANCE. Of course I asked no permission. You had been reading the list of authors in the book, and were proceeding to deliver the South a lecture when you had read nothing from the book itself, and I asked if your objection was urged upon what was in it or what was not in it. If I have reflected on the gentleman I am sorry for it.

Mr. BLAINE. From the State of North Carolina—the Senator will permit me to proceed in my own way.

Mr. VANCE. Certainly, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. I observe the book is reading extracts from K. P. Battle, Mrs. M. B. Clarke, Miss F. Fisher, T. B. Kingsbury, J. M. Leach, A. W. Mangum, and then from two honorable Senators who are now upon this floor.

I do not find anything in that book from Chief-Justice Gaston, from the eminent Mr. Badger, from Willie P. Mangum, from William A. Graham, or from any of the great men of the past who have illustrated the annals of North Carolina. So I might go throughout this book. It is made up entirely of the South as it is related to the rebellion. I do not say entirely, for I do not mean that every page in it is political; but if the honorable Senator from North Carolina—to whom I will gladly pass the book over when I am through with it—will show me one solitary thing in this book intended or suggested to deepen in the minds of the southern youth any respect for the National Government, or any adherence to the Union, I shall be glad to hear it, unless I shall guard myself by excepting some expressions here and there from recent political debates in the Senate or the House in which in defense some members of both bodies have made declarations of that kind.

Let me give now for instance almost the very first thing in the book. Here is—

ROBERT E. LEE

INVESTED WITH THE COMMAND OF VIRGINIA'S FORCES.

And then follows the oration of John Janney in the hot and fiery period of secession, when Robert E. Lee stood at the bar of the Virginia Legislature to receive the commission of major-general of that State and commander of its forces. All that was heated and overheated in that period is put in that speech. Then I turn and find Mr. J. P. Holcombe, who gives a somewhat elaborate defense of the institution of slavery; and throughout the book, made up, as I say, exclusively of southern writers, made up exclusively of southern writers of the modern era, of the era connected with and pertinent to the rebellion, you find nothing national, nothing loyal, nothing patriotic.

There is not anything in it from Mr. Calhoun; there is not anything in it from Mr. Clay; there is not anything in it from the great men who are universally in the judgment of the Anglo-Saxon world entitled to that name who have illustrated in the past the history of the South. Now if the Senator considers that to be the proper kind of literary pabulum on which the rising generation of the southern children should be fed, I beg to say with all respect to him that I differ from him in judgment.

Mr. VANCE. May I be permitted to interrupt the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BLAINE. With great pleasure.

Mr. VANCE. I still am ignorant, as I presume the Senate is, of the character and contents of the book which the Senator holds in his hand, but I take it for granted that at all events it is such as meets his earnest disapprobation. Now, I should like to ask, taking it for granted that it is a very bad book, if any institution in the South of an official character—I mean any State school department—has indorsed the book and put it into the public schools of the State?

Mr. BLAINE. That I am not able to answer.

Mr. VANCE. Then have any private schools adopted it and put it into use?

Mr. BLAINE. I am as ignorant on that subject as the honorable Senator said he was himself. He said it was not to his knowledge.

Mr. VANCE. Then the Senator from Maine tries to hold the whole South responsible for the publication of a book by a private author, the publication of which was permitted by law, and which nobody could prevent, if it was a bad book. That is the position now the Senator stands in according to his own statement.

Mr. BLAINE. That is a very small quibble, if the honorable Senator chooses to indulge in it. Books are published in this country for the purpose of being sold. I bring one here published by southern men, known and respected among southern men as teachers of the youth, and I suppose this book was not published for mere fun. I suppose people do not get up books for the mere purpose of expending the money that is necessary to print them. They are published for a purpose, and if at the next session of Congress the honorable Senator will address me that question and in the mean time endeavor to accumulate a little information on it himself, I think that the joint efforts of himself and myself will be able to show that this book will be in a great many southern schools.

Mr. VANCE. I should like to say another thing with the Senator's permission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. VANCE. The Senator certainly has too much regard for law and for common logic to hold the people of the South responsible for the individual enterprise of any man, as I certainly have too much respect for him and his constituents to hold him and them responsible for the obscene literature which is flooded from the presses of the North, the prosecutions for the circulation of which we frequently see in the newspapers. Nothing of that kind has come from the section of country in which I have the honor to reside; nor would I, as a logical and honest man, attempt to hold the body of the northern people, northern society, responsible for that. That is individual enterprise got up to make money.

Mr. BLAINE. But how would they make money if they were not sold? I ask the honorable Senator to inform me how they would make money if the books were not sold?

Mr. VANCE. They would not make money, as a matter of course, if they were not sold. The selling of the books has been prohibited by law, and many persons who have undertaken to circulate that kind of books have been indicted in the courts of the country, and therefore——

Mr. BLAINE. I am talking about these southern school-books. How would these publishers of books ever make money unless the books were sold?

Mr. VANCE. Of course the owner of the book could not make any money unless he sold it. That is taken for granted. How does the Senator know whether they are sold at all or not? He professes utter ignorance in relation to the book, except what he sees on the face of it. How does he know that anybody, privately or otherwise, has ever bought a single solitary copy of that book? I presume the copies which he holds in his hands are those sent to the library according to the act of Congress.

Mr. BLAINE. If that is the point the Senator has, I will excuse him.

Mr. VANCE. I beg leave to say further that I do not mean by anything that I have said here to condemn the book. I have not any doubt in the world but what it is a very good book, and that I will so find when I come to examine it. The Senator tells me the author has done me the honor to take an extract from some of my productions and publish it. [Laughter.] That is prima facie proof that it is a good and respectable book. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. I think the Senator is quoted not as a politician, but as a botanist, or lover of natural scenery, or something of that sort. I think the extracts from the honorable Senator are entirely harmless and do him great credit as a writer.

Mr. VANCE. I would not praise it first, but the Senator from Maine was disposed to put some curious construction on it as against the Government of the United States, but it seems the author was very wise and judicious in selecting that which would not do anybody any harm who loved the union of the country. So far my impression seems to be in favor of the author and against the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no; the Senator from North Carolina appears in the book in charming and delightful colors. He appears in the book as a descriptionist of certain beautiful scenery in which he says:

Verily, it would seem that such magnificence was the joint work of both the celestial and the terrestrial powers,

As when some great painter dips
His brush in hues of earthquake and eclipse; and that some truant rainbow, based on either mountain, had bestridden the glen with its radiant arch, and whilst in the zenith of its glory had been smitten by a thunderbolt into small, glowing dust, whose shining atoms had been scattered down upon the outstretched arms of the waiting forest!

[Laughter.]

The Senator does not appear at all as a hostile political force. He appears as a man who in the higher and beautiful field of rhetoric is capable of instructing the southern youth how to construct sentences and mix up "glowing dust," and "radiant arches," and "rainbows," and "thunderbolts," and waiting forests in a manner which I am free to say, so long as we are on sectional issue, was never heard of in the North! [Laughter.]

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine will allow me. I have not heard such eloquence from the lips of the Senator from Maine since I have had the honor of sitting in this Chamber. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. And I am frank to say that in seventeen years in Congress I never read such eloquence before in either branch. [Laughter.]

Mr. VANCE. I indorse the book now fully, because it has absolutely improved the oratory of the Senator from Maine. [Laughter.]

Mr. BECK. I hope the Senator from Maine after that oratory as a member of the Committee on Appropriations will allow me to make a conference report.

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly we ought to take a rest after that extract from the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BECK. I present the report of a conference committee.

Mr. BLAINE. I yield for that.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BECK submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2251) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 11 and 13.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 14, 26, 27, 28, 29, 31, and 34, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment to the amendment numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After line 13, page 5, of the bill insert as a new paragraph the following:

"For two additional watchmen on the Capitol police force, at $900 each, $1800."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment numbered 8, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment numbered 9, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 25, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum named insert, "$800."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment numbered 23, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 30, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the paragraph insert the following:

"Patent Office:

"For seven copyists, five assistant messengers, and one folder and paster, at $480; in all, $10,380."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment to the amendment numbered 33, and agree to the same.

JAS. B. BECK,
H. G. DAVIS.
WM. WINDOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JNO. D. C. ATKINS,
JAMES H. BLOUNT,
JOHN H. BAKER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CONKLING. I want to hear what those amendments are at some time before the vote is taken. When the Senator moved the conference committee the amendments had not been read, and to this hour we have never been permitted to know what it is that the Houses have differed about.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) Does the Senator from Kentucky desire immediate action on the report?

Mr. BECK. After I make a statement of one minute I think there will be no objection.

The House of Representatives agreed to nearly all the amendments of the Senate making this conform as nearly as possible to the vetoed bill. The only difference between the bills was this: A mistake was made whereby there was an increase required for the laborers on the public grounds of $4,000; the Patent Office library seems not to have been provided for; and that is covered by this report. The Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses got together and demanded two watchmen on the Capitol police for some reason or other; and we agreed to that. Ten thousand eight hundred dollars is the total addition.

The House thought we had given the General Land Office too much, and they required us to cut off two principal clerks we had added, being $3,600. My friend from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] who was on the committee, induced us to make a depositary and postmaster out of one man at Tucson, Arizona. When we came to look to the amount he received as postmaster, we thought perhaps we had given him a little too much, and the House being a little stubborn, we cut that down $700, making it $500 instead of $1,200. In the Patent Office, after pretty full consultation, with some reluctance we were obliged to withdraw the increased force the Senate provided for there.

The result is that the decreases are $14,680 and the increases $10,800, so that the net reduction by the committee of conference is $3,880. All the important changes in the section regarding the workmen were stricken out. There is very little change in the bill as passed by the Senate.

Mr. McMILLAN. May I ask the Senator from Kentucky whether I understand him to say that the clerical force in the Land Office had been decreased?

Mr. BECK. Only two clerks. The Senate increase $68,000 in that office, which was a large increase. The Senate thought a large number of additional clerks was necessary, but the House would not agree, and we had to give part of it up.

Mr. McMILLAN. Only a reduction of two, I understand.

Mr. BECK. Two clerks diminished from the increase made by the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Shall we understand that all the amendments disagreed to relate to items of appropriation?

Mr. BECK. Every one of them.

Mr. CONKLING. Nothing else?

Mr. BECK. Nothing.

Mr. CONKLING. There is no general legislation in the bill and no political enactments of any kind there?

Mr. BECK. None of any character whatever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York desire the report read again?

Mr. CONKLING. I am willing to accept the statement of the Senator from Kentucky.

The report was concurred in.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2175) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I should not have referred to this matter of the school-books at all but for the fact that when I made an incidental reference to the subject the denials in southern newspapers became very widespread that no such literature as I referred to was known in the South, and when I came to look at the shelves of the Congressional Library I found the books to be more numerous and to be infinitely worse than I had supposed. And with these remarks I leave the subject.

The honorable Senator from Virginia, between whom and myself there has been once or twice a reference to the use of troops, has referred to the Petersburgh case. I come back now to the question before the Senate, being upon the amendment I offered myself, to the effect that if the democratic party insist that the United States troops shall not be seen anywhere at all on election day to keep the peace or as police or in any other capacity, we shall have a disarming all around; that State organizations and red-shirt clubs and white-league companies and individuals with pistols or bowie-knives shall not be allowed at the polls. If my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] is correct in suggesting that of all days in the year election day is the peaceful day, that is, the day when the might and majesty of the American people are abroad taking care that the laws be faithfully observed, there certainly is no reason why any one should go to the polls armed. Does not my friend from Indiana agree with me on that?

The Senator from Virginia has two or three times stated that troops were brought to the polls in the city of Petersburgh, in Virginia. I want to read for the benefit of the Senator from Virginia the testimony of one man on that question, and I want to see whether he will agree that this witness states it fairly. This is the book containing the testimony on that question. I want the honorable Senator from Virginia to state to me whether this testimony is truthful:

It is well understood that the presence of United States troops at polling places never prevented the free exercise of the franchise by any citizen, of whatever political faith.

Thus far the witness agrees with me.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask the Senator what is he reading from?

Mr. BLAINE. That will not affect the testimony. The testimony must be true or untrue in itself. I do not want to bias the judgment of the honorable Senator from Virginia by telling the name of the witness. I beg him to hear the testimony:

If, then, they have had any effect whatever upon the ballot cast it has been to insure protection to the citizen casting it, in giving it to the candidate of his unbiased choice without fear, and thus securing the very essence of liberty. It may be, the presence of twenty-four United States soldiers under the command of a captain and lieutenant, quartered in the custom-house, at Petersburgh, Virginia, on the 7th of November, at a considerable distance from any polling place, without any interference on their part whatever, and without going near the polls during the election, may have secured a different result from what would have been obtained if they had not been there, (to maintain the peace in case of riot,) on the face of the returns.

Is that a true statement?

Mr. WITHERS. No, sir; it is not, so far as I understand it. I have not been able yet to ascertain from what the Senator is quoting.

Mr. BLAINE. That does not in the least affect the quotation.

Mr. WITHERS. It does very much in my estimation. If the Senator is unwilling to give me the authority, I have no desire to go into it.

Mr. BLAINE. It is a witness that with a large number of people of the United States is a competent witness; it is the testimony of U. S. Grant, as President of the United States, in a message to Congress.

Mr. WITHERS. I supposed it was probably from that source, and I wanted to ascertain the fact. The Senator will agree with me that there Mr. U. S. Grant does not testify at all of his own knowledge, but simply submits to Congress the report made by the subordinate officers of the military.

Mr. BLAINE. Who were there. The Senator from Kentucky went largely into affidavits. I will go very briefly into them. Here is the testimony of George F. Marble:

These facts I reported to the republican headquarters, and when an opportunity presented itself forwarded a duplicate of each ticket issued to headquarters, each one having attached a coupon showing the name of the party to whom the original ticket was issued. Between the hours of three and four o'clock, as well as I can remember, an organized company of men, armed as above stated, filed in front of the building of which I was the sole occupant, and halted, when one Emmet Richardson came to the door and demanded to know "what in hell I was doing in there?" I replied that I was issuing republican tickets. He said, "Hand me that book," referring to the book which I held in my hand, and which contained the republican tickets. I tore one from the book, which I handed him. He said, "I want to see the rest," when I handed him the coupon. The same he tore up and threw on the floor, saying, "God damn it, I want that book," which I refused him. He then went away and joined the company, and the order was given to forward march, the company going up the street a few rods, when, turning around so as to face the building I was in, started upon a run and made an immediate attack upon a few defenseless negroes, who were standing around the place from which I had been issuing tickets, with clubs and stones, which they used without the semblance of mercy, besides shooting one man in the face, after having knocked him down with a stone.

This was at the May election in Petersburgh; here are several affidavits of men, showing not merely the coming there of individuals with arms, but companies armed, men coming with the military step armed, and here are the witnesses to the fact. Now I ask the honorable Senator from Virginia, while he is so tenacious in warning the United States troops with their arms off the ground, what objections he has to warning off other people with arms on election day?

Mr. WITHERS. Does the Senator desire an answer now?

Mr. BLAINE. I will take an answer now.

Mr. WITHERS. What the Senator from Virginia desires is that the preservation of peace at the polls should be left where the Constitution placed it, in the hands of the State and municipal authorities; and if, as the circumstances in that case tend to show, a riot is precipitated from any cause that the officials of the locality of the town in which it occurs should be looked to to preserve the peace; and if the ordinary police authority shall not be sufficient, (as was the case in Petersburgh,) then if there should be a State military organization there, their aid should be invoked to protect the lives and property of citizens.

Mr. BLAINE. Then the honorable Senator from Virginia, as I understand him, does not object to having troops on hand, only that they shall not be United States troops.

Mr. WITHERS. The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution in my opinion embodies the only circumstances under which the use of the United States military in the States is authorized.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator is not answering my question. I asked him a direct question.

Mr. WITHERS. I think I am answering the question very distinctly and very directly. I am not answering it perhaps as the Senator desires me to answer it, but I am answering it in accordance with what I conceive to be the Constitution and the law.

I will also state that the circumstances of the election to which the Senator has referred were made the subject of examination, inquiry, and investigation by the House of Representatives, and if the Senator is anxious for information he will find by reference to that report the testimony of not one, two, or a dozen witnesses, but more than that number, to the fact of the presence of the troops in Petersburgh in sufficient numbers and in sufficient proximity to the polls to influence and control the election.

Mr. BLAINE. Not quite so near as that. Let me read:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Virginia, ss:

Personally appeared before me, J. L. Waterman, a commissioner in and for the eastern district of Virginia, Edward Edwards, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says, that he is a resident voter in the Fifth ward of the city of Petersburgh; that, on the 25th day of May last, that being the day of election for the municipal officers of the city of Petersburgh, that a company of persons, about twenty-five to thirty in number, who seemed to be under the drill, as captain, of one James Eames, a resident of said ward, having on the day above cited been drilled in a field called Battersea, and within a distance of thirty yards of place of voting, made an attack on this deponent by first striking him with a rock, and before recovering shot this deponent in the head.

This company under the command of Eames was drilling within thirty yards of the voting place. What I wanted to get at from the Senator from Virginia was this: As I understand his ground, it does not make any odds how many arms you have at the election polls, nor how many military companies you have there, only provided that the United States shall not have any there, and that the United States shall not have any in the elections in which the National Government is primarily and specially interested. Is that the ground I understand the honorable Senator to take? Certainly the United States is interested primarily in the election of members to Congress. I am interested in the election of Representatives to Congress in Virginia; the Senator is interested in those elections in Maine. Now, am I to understand the Senator's ground to be that the State or the city or the county may bring troops there on the day that a Representative to Congress is being elected, but that the United States shall not do it? I shall be glad to hear from the Senator specifically and directly on that point.

Mr. WITHERS. I will meet the Senator's interrogatory by another. As he is an eastern man I suppose he cannot object to that system. Do I understand him to say that at the election about which he has read, where these soldiers were said to have been present, he considers that as a national election or one in which the nation is interested?

Mr. BLAINE. No, that was not.

Mr. WITHERS. That was a municipal election.

Mr. BLAINE. Right there, if the Senator pleases. That occurred on the 25th day of May. There was attempted violence, and republicans could not vote; and on the 7th of November a national election was to come off. Various affidavits coming before the President of the United States that this outrage would be repeated on the day when a Representative to Congress was to be elected, the President of the United States, at the request of the district attorney of Virginia and the marshal of Virginia, put, not in the polling places, not within thirty yards, but in the custom-house in that city, twenty-four United States troops, in order that the outrages that were committed at the municipal election should not be repeated at the election of a Representative to Congress. That is the point the honorable Senator must meet, whether the United States has not as much right to keep order when its officers are elected as the State had when its officers were elected?

Mr. WITHERS. If the Senator will suppress his irresistible propensity to spring up pending an explanation I will attempt to enter into it. He is such an oratorical trap-ball that it is impossible to keep him down. The point I wish to make now is this: that by the testimony from which he has read, as given in this instance in the case of the investigation of that election, the allegation was proven false by the testimony of numerous witnesses showing that no such thing ever occurred. So far from there being any disturbance at the election in Petersburgh, or any reason to anticipate a disturbance in the fall election, it was the testimony of republicans as well as of democrats that a more peaceful canvass never occurred, that there was no reason whatever for asking the presence of the military; but the real secret of it (as the Senator will ascertain by examining the report made in the case and the speeches on the case) arose in this way: there was a contest for member of Congress in that district. There were three candidates: the regular democratic candidate, the present incumbent, Mr. JORGENSEN in the House, and a negro by the name of De Mortie, represented to be a very intelligent and influential man. They were running for Congress. The republican voters in the district being composed almost exclusively of colored people, naturally rallied to the support of De Mortie, and he had every assurance that he would receive the united support of his color in many, if not all, the counties of that district. Finding that such would be the case, the managers of the canvass put forth the report that Mr. De Mortie's election would not be agreeable to General Grant, and in proof of it that he would send troops down there in order to compel them to vote for Mr. JORGENSEN. That was the report that was current through the country there; that is testified to by numerous witnesses, and it therefore became necessary in order to carry the election for Mr. JORGENSEN that troops should be there, and consequently the marshal of the eastern district of Virginia, who was himself a manager of the campaign for the republican party, sent on here to the Attorney-General's Office the necessary certificates asking that troops should be sent there in view of a probable breach of the peace. The troops came. As soon as it was announced through the country that these troops had been sent down to secure the election of Mr. JORGENSEN such negroes as had formerly determined and expressed their determination to support Mr. De Mortie, the candidate of their race, dropped him and voted for JORGENSEN, and many white persons, according to their own testimony, were debarred from attending the election and casting their votes on account of a fear of the military that it was rumored through the country were sent there to prevent the democrats from carrying the election. That is the whole case.

Mr. BLAINE. Well, it all comes to this, that the plea of intimidating voters is only by United States troops. The State troops do not intimidate. The Senator avows his readiness to have State troops present, if necessary.

Mr. WITHERS. I never avowed any readiness; I simply defended the action under certain contingencies of using military force to suppress a riot.

Mr. BLAINE. That is all that anybody ever spoke of using it for. Now the Senator thinks that if a United States squad should be present to suppress a riot, that would be an intolerable oppression; but that a State force can be present to suppress a riot and that is a perfectly harmless matter.

Mr. WITHERS. My friend will bear in mind the distinction which I have endeavored to make and which he fails to appreciate.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no; I do entirely appreciate it.

Mr. WITHERS. But I have no objection whatever to either State or United States troops being used for the purpose, when properly called upon. When they attend under the restrictions and regulations of the Constitution, whether they are State troops or United States troops, if their object be to preserve the peace and suppress insurrection, I have no objection to their being there.

Mr. BLAINE. Then will the honorable Senator vote for the amendment I have offered if I put in "except when regularly called out by order of the executive of the State?" Will the Senator agree when he is disarming the United States to disarm other persons at the polls so that the elections may be free from violent control, as he alleges it should be?

Mr. WITHERS. Will the Senator from Maine agree to vote for the bill if I do?

Mr. BLAINE. No; I will not.

Mr. WITHERS. Then I will not make a bargain all on one side.

Mr. BLAINE. I will not, but that is a very different position the Senator puts me in. I am perfectly willing that both shall be withdrawn; the honorable Senator is not. I am perfectly willing you may strike out the entire section, and I will withdraw my amendment; but the Senator wishes to disarm the United States at its own elections and leave not only the State, city, and county free to use force but all manner of ruffianism that chooses to be there armed with violent intent to do just what they choose. Why, Mr. President, it does seem to me to be something which a man can hardly argue with patience. I have asked, and I have never yet received an answer, and I deny that any answer has been made to my question; I deny that any Senator here can relate an instance in which a single citizen in the United States entitled to vote was ever deprived of that vote by the military, not one; and those citizens who have been deprived of their votes by red-shirted organizations of private or individual ruffians and by men who appeared with revolvers and bowie-knives at the polls are numbered by the thousands and the tens of thousands. And now we see a great move to provide legislation for an evil that does not exist and to leave the evil that does exist entirely unprovided for. There never has been any interference by troops with voters at the polls. The Senators from Indiana signally failed to make that out; for in the very year that the Senator from Indiana said democrats were prevented from voting his State threw a larger democratic vote than she ever threw before, and in the very year the Senator from Kentucky said men were not allowed to vote because of the interference of the Army, the democratic party threw twice and a half as large a vote as in the year when he said they were not interfered with by the Army. Mr. President, Senators on that side can vote my amendment down, as I am sure they will, but it will be heard of hereafter, and the gentlemen who take the ground that in a national election for National Representatives to the National Congress, the National Government can be warned off the ground and that every ruffian in the land can go there armed as he chooses to endanger the rights of other voters, can take that issue, and we will meet it before the people.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, in the order of Divine providence nothing is made in vain, and in the physical world every object has its sphere. This is eminently true in the world of men, and having known the Senator from Maine a long time I had assigned him a higher, a better, and a more useful sphere in public affairs than he seems determined to occupy. For many years I have looked upon him as fitted by nature to fill that place among men which the eagle occupies among the birds of the air. I have fondly hoped to see him soar toward the sun in the clear, upper atmosphere of an exalted statesmanship; but if as a matter of choice he adopts the part of the scavenger bird, hunts for offal, the cast-off and putrefying matter of past years, I may deplore but I cannot prevent such a course. If he prefers to abandon the pursuits of the lion, and follow the habits of the hyena, to dig into the graves of the past for loathsome and offensive things, I deeply regret it but it is a matter for him alone to decide.

Mr. BLAINE. Offensive to whom?

Mr. VOORHEES. Offensive to the public interests, if not to common decency. The Senator from Maine has seen fit to resurrect an old, stale, and exploded charge against an Indiana regiment on the field of Buena Vista.

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir. One moment. I disclaim the charge. It was a scandal against the Indiana regiment, and I showed that the southern friends of the Senator from Indiana were perpetuating that and teaching it to their children.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have no such southern friends, and I find no such miserable literature. I do not burrow in the sewers where such cast-off slanders are to be found. I never saw such a book as the Senator holds in his hand; I never heard of it until the Senator, a few moments ago, sought to rescue it from its anonymous and oblivious condition, and confer upon it a certain respectability by his public mention. A Senator of the United States can give a calumny, however gross, an air of probability without a direct indorsement, if he is simply willing to pollute his fingers by bringing it into this presence. While the Senator from Maine may say that he does not make this charge against the troops of Indiana or indorse it, I know him too well to be deceived as to his purpose in parading it here.

Sir, it happened in the Mexican war—that great war which resulted in so much glory and wealth to this country—that one of Indiana's five regiments was placed in an exposed position on the field of Buena Vista; it was placed there before it was fully known, even by that great and sagacious military leader, Zachary Taylor, where the brunt of battle would fall. He was awaiting, not delivering battle. The Senator from Maine, although like myself wholly destitute of military experience, although like myself he fought the battles of his country by a substitute, (and I think mine was better than his from his account the other day,) must know how unexpectedly sometimes the full force of an enemy making attack falls on an exposed part of the line of battle. It happened so in this instance, and for the truth of history I appeal to the bloody record of that day. Within twenty minutes after battle was joined the Second Indiana Regiment suffered more in death and wounds than any other regiment that ever stood upon a field for no greater length of time. They were in a position that five regiments could not have held, their firing was rapid and determined, their ammunition almost exhausted; they broke. That is true. Some of them rallied afterward; a few did not. Of those who rallied was then Captain Nathan Kimball, afterward Major-General Kimball. With a large portion of the regiment he formed on one of the Mississippi regiments, perhaps the Fifth, I do not remember the numbers, and fought all through the conflict.

The Senator from Maine obtrudes that historical question here. Let me ask him why it is he presumes to criticise the conduct of Indiana troops, when there was not a single soldier there from Maine? Indiana behaved well, extremely, bravely well; and her blood bathed every battle-field in the subsequent war of the rebellion. She sent three times as many troops to the field in that war as Maine. The district that I represented in the other branch of Congress sent more troops than the entire State of Minnesota, from which we heard such a criticism through her Senator on Indiana last evening. Why does not the Senator from Maine learn a lesson of common prudence? Why does he not look behind him? Why does he not stop to inquire whether anybody represented Maine on that bloody and glorious field of Buena Vista, before he assails those who were there? Why, sir, not only Maine but New England was not there! All New England was absent with the exception of a regiment of regulars raised by the general act of Congress, of which that gallant and immortal spirit, now gone to his great reward, Thomas H. Seymour, was, as I remember, major—Thomas H. Seymour, whose counterpart for courage, high spirit, and fidelity to the Constitution is here on this floor in the person of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON.] This is all, with the exception of a hired levy made in New York on money raised in Massachusetts by Caleb Cushing, who was then a democrat. Is it not a shame that Massachusetts and Maine and all New England were not better represented in that great conflict for national honor?

Mr. BLAINE. Where was Franklin Pierce, whom you made President of the United States?

Mr. VOORHEES. Ay, sir, how like retributive justice it sounds to hear the Senator from Maine call upon the name of Franklin Pierce to save the reputation of his own section! [Laughter.] I am rejoiced that New England is at last forced to shriek, "We had Franklin Pierce." I thought I would catch the Senator. I thought he would bite at the temptation of Pierce's name and services. I was waiting for him. [Laughter.] With what jeers and gibes and sneers this name has hitherto been mentioned by the Senator and his party; and yet, in his despair, like a noted character in ancient history who cried, "Help me, Cassius, or I sink," the Senator from Maine cries out, "Help me, oh, memory of Franklin Pierce, in the war with Mexico, or all New England sinks."

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to remind him that he omits entirely a very gallant colonel from Vermont who lost his life, Colonel Ransom?

Mr. VOORHEES. In the regular Army?

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir.

Mr. MORRILL. The volunteers.

Mr. VOORHEES. Had Vermont altogether one volunteer soldier?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have examined this question at the Adjutant-General's office, and I say here, that with the exception of here and there a sporadic case not amounting to a whole regiment—I think not a company—all put together, there was no volunteering from New England.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator from Indiana will allow me to state that from the State of Rhode Island I think there were as many soldiers in proportion to its size and as many officers as there were from the State of Indiana. Colonel Slocum, who was killed at the first battle of Bull Run, was an officer in a company from Rhode Island. General Pitman, who was in the late war, was captain of a company from Rhode Island. General Viall, one of the most prominent officers of the State of Rhode Island in the late war, was in a company from Rhode Island; and I think if the comparison was made, it would be found that Rhode Island sent as many soldiers and as many officers in proportion to its population to the Mexican war as the State of Indiana.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am sorry the Senator from Rhode Island comes to the rescue of my opponents. He was born in Indiana, and started on his illustrious career from that State. A stab from him now might properly extort from me the exclamation, "et tu Brute!" I say to him, however, and I say to every other Senator, that there were not one thousand volunteers from New England in the Mexican war. There were not half that number, nor one-fourth. There were regular soldiers from those States in the Army before the war with Mexico, and they behaved well. I repeat, there were no volunteer troops, as such, from the six States of New England. They had regular troops in the Army before the Mexican war broke out who did their duty and did it well, many of whom fell illustriously upon the field of battle; but when the question arises whether the popular heart of New England responded to the call of the country in a war with a foreign foe, history records in no uncertain phrase, in no doubtful language, that she did nothing of the kind.

Otherwise why would Cushing have raised a regiment in New York, I speak from the record, to be somehow credited to New England? He recruited with the use of money a regiment nearly one thousand strong. They illustrated their venal character afterward in the fact that 25 per cent. of them deserted the service in the face of the enemy in a foreign country. Well they might. They did not belong to the substantial and worthy element of the people of New York; they were hired, hired with money; and I repeat that 25 per cent. of them deserted the colors of their country in the face of the foe. When hereafter a Senator from New England is disposed to gibe at a broken, bleeding, reeling western regiment, driven from the field by a force of ten to one, I think he will pause to reflect whether any man from his own State was there, even as a sutler, a camp follower, a mule driver, in any capacity whatever. When the roll of the living and the dead for Buena Vista is called, there is no answer for Maine except in the voice of the Senator from that State, with daring hardihood criticising the troops that were there. I see before me the gallant Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] Although political differences have divided us, although the tide of political events have broken up ancient political ties, I never look on him without respect for a brave and gallant soldier. He was in Mexico. He knows whether it well becomes New England Senators to flout at the misfortunes occurring in a bloody day to an Indiana, or an Illinois, or an Ohio regiment, or to the regiment of any other Western State.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President——

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not wish to prolong this debate on the question of Mexico, because I have to go on. I have other work before me.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Rhode Island knows how willingly and how readily I would yield to him if I did not feel that I must get along with some things that I yet desire to say.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator from Indiana does not desire to misrepresent——

Mr. VOORHEES. Oh, no.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I want to correct him.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will hear the Senator. What does he desire to say?

Mr. BURNSIDE. The troops to which I referred were raised for the war and had nothing to do with the regular Army before the war. They were raised to enter the service for the war.

Mr. VOORHEES. What war?

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Mexican war, and they were not in the regular Army before that war.

Mr. VOORHEES. I say to the Senator in all frankness, and with perfect respect for his large military experience, that I will go with him to-morrow to the Adjutant-General's Office and if he can find even one full company of volunteers raised in New England under the call of the Government for volunteers to fight Mexico, I will state that fact hereafter on this floor. I think that is fair.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Very well; I will go to the Adjutant-General's Office with the Senator from Indiana to-morrow.

Mr. VOORHEES. All right; we will go together.

Mr. EATON. I know my friend will allow me one word.

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly I will.

Mr. EATON. He does not desire, of course, to misrepresent New England at all. I know he does not. Now, I wish to say here, the Ninth Regiment, which was called a regular regiment, was a regiment of New England men, mainly gotten up through the influence of the gentleman spoken of by the Senator from Vermont, Colonel Ransom, and my friend Colonel Thomas H. Seymour, of Connecticut, who was one of its majors.

Mr. VOORHEES. But they were not volunteers. In fact and in law they were regulars.

Mr. EATON. They were volunteers in one sense, for they were the bone and sinew of New England. They were troops that were enlisted through the influence of New England men.

Mr. VOORHEES. They were on the roll of the Army as regulars raised, as I understand, under the ten-regiment bill, and not all from New England.

Mr. EATON. As the Ninth Regiment.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me a word more?

Mr. VOORHEES. I beg pardon for declining, but I must go on.

Mr. President, there is a reason for this hostility to the Mexican war which lies back even of that event. New England was never in favor of the extension of the boundaries of this country. The Mexican war grew out of the annexation of Texas. When I speak of New England my friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] must not understand that I am criticising the democracy of that section. I am assailing that nefarious sentiment which always opposed Jefferson, and the extension and glory of this Republic. The Puritan federalist of New England is the character I am speaking of. He opposed every step of progress the American people have ever taken.

The Mexican war grew out of one of the grandest progressive events the world has ever known. The annexation of Texas is really without a parallel in the history of nations, and arising out of that event behold what has happened since! We have acquired a wealth of States and Territories that rivals the grandest epoch of the Roman Empire. If, however, the predominant sentiment of New England had triumphed, nothing of this would have happened. Texas would either be to-day an independent government or subjugated to Mexico or some other foreign power. New Mexico would not be an American Territory; California, with her golden mines and silver mountains, would not be ours. San Francisco would belong to some distant nation; another flag would float upon the Pacific coast. All this would have happened if the policy of New England, whose brilliant representative is the Senator from Maine, had prevailed; and yet he feels it worthy of himself not merely aspiring to be, but actually believing himself and believed to be, a statesman—he finds it worthy of his public ideas to carp at and hold up to animadversion the conduct of one regiment on a glorious field where they struggled and bled to accomplish all the mighty results which have actually followed, while no man from Maine answered the roll-call on that stricken field either before or after the battle, either from the living ranks or from the dead. Maine was no such new-comer into the Union that she needed to be entirely exempted. She was admitted in 1820; she had enjoyed the protection of the laws of this country and the honor of its flag for more than a quarter of a century.

Sir, let us go back a little further. When Mr. Jefferson was President it was by his skill as a diplomatist, by his energy as an executive officer, by his prevision as a statesman, that the western boundaries of this country were extended from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean. All that mighty region extending from the British Possessions to the Gulf of Mexico and from the Mississippi to the Pacific Ocean stands as an everlasting monument to the wisdom, foresight, and sagacity of Thomas Jefferson. The entire New England sentiment, however, now represented here by the Senator from Maine, denounced him and his policy. They would have left the mouth of the Mississippi River in the hands of a foreign power; they would have made us beg, dicker, and barter for our right of way down that great national channel if they had been successful.

Sir, there are no apologies to make for the Northwest, one of the central states of which is Indiana. We do not come here to bow down to those who come from the East, in many respects a more favored section. Last evening the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Minnesota vied with each other in disparaging the State of Indiana. The Senator from Maine saw fit to repeat to-day what he then said, that one Massachusetts regiment stampeded all the democrats in Indianapolis, and demoralized them. I have no reply to make to that.

Mr. BLAINE. I never said it at all.

Mr. VOORHEES. I so understood you; and my reply is that Indiana casts 165,000 more votes than Maine and Minnesota put together, and she sent twice as many troops to the field as both those States put together. She also casts more votes than Maine and Massachusetts put together, and she sent as many troops to the field as both Maine and Massachusetts. Allow me to say in this connection that the Senator from Maine does himself great injustice when he speaks, as he has often done, in derision of the influence which the presence of soldiers creates at the ballot-box or in any other part of a peaceful community. I once heard that well illustrated by a friend and kinsman of mine in New Orleans. I said to him, in view of the troubles there, "A single regiment can hold your State in absolute subjection." "Yes," said he, "not merely a single regiment, but one single soldier planting the flag, sticking the staff in the sand, with the flag aloft, will govern the State; the emblem of authority, the insignia of government is enough." The Senator from Maine knows this to be true as well as any Senator on this floor. He knows that his argument is spurious and absurd when he speaks of the paucity of numbers in connection with soldiers and free elections. One soldier as the emblem of power is as good as a thousand, and he knows it. When he rises here and repeats for the fourth or fifth time that it is absurd to cry out against the use of troops at the polls, because there are not enough to control all the elections, he commits a mockery, and there is not a fair-thinking man on this floor who does not know it. It is the merest trifling to say there are not enough troops to control all the elections, when we all know that the control is by virtue of the emblem of authority, and not by reason of the actual numerical force.

Mr. President, I turn now to another matter. The Senator from Maine, with his peculiar talent, thinking doubtless that nobody else would take the same pains, has, as it appears, hunted up the vote of Marion County, Indiana, for some years back. I will enlighten him still further on that point. He says that because in 1864 my colleague, then the democratic candidate for governor of the State, received about 100 more votes—that is the result of his calculation, I believe—than Stephen A. Douglas in 1860, therefore there could have been no intimidation; therefore the alleged outrages committed by a military mob cannot be true. I have said there was a military mob in Indianapolis in the fall months of 1864. I repeat it. There was a disorganized, disorderly, demoralized military camp there at that time. Its condition can be accounted for from the fact that it was commanded by officers who never sought service at the front and who disgraced in many instances the uniform they wore. Those whom I mean will understand what I say. But let us examine the point raised by the Senator from Maine. I have facts here to submit. I have figures as well as he has. I have statistics here that the Senator from Maine would do well to attend to.

In 1862 the republican vote for secretary of State in Marion County was 4,844, and the democratic vote for the same office was 3,863, being a republican majority of 981 in that year. It is not long till we reach 1864. Two years is a brief period. Populations do not swell very enormously in that length of time. I will venture to repeat my statement of figures in order to emphasize conclusions.

In 1862 the vote in that county for the republican candidate for secretary of state was 4,844, for the democratic candidate 3,863, giving a republican majority of 981. In the year 1864, the year under discussion, the figures stand as follows: Governor Morton received 9,554 votes, and Senator MCDONALD received 3,221 votes, making a republican majority swollen from 981 in 1862 to 6,333 in 1864. How is this to be accounted for? Solely on the ground stated by my colleague yesterday, that there was a vote given that did not belong there, making the aggregate vote larger than one-half the ascertained population of Indianapolis, men, women, and children included. The Massachusetts troops spoken of, and perhaps others, voted illegally and as often as they pleased. How was it also in the district which I then represented? The personal view of the matter is nothing; that is of no consequence. I accept defeat without depression and success without elation.

In 1862 I received as the democratic candidate for Congress in the county of Vigo, of which the city of Terre Haute is the county seat, 2,121 votes, and my competitor, Mr. Scott, received 2,068. In 1864 I received 2,265, an increase of 144 votes. This was a natural and legitimate increase in two years; but what is the showing for the republican candidate? The gentleman who ran against me in 1864 was by no means so strong in Vigo County as Mr. Scott, who made the race in 1862, yet he received 2,856 votes in that county, showing a republican increase in the space of two years of 788 as against a democratic increase of 144. I presume the Senator from Maine will find some way to explain these figures to his own satisfaction, but to nobody else's. They fasten but one conclusion on every fair mind. The republican party cast a false and spurious vote in Vigo County in 1864. The leaders of that party took advantage of the disorders then prevailing to import repeaters from other States, some in the guise of Massachusetts soldiers, and some from other quarters. They did not intimidate anybody at Terre Haute; they drove no one from the polls at that place, for we made that city a free shire during the war; but they voted themselves and repeated as often as possible.

But, Mr. President, while I am on my feet I desire to pay some attention to another matter. We have heard so much clamor and persistent outcry from republican leaders in regard to the alleged hostility of the democratic party to the Federal soldier that I propose to say a few words on that subject.

A short time ago the republican party of Ohio, in nominating as their candidate for governor a man who staid at home during the entire war and never exposed himself to a moment's danger, saw fit in connection with that nomination to indulge in a hypocritical gush against the abuse which Federal soldiers were receiving from the democratic party. They passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the memory of our dead heroes who gave their lives to save the nation from destruction protests against the expulsion of their living comrades from public offices to gratify the partisan purposes of the dominant party in Congress.

Sir, it so happened when the present session of Congress was organized that it became my duty as a member of a committee to look into the number and character of the Senate employés. I supposed, and had a right to suppose, from the loud pretense of republican love for the soldier that at least every other man officially connected with the Senate was a discharged and wounded veteran. Sir, I here state the fact, and it shall go to the country, that when the Senate was turned over to the control of the democratic party we found just six wounded soldiers on its rolls, and no more. Out of one hundred and fifty men in employment at this end of the Capitol you had six, and only six, who were crippled in the service. I wonder that you had that many considering how easy it would have been to keep up the false pretense without any at all. But where are those six now under democratic rule? They are all here now. It afforded me great pleasure with my humble influence to recommend that each one of them should be retained for the sake of the blood he had shed, and they are all here. Every man who bled under the flag and who was here on the 4th of last March is here now.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from Indiana does not wish to misstate. I remind him of the late Postmaster of the Senate, who is a wounded soldier and has been discharged by the party of the majority in the Senate——

Mr. VOORHEES. He was not a wounded soldier. He may have been a soldier. He did not report himself as wounded.

Mr. FERRY. He is a wounded soldier, and was so reported and known as such.

Mr. VOORHEES. He was not so reported or known on this side of the Chamber. Every wounded soldier who reported himself as such is here to-day at these doors. I can name them all.

Mr. FERRY. I simply state that he is a wounded soldier, and his condition will prove the fact. Let that test the correctness of my statement.

Mr. MCDONALD. He did not make any complaint on that ground.

Mr. VOORHEES. The police board, composed of men of both parties, has removed the Chief of Police; but his place is filled by another soldier as good. Does the Senator want to talk about particular cases?

Mr. FERRY. No; but when the Senator from Indiana makes the broad statement that there were none of the wounded soldiers who were dismissed, I simply rise to state that, so far as the State of Michigan is concerned, represented in the case of the late Postmaster Creary, he is a wounded soldier and was discharged. I simply want to correct the Senator.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then the late Postmaster has more to complain of in the conduct of the Senator from Michigan than he has of anybody else; for this is the first time that fact has been communicated. It was a subject of investigation for the purpose of not allowing a single man who had felt lead in his body on the field to be removed, and the Senator from Michigan can only congratulate himself in informing the Senate and the country too late to do the man any good.

Mr. FERRY. I but repeat the fact, and it was stated throughout the press at the time, and I think Mr. Creary is entitled to a great deal of credit for his service here not only in having commended himself so generally to the approval of members of the Senate, but in not making the point of his wounds to shelter himself from dismissal. There were many others who did state it before and at the date of dismissal, and the press took it up; but, so far as he was concerned, he quietly acquiesced in the order of the authority here in control, believing, as the democratic party had the majority here, it was their political pleasure, it was certainly within their power, to remove him, and he accepted the situation. But so far as the statement that he was not a wounded soldier is concerned, I state the fact to be so, and his condition as well as his statement, his military record, and that of the press, will substantiate what I say.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not dispute the fact if the Senator says it is a fact; but his is only another instance of republican infidelity to a wounded soldier in not having disclosed that fact sooner.

Mr. FERRY. That was stated to the Senator's colleague before dismissal, and he replied that he was not disabled, which is not the point the Senator seeks to make.

Mr. VOORHEES. I cannot yield further. My time will not permit.

Mr. FERRY. As I noticed the Senator's colleague [Mr. MCDONALD] was rising, I only wished to add that the reply of his colleague was that he was "not a disabled soldier." That, I repeat, was not the point. The point stated by the Senator from Indiana before me was that no wounded soldier was discharged.

Mr. CONKLING. Other disabled soldiers were discharged.

Mr. MCDONALD. I very cheerfully bear testimony to the fact that Mr. Creary, late postmaster, was a good officer, but he was not known as a wounded soldier until after this question had passed beyond the control of the committee to which it belongs. He did not make any claim on that ground at all.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. Creary has never paraded his wounds, has never boasted of his services; but when the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE,] stated in his remarks prior to his dismissal that it was not the design of the democratic party to remove any wounded soldier, notwithstanding, Mr. Creary was removed on the next day, or the next day but one, it certainly then became generally known, if not before, that he was a wounded soldier; and inasmuch as such a statement had been made, it was a surprise not only to him, but to his friends and the country, that he, being a wounded soldier, had been dismissed. Since the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] has singled out the State which I in part represent, I desire to add, in justice to Michigan, that of the six employés of her citizens in this Capitol, kept in office by the republican party, four of the six were wounded soldiers—one, the late Postmaster of the House, (Mr. Sherwood,) having lost one leg; another, Mr. Bishop, having lost an arm; another, Mr. Coleman, with one arm, and the other, Mr. Creary, late Postmaster of the Senate, wounded defending the flag of the Union; and all these four wounded, and all have been dismissed from employment by the party now holding the majority in both Houses of Congress.

Mr. MCDONALD. It takes nothing from the statement of my colleague that this committee did make a thorough investigation for the express purpose of retaining every wounded soldier who was then in the employ of the Senate unless he should be removed for cause, and that fact was not known to them nor to the members of the majority on this side until the order for his removal had gone forth.

Mr. VOORHEES. The facts being as stated by the Senator from Michigan, of which I have no doubt, he has only to blame himself for this removal because he did not do sooner what he has done to-day. Enough on that point.

In regard to the employés of the House I submit the following:

DOORKEEPER'S OFFICE,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., June 6, 1879.

I certify on honor that there are now upon the rolls of the Doorkeeper's department, House of Representatives, my appointees, twenty gentlemen who served in the "Union Army" during the late war. Of this number is Colonel Baker, chief of document-room, one of the most responsible positions in the House; a second is Captain Knight, assistant doorkeeper, appointed by me to that place for the reason that he was a Union soldier and fought against me during the war.

CHARLES W. FIELD.

ENGINEER'S DEPARTMENT, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
June 5, 1879.

There are employed in the engineer's department of the House of Representatives two persons who served in the war for the Union, namely, William Lannan, chief engineer, who served in the Navy, and S. J. Davenport, who served in the Army.

WM. LANNAN,
Chief Engineer House of Representatives.

CLERK'S OFFICE,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., June 6, 1879.

There are employed in the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives five ex-Union soldiers, among whom are Hon. George M. Adams, Clerk of the House, and Henry H. Smith, journal clerk.

GREEN ADAMS,
Chief Clerk House of Representatives.

Sir, the soldier roll at this hour, with the democratic party in the ascendency in both branches of Congress, under the control, if you please, to use a hackneyed phrase, of "confederate brigadiers," shows a better patronage bestowed on the Union soldier than it did when the republican party had unlimited sway.

But I come to another feature of this subject which constantly confronts us. I listened, as we all did, some time ago to the brilliant speech of the Senator from New York in which he fiercely arraigned the democratic party on account of the present composition of the Senate. Because a number of gentlemen on this side served in the confederate army and a less number on the republican side served in the Union Army, therefore in his opinion the democratic party was largely to blame, and therefore he launched all his powerful invective against us.

I call attention to the passage to which I allude in the speech of the Senator from New York. He said upon that occasion:

Twenty-seven States adhered to the Union in the dark hour. Those States send to Congress two hundred and sixty-nine Senators and Representatives. Of these two hundred and sixty-nine Senators and Representatives, fifty-four, and only fifty-four, were soldiers in the armies of the Union—

He is now speaking of the House as well as the Senate—

The eleven States which were disloyal send ninety-three Senators and Representatives to Congress. Of these, eight-five were soldiers in the armies of the rebellion, and at least three more held high civil station in the rebellion, making in all eighty-eight out of ninety-three.

Let me state the same fact, dividing the Houses. There are but four Senators here who fought in the Union Army. They all sit here now; and there are but four. Twenty Senators sit here who fought in the army of rebellion, and three more Senators sit here who held high civil command in the confederacy.

He says there are four Union soldiers sitting now on that side. I can count but three, but I will take his count.

Mr. CONKLING. Which three does the Senator mean?

Mr. VOORHEES. I count the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] I count the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE,] I count the Senator from Kansas, not now in his seat, [Mr. PLUMB,] and I never heard of anybody else. I do not know who the other is. Will the Senator from New York tell me? If I am doing any man injustice, let me know it; I would not do so for any consideration whatever. Shall I treat it as three or four? The Senator from New York says "four" in his printed speech, and there are four I am now told who were under the colors of the Union in the late war. Be it so. With powerful force, with vehement voice and gesture, and with a look of lofty reproach and menace, the Senator from New York called us to account for that state of affairs. He assailed us until we sat here looking at each other in a sort of bewildered way wondering which one among us was most to blame because there were not more members of the Senate on the republican side, chosen by republican Legislatures, who had served their country under the flag in the time of danger. The Senator so amazed me, and arrested my attention so thoroughly that I have looked into the subject somewhat since. Sir, I am the last man to indulge in a wanton personality; but the Senator from New York cannot complain—I will not say complain, for that he never does—but he cannot charge me with a want of fairness when I remind him, as I do now, that since the war closed there have been four Senators elected in the State of New York by republican Legislatures. Each time the party of which the Senator is so brilliant and distinguished a leader and ornament had an opportunity to send somebody here who had shed his blood or offered to shed it in the war for the Union. Four times they refused to do it, three times by sending the Senator himself, and once in sending a gentleman whom I presume I may mention as once his colleague, Mr. Fenton. Four times the party of which the Senator is leader and king in his own State had a chance to select as Senator some soldier who had adorned the history of New York by his valor, who had been conspicuous by his heroism, who had faced the belching batteries of the enemy, and yet each time the towering figure of the Senator himself intercepted the soldier's hopes. Those who wore the blue went to the rear while the tall plume of the civil chieftain went to the front; and yet he now rails at us for not filling the republican seats on this floor with Union soldiers! Amazing spectacle!

Was ever such daring displayed before in the Senate? Does the Senator assume that our forbearaace is illimitable? Behold him; the representative of a State which four times has had the opportunity to send some one of her many soldiers to this place, and which has persistently refused, arraigns others in that regard! The Senator from New York said and said well, as he says everything well, that New York sent a half million of her men to the field. So she did. I claim an interest in the glory of New York. She is the great metropolitan State of this Republic. New York City is the great commercial outlet for us all. The Senator from New York can never utter one word of praise adding to the distinction and glory of his State that will not meet with a warm response from me and from the western people. And I insist that in the vast population of that great State there are many soldiers who would make good Senators if the republican party would only give them a chance.

Firmly persuaded, however, Mr. President, that the Senator from New York by this time feels convinced and convicted in his own mind of his errors upon this point, I will pass to another State, a very busy State on this floor through its great-brained and warm-hearted Senator. If I have not heard the exact words fall from his lips which we heard from the Senator from New York, yet the same spirit has pervaded all he has said. He has made constant assault on the democratic party for its alleged hostility to Federal soldiers. He too has been disturbed because there are so many men on one side of this Chamber who periled their lives in battle and so few on the other. If this fact is to be deplored, then I ask why comes the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] here? Why does he not yield to some gallant soldier from the Pine Tree State? The Senator from Maine was just as good a soldier as I was, and no better. We both staid at home, and kept our seat in Congress; we paid our money to fill the quotas of our townships and in this way hired substitutes. Some of my kindred, perhaps it is not proper for me to say also some of my wife's kindred, went to the front, and some of them died from wounds in battle. How that may be with the Senator from Maine I seek no further to disclose.

But there have been in the State of Maine five elections for Senator since 1865, each time resulting in the choice of a republican Senator. Are there in fact no soldiers in that State to send to the Senate? Is there nobody there fit to be a member of this body who wore the blue during the war? If there is and he has been jostled aside by the superior ability and I will not say artifice but ingenuity of the Senator from Maine, certainly that Senator ought not to come here and reproach us for his own grievous fault. Five times the State of Maine has had the chance to do honor to some soldier in her borders, and five times she has done nothing of the kind, and thus she has added five conspicuous illustrations of the dire hypocrisy, the vile sham, and black, false pretense of the republican party in its pretended love for the Federal soldier.

We have now and then heard a rush of fervid sound from the State of Michigan. It comes sometimes as a hurricane of wrath. It invokes all the bloody memories of the past and wishes the country to feed on them. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] is especially incensed at the presence of a democratic majority, and at the presence of more Senators who fought in the confederate than in the Union Army. The confederate soldier was sincere, for no man can deny the good faith of those who freely die for their principles. When such men pledge themselves to the Government, as they have since the war, I believe in their manhood and honor.

But what right has the Senator from Michigan to complain that Union soldiers are not here to meet them as Senators as they often did on the field?

Since 1865, the close of the war, four elections in Michigan have taken place for Senator. What soldier has been honored? Not one. My friend who sits opposite me [Mr. FERRY] knows that I am not complaining that he is here, or criticising the wisdom or the judgment of the Legislature that sent him; nor will the other Senator, [Mr. CHANDLER,] junior in rank but senior in years, misunderstand me. I intend, however, to silence those who reproach the present composition of the Senate, or compel them to explain why it is that their own States have so universally ignored the Federal soldier and sent men here who staid at home, never confronted the enemy nor encountered danger during the war. How well the gallant and brave Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] understands this. I think I can at this moment read his thoughts. The "home guards" are here in force. We see them all around us. The proper order of things is here reversed. The rear ranks are to the front, and the front ranks have gone to the rear. And now these rear men in war and front men in peace fill all the air with a dismal cry over the injustice which they themselves have inflicted on the soldier.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not believe that you ought to want to interrupt me, but I will yield of course.

Mr. FERRY. Since the Senator has volunteered allusion to the State of Michigan, which I have the honor in part to represent, I would suggest to the Senator from Indiana that it is hardly in taste that he should criticise that State and other States as represented on this side of the Chamber when he does not himself as the representative of his State set an example. I fail to discover a Union soldier representing the State of Indiana now on this floor.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am as good a one as you were.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator will allow me——

Mr. VOORHEES. That is a fine point for a man to make who staid at home with such fidelity as the Senator from Michigan did. [Laughter.]

Mr. FERRY. I was not the one who raised the point. The Senator from Indiana made the criticism, and I will not follow him in that respect. I may, however, add that the Senator himself has no laurels earned on the battle-field. Nine-tenths of the Union soldiers of Michigan united in choosing me to represent them on the floor of the Senate, and that is more than the Senator from Indiana can say of the Union soldiers of his own State. I am merely replying to him and saying that it is not in good taste for the Senator from Indiana to criticise the State of Michigan and other States when there is not a man who served in the Union Army representing the State of Indiana; and more than that, I would state to the Senator that I have scanned the Senators who now face me, and there is not a Union officer or a man who served in the Union Army on the democratic side, and they are now in the majority on this floor.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I did not raise this point; it was raised in enormous proportions by the Senator from New York and others on that side. The Senator from Michigan could not have misunderstood me. I stated that I had heard complaint from his own State on this subject. There is where the point came from. I am not for the first time raising it.

Mr. FERRY. When was it?

Mr. VOORHEES. I beg pardon. I cannot yield further. The point was raised by your own party in fierce declamation here with an appeal to the country against this side of the Chamber, and on account of what? On account of a state of things which was within your own party's control; on account of the fact that you have but four men in the Senate who were ever under the flag. I am pointing out that in common decency you ought to be silent on the subject, because you have had a hundred chances, taking all the States throughout the North together, to remedy the very evil you rail about, and you have not done it. The Senator from Michigan says that no Union soldier has been elected from Indiana. I reply, which is good enough as far as it goes, that I am as good a soldier as ever he was, and my colleague I will put against his colleague. So honors are easy in that regard.

Mr. FERRY rose.

Mr. VOORHEES. I cannot yield now. The Senator knows I do not decline out of personal disrespect, but I cannot go into a running controversy further on this point.

Mr. FERRY. But when the Senator from Indiana——

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Michigan knows when I decline to yield he ought not to insist.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana declines to yield.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do it without the slightest personal disrespect, but I laid out for myself a work this afternoon much of which yet remains to be done. A word more, however, in response to the Senator's remarks in regard to the fact that Indiana is not represented here at this time by Federal soldiers. Nor was she so represented when your party had the Indiana Legislature and sent Oliver P. Morton, Daniel D. Pratt, and that class of statesmen. The republican party in Indiana, with all its clamorous outcry about the soldier and its love for the soldier, always pushed the soldier aside, and sent men here who never faced the enemy. The Union Army is as well represented on this floor to-day, so far as Indiana is concerned, as it ever was. When the republican party was in power, before it was broken down by its crimes, its shams, and its hypocrisy, when it controlled Legislatures in that State it sent here men of ability and of whom I speak with entire respect, but they were just such distinguished veteran soldiers as the Senator from Maine and the Senator from New York, neither better nor worse. But to proceed.

Mr. BLAINE rose.

Mr. VOORHEES. I suppose I shall have to yield.

Mr. BLAINE. Do I understand the Senator from Indiana to maintain that himself and his colleague represent the soldier vote of Indiana just as much as Senator Morton did?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, sir, just as much.

Mr. McDONALD. I think more.

Mr. BLAINE. We doubt on that.

Mr. VOORHEES. Just as much, did as much individually for the safety and comfort of soldiers in hospital and field, more out of our own means; certainly as much as any other two men in the State, and I am willing for that statement to go home.

But let us go on. The senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is not here. I hope prosperous gales are attending upon the ship that is bearing him abroad. I took a kindly leave of him, and I wish him a pleasant and safe voyage; yet if he were here I doubt not his voice would be swelling the chorus of assault, because there are more military men on this side of the Senate than on the other side. Sir, Vermont has held seven senatorial elections since the war closed. There could not have been any soldiers, I think, in that State, or some one might have been found in seven trials. The State is not large, the population is not extensive. Seven times a Senator was called and seven times a civilian answered and was chosen. Seven times the roll of public merit has been called of those who deserved well of their country; and seven times the eager, hungry, stay-at-home, home-guard politician has rushed to the front, seized the prize, and the soldier has staid at home. He comes not here from Vermont.

What I say of Vermont is likewise eminently true of the Old Bay State. There have been six senatorial elections in Massachusetts since the war, and where is the face of the bronzed veteran on this floor? Why comes he not? Why does he remain away from these Halls? Massachusetts sent, I believe, one hundred and fifty thousand troops to the field, and yet not one is honored by a seat on this floor, and the hearts of the two Senators from that State beat in unison with the heart of the bold Senator from New York as they all together charge on the democratic party in hot anger because the republican party, almost omnipotent all over the North, has sent here but four men who were Union soldiers, while the South has sent twenty or thirty—I do not know how many, nor do I care—who were soldiers on the other side.

Sir, I think perhaps I have illustrated this phase of hypocritical politics sufficiently for the present, and, if so, I may pass to another feature of the same general fraud. The cry is not only that there are too few soldiers of the Federal Army in Congress, but there is a great panic because there are too many of what are called confederate brigadiers. They are painted as very dangerous characters; they are held up to the country for the purpose of alarming it. We are to have a shrieking campaign in Ohio; it has now commenced in favor of a man who staid at home and put money in his purse, against two Federal soldiers traveling on three legs between them, and the issue is the danger of confederate brigadiers!

That is to be the battle-cry of the republican leaders in the great Ohio contest between two Union soldiers on the democratic side with three legs, and a "home-guard" who got rich by the opportunities of the war on the other side, the leader of the republican hosts. What a campaign it will be! I can see it now. With banners uplifted, with songs and battle-cries, drum and fife, it is expected to affright the souls of all the good people of Ohio into the support of Foster for fear the election of EWING and Rice will give over the State to the confederate brigadiers.

Let us see a little further, however, about this dangerous person called the confederate brigadier. Who first brought him here? Who is responsible for the introduction of the confederate brigadier to the theater of national politics? Southern gentlemen around me on this floor are here because they thought the country was restored to its normal relations; that the States were rehabilitated under the Constitution; that each State had the right to select its own representatives in both branches of Congress, and that they were not compelled to ask leave to come of any set of men from any part of the country.

Gentlemen, I welcome you. You are right in being here. You are met, however, by a party with a violent unwelcome, with abuse and denunciation hurled as a key-note to party warfare by the great Senator from New York, and followed up by all the Senators on that side of the Chamber. Sir, there is something due to history on this subject. Is the confederate soldier unfit to take part in the affairs of this Government; or is it in fact only the confederate soldier who votes the democratic ticket to whom you object? Is it the confederate soldier per se, or does the objection to him only arise when he votes the democratic ticket? If a confederate soldier votes the republican ticket, and indorses all the rascality that overwhelmed the South as a deluge during carpetbagism, do you not embrace him? Tell me when you have ever spewed such a one out of your mouths. Tell me where you ever repulsed him from your warmest and most affectionate political embrace. None such have ever been cast out by the republican party. On the contrary, all such have had seats of dignity and robes of honor assigned.

It is but a little while ago since a confederate brigadier first took part in the control of public affairs. He was invited to do so by the candidate of the stalwarts for the next Presidency, General Grant. Grant appointed Brigadier-General Amos T. Akerman, of Georgia, to a seat in his Cabinet. A majority of the republican Senators sitting here to-day on their oaths voted to confirm him as the first law officer of this Government. They gave it to him to construe the Constitution, to interpret the laws, to render decisions binding for years, and perhaps for all time. General Grant put into the hands of confederate Brigadier-General Amos T. Akerman the portfolio of justice, and a republican Senate confirmed him; and why? Not because he was greatly learned in the law. Nor did they object that he had carried a sword, and killed whom he could, under the confederate flag; he voted the republican ticket, and that was enough; it washed away all his sins, and made him clean and pure in their eyes, though his sins had been as scarlet before.

Another instance nearer home in time and place occurs next to my mind. I know what profound satisfaction I will afford to the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] when I pause for a moment to pronounce a eulogy upon the present Administration. I know the appreciation which his robust intellect has of the patriotic and comprehensive capacities of the Administration now in power. I know, therefore, he will be grateful to me for calling attention to the fact that although he has arraigned us for the disproportion of confederate brigadiers in this body to the Union brigadiers or major-generals, yet this favorite Administration of his has confided one of its very important Cabinet portfolios to another confederate brigadier, General Key, of Tennessee. I have no word of disparagement for General Key or General Akerman. I am not here to abuse or denounce these men for changing their politics; they had a right to do so. I do say, however, that Senators on the other side, after voting to confirm these men for positions of the very highest public importance, have not the shadow of a right to assail us for welcoming the southern Senators who are on this floor.

General Key drew his sword under the flag of the South and fought through the war. He then came to the Senate, and while here made a speech. I refer to it now principally to show how much the Senator from New York has forgiven, to exhibit that gracious phase of his character which some do not know of as well as I do, to illustrate that his forbearance and charity are as broad as the mantle that covers all sin. General Key spoke just before he was appointed to the place he now holds. Commenting upon that very memorable field of testimony wherein Eliza Pinkston covered herself and the republican party with infamy, and while arraigning John Sherman for being the patron of that paragon of falsehood, the present Postmaster-General on this floor, on the 18th day of December, 1876, used this language:

> And on this testimony, the falsehood of which is so apparent on its face, a State is to be disfranchised, and a President, whom the people never elected, is to be placed in office.

I told you, Mr. President, I would prove how generous the charity of the Senator from New York has been. Within but a few days of his appointment and confirmation, the present Postmaster-General not only announced that the present President of the United States was not elected President by the people at all, but further, that there was a plot to foist him into that office by disfranchising a State through the instrumentality of wholesale falsehood. He has never recanted this truthful statement that I know of. I suppose he has agreed to vote the republican ticket, and doubtless he does so. I presume it was on that condition that a republican Senate confirmed this confederate brigadier with an additional handicap in the shape of the speech I have read from.

Mr. CONKLING. How does the Senator stretch my charity over that?

Mr. VOORHEES. Because I have never heard that ringing voice which God has given the Senator from New York in denunciation of that appointment. I therefore supposed he had condoned the offenses enumerated by me. I think the word "condone" a fitter word in this connection, all things considered, than "forgive." The Senator has been unsparing in his assaults because of our affiliation with the men of the South, while the Administration of his party appoints not merely a confederate brigadier, but one who in this presence said that your President never was elected by the people, that his claim to that great office rested on wholesale falsehood and threatened the disfranchisement of a State.

Passing on, however, I invite Senators to take a walk with me through the South, starting from the Potomac. I will promise still further to illustrate the shameless, bare-faced, false pretensions of the republican party on this subject. As soon as we cross the Potomac we at once find a Federal judge holding an office for life in Virginia. I shall not seek to disparage his ability or his character, but he was an original secessionist and the editor of a secession paper when the war broke out. I allude of course to Judge Hughes. He is now where he construes the laws of the United States throughout a wide expanse of country and over a large and intelligent population. He was appointed by a republican Administration, confirmed by a republican Senate, confirmed by the voices of those who have since hurled their anathemas in our ears because we welcomed you, and you, Southern Senators, to this floor. They have welcomed confederate officers to the bench and to the cabinet; they have welcomed them to foreign missions; they have welcomed them to official positions of every description, on the one sole condition that they would vote the republican ticket. Party politics controls this whole matter. When they vote the republican ticket they are your brigadiers; when they vote the democratic ticket they are our brigadiers.

My purpose must not be misunderstood. I am not producing any of these names here to assault them; I am simply using them to illustrate a policy so crooked and so outrageous that it deserves exposure, and it shall have it.

Here, next, is another Virginian, John S. Mosby. Who was John S. Mosby? I know him well. I speak no unkind word of him, yet I can remember when it was a question whether his surrender would be received, whether he would be accepted as a prisoner of war, or whether he should be outlawed from that general amnesty which the Government was then extending. There was a time when the name of Mosby shook the fears of men in this Capitol. There was a time when it was supposed he fought under a black flag, and that it could sometimes be seen from the Dome in the soft sunlight of an afternoon. It was thought that his warfare partook of the nature of the guerrilla, and such a belief largely prevails to this hour. But all is forgiven now; not only forgiven, but verily this most offensive confederate warrior has his rich reward. He embraced radicalism, and it in turn embraced him. Instead of some wounded Federal soldier occupying the position this republican Senate has confirmed John S. Mosby as consul at Hong-Kong, and he is now an American representative to the oldest empire on earth; he is among the Celestials.

The traveler in passing through Virginia naturally visits North Carolina next. We will do the same. Thomas Settle, of North Carolina, is now a district judge of the United States, a life office of rank and importance. It is doubtless true that Judge Settle is a competent man; I am told he is by both the Senators from that State, but he was an officer of the confederate army. He was a secessionist; he fought the battles of secession; he turned to be a republican, and was made president of the republican national convention which nominated Grant, in 1872, at Philadelphia. Afterward he was made minister to Peru, and he now occupies a high judicial station. I proclaim here, as far as my voice will go, that the most profitable speculation a man who fought in the confederate army can now engage in is to advertise himself ready to enter the ranks of the republican party at a fair compensation.

Governor Holden, of North Carolina, was an original secessionist and a signer of the ordinance of secession which took North Carolina out of the Union. The republican party, as soon as he joined its ranks, its unhallowed ranks down there—I will not quite apply that word to it up here—made him governor of the State. He remained governor until he was impeached; but proven crimes did not seem to disgrace him with republicans. Since then he has been appointed postmaster at Raleigh and confirmed by the Senate, and he is there now at a good, wholesome salary. Every weak or treacherous man in the South who for shame or for love of gain desires to abandon his friends and prey upon his own people is thus rewarded.

Take the Barringers; one of them is a United States judge in Egypt. They were confederates; they are republicans now, and they are cared for.

The United States district attorney of North Carolina, Mr. Lusk, was an officer in the confederate army, and he was confirmed here. He was confirmed by Senators whose souls shrink from contact with a confederate officer unless he is a republican. Mr. Young was a confederate officer and he is now one of the revenue collectors of that State.

Going on down the Atlantic coast and we strike South Carolina, the land of the Marions, the Sumpters, the Hamptons, the Prestons, the Rutledges, the Butlers; the land of chivalric men. What has occurred here? James L. Orr was once Speaker of the House of Representatives and I speak of him with respect; he is dead. I knew him well. He went into secession, and armed rebellion, and was a confederate officer. He afterward joined the republican party; and what a place they gave him! They made him minister to Russia. If not one of the first-class missions, it is the foremost of the second-class. I believe it does not rank with the first.

Mr. CONKLING. It does.

Mr. BLAINE. It does now.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then it was one of the four first-class missions, England, France, Germany, and Russia; and this confederate officer received it as his reward for joining the republican party. I know what my friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is saying to himself. He is mentally exclaiming, "Would to God that some of my comrades who fought under the old flag could have a great place like that." I cannot be mistaken as to what is going on in the breast of that hard-fighting Federal soldier. I think even my genial friend from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] has his conscience somewhat quickened if not entirely aroused on the subject by this time.

Colonel Northup, of South Carolina, is now United States district attorney; he was an officer in the confederate army.

We move on again and pause next in Mississippi, the land of the brave and the warm-hearted, as I know, for I have been there; the land of genius, because the Senator from Mississippi sitting behind me [Mr. LAMAR] has his home there. Let us see how the republican party has managed its affairs in that State. Major Morphis was the most prominent scout of General Stephen D. Lee's command and he is now the United States marshal for the northern district of Mississippi.

Captain G. W. Hunt was an aid to General Hardee, and he is now the United States marshal for the southern district of Mississippi. Ah! how the good things come to the regenerate! Thomas Walton—I knew him; he is in his grave, and peace to his ashes—was an aid to General Longstreet. He was appointed United States district attorney; and after his death he was succeeded by Green Chandler, a confederate officer who was at that time United States mail agent, and is now United States district attorney in the place of Walton deceased.

Colonel G. W. Henderson was a colonel of cavalry in General Chalmer's division. He is now receiving the reward of his services as a United States revenue collector; and in order to make you feel proud of your party in Mississippi and to finish up my work properly it only remains for me to state that the republican candidate for State auditor in 1875 was Captain Buchanan, captain in the Second Missouri Cavalry at Fort Pillow. He is said, according to all accounts, to have fought fiercely in that memorable battle. Yet he received all the votes the republican party had to give as well as the prayers of his northern friends who could not get to the polls to vote for him. With what devout aspiration the Senator from Maine hoped for his success, and I have no doubt he could get up now and prove that he would have been elected if his supporters had not been bulldozed. Yes, he was a captain fighting at Fort Pillow under the confederate flag. The leaders of the republican party standing here as the representatives of indignant loyalty against confederate brigadiers take to their bosoms this confederate officer who bathed his sword in the blood of Fort Pillow!

I have heard of the means of grace. I used when a boy to attend camp-meetings. I have heard the richest outpourings of the gospel. I have heard grace described as a fountain flowing in boundless beauty and eternal and illimitable wealth. I have listened when it was claimed that this grace washed away all stains, cleansed the murderer's soul on the gallows, purified and gave peace to the guiltiest conscience ever called shivering and quaking with fear from this world to the world beyond; but I have never before heard of a fountain of grace so wide, so deep, so exhaustless, so spontaneous in its unceasing flow as that of the republican party to confederate officers if they will only vote the republican ticket!

Take next Louisiana, that fated region of riot, disorder, and stupendous unveracity. We have known it long as the land of the magnolia and the cypress; we know it now as the land also of stalwart liars, as disclosed within the last few weeks in this Capitol. Let the curtain be raised and let us look at some Federal officials in Louisiana. We see one who was long in office there and who has made a great and bloody figure in history; a man of commanding military capacity—General James Longstreet. General Grant made him surveyor of the port of New Orleans, took his bloody hand in his, not only forgave but rewarded him, not only welcomed him but said, "Come up higher." Who was Longstreet? I have heard one who commanded a corps in the Wilderness speak of that dreadful shock of battle when his corps encountered Longstreet's, and the blood ran in rivulets. No braver, harder fighter ever drew sword or encountered an enemy than Longstreet. He was educated for a soldier by his Government, and he cost it more lives than any other one man who commanded no more than a corps in the confederate army. Who was Longstreet at Gettysburgh and at Antietam? An educated American soldier fighting with desperate courage to establish an independent government.

When the history of the late sectional war shall be written, alongside of the names of GORDON and Stonewall Jackson, of JOSEPH E. JOHNSTON and Albert Sidney Johnston, will be written in living letters the military achievements of James Longstreet. Yet nothing stood between him and civil preferment the moment he was willing to turn his back upon his old comrades who had shared with him the bloody charge, the nightly bivouac, and the overwhelming disaster that fell upon them all at the close. And am I to sit still in my seat and hear hourly reproaches from the mouths of men who confirmed James Longstreet to a civil office because this side of the Chamber is composed in part of those who were in the same contest by his side? No, sir, I do not propose to do it. I propose to appeal for fairness, for common honesty, and common decency to the country upon this question. I do not intend that the record shall be made up in the interest of injustice. It is not in the power of republican Senators to make it up in the way they propose, for the truth is not their way. Their accusations shall recoil on their own heads. Their charges rest upon false foundations. If there is guilt at all on this subject the leaders of the republican party are themselves the guilty parties. Other officers may be cited in Louisiana. Colonel Wharton is United States marshal. He was a confederate officer. Colonel William H. Hough is a district judge, Mr. Leonard is a United States district attorney, Colonel Smith is postmaster at Baton Rouge, George B. Johnson was late auditor, Alexander Boarman is United States judge, General P. O. Hebert was in office as one of the levee commissioners under General Grant. All these were officers in the confederate army.

I cannot dwell, however, longer on Louisiana. I turn for a moment to Alabama. Who was Judge Humphreys, who is now of the judiciary of this District? Is there any office of more importance than a judicial office? Who was Judge Humphreys? He raised a regiment for the confederate service. He had, however, only to join the republican party and he was at once appointed one of the judges of the supreme court of this District, where he now sits. He was confirmed by republican Senators, who now prate about the presence of confederate brigadiers in the public service.

I could proceed on this theme almost without limit. I could dwell upon Federal appointees in other States and Territories, but I shall forbear for the present. Some days ago I received a newspaper, published at my own home by a gentleman whose birth, training, and education all make him a republican upon every issue between the North and South. He was himself a soldier, and no braver or better one than Major Smith went to the front from Indiana. He tasted all the horrors of the war on the field and in prison. In speaking of the political issues now presented he indulges in the following article, which I will venture to read:

THE CONFEDERATE BRIGADIER.

The confederate brigadier is looming up to considerable importance as a political issue in the North. Republican politicians are urging it with as much persistence as they did the false issue of "southern war claims" a few years ago. The timid ones—those who staid at home during the war and, on Government contracts, furnished the soldiers at the front with stale rations and shoddy clothing at full price—greatly fear the confederate brigadier. As all this trumpery about paying the rebel debt and pensioning the rebel soldiers was made use of in the political campaigns of the past, so will the confederate brigadier be utilized in those of the future. The campaigning on confederate brigadiers is a new style of bloody shirt—a new political issue intended for those whose fear, not understanding, influences their votes.

The fact that there are more rebel soldiers in Congress than Union soldiers shows that the South thinks more of her military heroes than the North does of hers. The North has as many brigadiers as the South, men, too, of eminent ability, and if she does not send them to Congress it is her own fault.

That is what I have been trying to impress on my patient listeners.

If there is danger to be apprehended from the southern brigadier in Congress, why not send the northern brigadier there to meet him? The northern brigadier met him successfully on the battle-field, and his ability to meet him in Congress cannot be doubted. But the North prefers to send national bankers to Congress to face them, and then cry "confederate brigadier" in the ears of the timid and ignorant.

The North has forty-four members in the Senate, and only four of them Union soldiers; the South has thirty-two, and nineteen were rebel soldiers. For a long time the North only had two Union soldiers in the Senate, and this, too, when she has so many whose abilities entitle them to any position. The North has only 9 per cent. of her representation in the Senate soldiers, while the South has 59 per cent. of hers. And a republican President has appointed nearly as many rebel soldiers to his Cabinet as he has Union soldiers.

Just the same in the Cabinet, one to one—the Interior and Post-Office Department. The head of one was in the Federal Army and the other in the confederate army.

Mr. CONKLING. What do you say of the Attorney-General?

Mr. VOORHEES. What do I say?

Mr. CONKLING. Of General Devens?

Mr. VOORHEES. I never heard of his doing anything particularly except returning a fugitive slave, for which Wendell Phillips scored him so unmercifully afterward.

Mr. BURNSIDE. General Devens was one of the most distinguished soldiers in the Army.

Mr. VOORHEES. He was? Then I beg his pardon and credit this Administration with having a majority of Federal soldiers in the Cabinet; that is a majority over the confederates. If there is any comfort in that, take it. This writer continues:

The chief inference to be drawn from this is that the republican party has not been extremely solicitous to put the Union soldier in office.

I think not. That is what I have been saying, and that all the outcry on the subject from republican sources is a sham:

The sure republican States have the smallest number of soldiers in Congress. Maine, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Nevada, Colorado, Oregon, and Delaware have no soldiers in the House of Representatives, nor in fact in Congress at all, except Rhode Island, which persists in keeping BURNSIDE in the Senate.

Mr. BURNSIDE. One of the members in the House from Rhode Island was in the Army.

Mr. VOORHEES. All right. This writer continues:

It will be noticed that all but two of these States are republican, solidly so, and in them the soldier is pushed aside for the lawyer and the banker. New York, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island have a greater number of lawyers and bankers in Congress in proportion to representation than any other State.

Now I desire at this point to say a word for the comfort of my friend from Rhode Island. Of all the six New England States the little State of Rhode Island is the only one that does herself the honor to send a soldier to this body. I am glad to see him here; he adorns the position he occupies. It is refreshing in view of the conduct of republican Legislatures in New England that Rhode Island does send a soldier here. I have a kind feeling for Rhode Island for two reasons: She sheltered Roger Williams when he fled from the barbarism of bigotry in Massachusetts. Under his inspiration she established religious liberty, and maintained it afterward. This can only be said of the early history of two other States—Catholic Maryland and Quaker Pennsylvania. Roger Williams established the Baptist Church and free worship for all in Rhode Island. This is one reason for liking that State. The other is that she has sent my friend to the Senate, a conspicuous illustration of the general infidelity of the republican party in New England toward the Union soldier, for none comes from any other State.

Mr. President, I have detained the Senate much longer than I desired to do; but I did not intend, if I could help it, that this session should terminate until the country had placed before it, in my poor humble way though it be, the actual facts in regard to the treatment of the soldiers of both the Federal and confederate armies by the republican party. You have appointed a fewer number of Federal soldiers to office than the democratic party when it has had the power. There are more Federal civil officers to-day from the confederate army than there are Senators on this floor who served in that army, and they were appointed by republican administrations and confirmed by republican Senators.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin to yield that I may make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BLAINE. I want a few moments before that motion is made. I do not wish to occupy the floor to the exclusion of other Senators, but if no one else desires it now I will occupy it for a few minutes.

The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] was not willing that I should interrupt him during his speech, or I should have made a correction in the body of his remarks. I know his speech is made for extensive circulation in Indiana, and I would have been glad to have inserted in the body of it by an interruption, had he permitted, a correction of a most obvious misrepresentation of what I stated in regard to the Indiana regiment. The Senator chose to hold me answerable for making an attack upon the Indiana regiment, when I expressly disclaimed it; and I expressly stated my disbelief in it. But such is the entire delusion of that Senator touching the southern men that he overlooks anything whatever that is said in the South touching Indiana, and when I read to him that his State was libeled in the prominent school literature of the South, and that the military fame of Jefferson Davis was attempted in those books to be elevated and enhanced at the expense of Indiana, he entirely overlooks the actual source of the attack, and holds me answerable for making it. He will not escape in that way. I tell the honorable Senator that right at his door school-books are circulating holding up the soldiers of Indiana as having behaved in a cowardly manner, and representing Jefferson Davis as the man who came to their relief with a Mississippi regiment. I declare that it was a falsehood, and that is more than the honorable Senator has stated. The honorable Senator has not made that declaration for his State. I believe it to be, warp and woof, a falsehood; but it shows the extent to which a little capital would be made against any portion of the North by a misrepresentation of this kind; and I wish the honorable Senator would show some of his spirit in resenting the insult against the source from which it came.

Mr. President, the honorable Senator gave a very long list showing that he had been mousing around with a great deal of care for a very long time. He gave a long list of the men in the South who, having taken part in the confederate service, either civil or military, had since been rewarded with republican appointments at the hands of a republican administration. I thank him for it, and for two reasons. In the first place it answers conclusively the wide-spread accusation that the republican administration, particularly of General Grant, in the interest of the republican party had persecuted southern men. On the contrary, the Senator from Indiana has himself proved that any southern man at all who was willing to unite his fortunes with the republican party had no discrimination made against him on account of his previous record. On the other hand, the side of the picture which the Senator did not present was this, that the moment a southern man of any rank and standing ventured to change his political relations he was persecuted beyond human endurance. I ask the honorable Senator from Indiana to put General Longstreet on the stand. I ask him to put any conspicuous man in the South who having taken part with the confederate cause afterward took prominent part with the republican cause, and you will hear of a series of persecutions impossible to believe under a republican government and among a free people. Social ostracism; exclusion from all forms of business; disrespectful treatment, personal detraction, persecution, slander, and oppressive acts in every direction, until many have been compelled to flee the country as martyrs to the cause of free thought and free speech. That is a side of the question which the honorable Senator from Indiana takes care to exclude from the long list he has given. It is not in the power to-day of any Senator on that side of the Chamber from the South, high as they stand in the opinion of white men in their several communities, it is not in the power of any one of the democratic Senators on that side of the Chamber to change his political views and change his political affiliations and remain in the community that he now represents in this great body, or if he remains it will be with a social ban and degradation upon him that is worse, far worse, than exile.

And now the honorable Senator comes here with a taunt that a republican administration, seeing men who, having taken part in the rebellion, had come back to their senses and to their loyalty and were willing to let by-gones be by-gones—that a republican administration, seeing all this, was willing to go further and give them the hand of fellowship against the persecutions which they met at home. I trust a republican administration will always be ready to do that. I trust a republican administration will always be as magnanimous as the honorable Senator from Indiana has represented it to be, and I trust that the petty persecutions of falsehoods, of slanders, of outrages against men who merely want freedom of opinion and freedom of political action will be left to the democratic party, where they have always belonged. I trust that a republican administration will hold high the banner of free thought and of free speech, and that it may be exercised by every American citizen, whether he was in the Union Army or whether he was in the confederate army. If he will be tolerant of opinion, tolerant in others of the same liberty he asks for himself, he is a fellow-citizen to be embraced in the faith of American nationality and to be welcomed on the platform of equal rights the world over.

The Senator from Indiana in going through his long schedule about who was appointed here and who was appointed there, I think, read a document—I should be glad if he would send it to me—from a democratic officer of the House of Representatives, a Mr. Field, and Mr. Field sends the document to the Senator, and coming to one man's name, he could not remember exactly who, says, "I think he fought against us." "Us!" Whom did the Senator mean by "us?" Whom did his correspondent mean when he said "us?"

Mr. VOORHEES. General Field, with the frankness that becomes a soldier, wrote as having been in the confederate service; which is the fact.

Mr. BLAINE. Exactly, the officer of the House of Representatives, making out a minute for the honorable Senator to produce here as to the distribution of patronage, says "I think this man fought against US!"

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND,] who is more familiar with the handwriting of General Field than I am, corrects my reading of this letter. It was "against me," instead of "against us." I will hand it to the Senator.

Mr. BLAINE. Then he represented the whole southern confederacy.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will send it to you, and you can read it as you please. I do not dwell long on little things like that.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not myself, but we ought to dwell long enough on personal explanations to be correct.

Mr. VOORHEES. I thought it was "us," but I do not care.

Mr. BLAINE. I cannot myself make out which it is, but I do not see the sense of the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives speaking about a Union soldier as "fighting" against "me." The honorable Senator does not deny that he read "us?"

Mr. VOORHEES. I did read it that way.

Mr. BLAINE. I think that it is the natural way to read it. I think it is a very extraordinary proceeding in the Senate of the United States that a confederate soldier, an officer of the House of Representatives, making up a series of political tables for a Senator to use for a campaign document, says in regard to this man: "I think he fought against us." It is a queer technology to introduce, the honorable Senator will pardon me for saying.

Mr. President, I have a telegram on my table, just come, from Indiana, in which Mr. E. B. Martindale—and both Senators know him—makes express denial that the Massachusetts regiment was in Indianapolis at all, and the documents can be produced to show it.

Mr. McDONALD. We will have the documents on both sides. I aver that they were there; and in that same connection I should like to ask the Senator if he examined the figures. I have been to the Library, and there learned that the Senator had been examining them. Can he state the increase from 1862 to 1864 of the republican vote in Indianapolis?

Mr. BLAINE. The honorable Senator from Illinois here [Mr. LOGAN] wants to make a suggestion, but I will make one first on my own account. In 1862 the republican vote was very small throughout the Union; it was very small everywhere; it was a bad year for us; it was a good year for the democratic party; because the Union cause was at a low ebb; our armies had been beaten in the field.

Mr. McDONALD. Let me ask——

Mr. BLAINE. I will answer one question at a time.

Mr. McDONALD. Let me ask the Senator if he supposes that the 9,554 votes cast for Governor Morton in 1864 in Marion County, when no more votes had ever been cast in that county for the republican ticket before that time than 4,942, were honest votes?

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know. The honorable Senator from Indiana and his colleague dwelt a good deal on that point.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask if that increase in two years of 4,710 votes in that county for the republican ticket was in the Senator's opinion an honest increase of vote?

Mr. BLAINE. I will answer that this way: Yesterday the accusation was that these soldiers had prevented democrats voting. Now, the figures show that that could not be so, because the democratic vote, as the honorable Senator himself stated it, was just as large as the most popular democrat in the United States had received. Now the Senator comes around and asks me to account, not for the decrease of the democratic vote, but why the republican vote was increased.

Mr. McDONALD. The democratic vote in 1864 was less than it was in 1862. The democratic vote was less in 1864 than it was in 1862. The republican vote was increased 4,700.

Mr. BLAINE. Well, I can very well imagine that in a great war excitement like that and in the overwhelming importance that hung on the election of 1864 the increase might come at a great business and military center like Indianapolis.

Mr. McDONALD. I will tell you how it was. It was because these soldiers of which I spoke voted not once, but as often as they pleased. A distinguished member of the House who was at that time in the military service, and who is now here in this Chamber, knows the fact and saw them vote.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not care about that.

Mr. McDONALD. I have said that what was stated by me was from my own view, and it makes no difference to me who undertakes to make a contradiction. But in addition to that, I am able to say that now in the Chamber is a distinguished officer of the United States, in the military service of the United States at that time, who was in Indianapolis on that day. He is now a distinguished member of the other branch of this Congress, and he knows that what I have stated is far less than the truth, the telegram to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well. Nevertheless, the Senator does not wipe out this fact, that right in 1864, when all these oppressions were going on, when he says democrats were deprived of the right to vote, there was a heavier vote cast for him in Indiana than ever had been given to a democrat before in that State.

Mr. McDONALD. I will state to the Senator that notwithstanding I received in the election of 1864 some 10,000 votes more than were cast for the highest democrat in 1862, when we carried the State, yet I was beaten 20,000 votes.

Mr. BLAINE. That was a very natural and a very happy result, in my judgment, for the union of the States. But nevertheless the Senator cannot allege that he was greatly maltreated in the election of 1864, for he comes forward himself and acknowledges that he had ten thousand increase over the election of two years before when there was no attempt made to stop democrats voting. The figures are a little too strong for the honorable Senator. He may have a good many figments in his imagination, he may have a good many dreams floating around in the upper chambers of his memory, but there stand the stubborn figures of the election returns, and they conclusively disprove the whole theory that anybody was prevented from voting.

Mr. McDONALD. I state again, and the Senator has the figures before him, that in that county the vote cast for me in 1864 was less than the vote cast for our secretary of state in 1862. It was a reduction, while the vote cast for Governor Morton in 1864 was 4,710 greater than that cast for the republican candidate for secretary of state in 1862.

Mr. BLAINE. Only 4,000?

Mr. McDONALD. In the county of Marion—we are talking now of one county, and of the vote at Indianapolis—I say again that there was a decrease of the democratic vote at that poll, although there was an increase in the State to the extent I have stated. There was a decrease of the democratic vote at the poll at Indianapolis in 1864, and an increase of nearly 5,000 votes on the republican poll; and the Senator from Maine had the books before him this morning when he was reading these figures, but he did not read them here.

Mr. BLAINE. Did not read what?

Mr. McDONALD. The vote.

Mr. BLAINE. I read as far as applied to the case. I read on the points that were in dispute; and I still say that the honorable Senator himself received the highest vote that up to that time had ever been given for a democratic candidate for governor. He says now that some subordinate officer running two years before had a higher vote.

Mr. McDONALD. No, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. I think the Senator is mistaken in regard to the figures.

Mr. McDONALD. I say he had a higher vote in Marion County.

Mr. BLAINE. Not in the State?

Mr. McDONALD. Not in the State.

Mr. BLAINE. Then it does still stand as the fact recorded of history that the honorable Senator in the year when the military oppressions were so great received the heaviest democratic vote that up to that time had ever been cast in Indiana for anybody. Is that so?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. That is so. That is a very important admission.

Mr. McDONALD. And the republican vote was miraculously increased some twenty thousand greater than that party had ever received.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, well, the grief of the Senator is that although he got the vote up so high, somebody else got a higher one. Well, I have been there myself. [Laughter.] I know how disagreeable that is; but I never yet turned around and disputed the accuracy of the returns, or fought the arithmetic. The best thing for a man to do when he is beaten is to submit, and I commend the honorable Senator to that grace, even fourteen or fifteen years after his defeat. I should hope the ache had quit hurting by that time. He was beaten by a man who at that day was irresistible in Indiana; and the Senator from Indiana who spoke at length this afternoon, [Mr. VOORHEES,] states that which is virtually farcical in the eye of history; states that which is so laughably ludicrous that I do not stop to contradict it seriously, when he pretends before the American people that the soldiers of Indiana are as cordial in their support of himself and his colleague as they were for Oliver P. Morton. Sir, I repeat, it is laughable and it is ludicrous; it is not worthy of serious contradiction. It would be laughed at in Indiana. In pronouncing it so, I am sending a good joke out there. It is not fair to be treated as anything else than a joke, absolutely not. It would be reversing the whole history of Indiana's great record in the war. It would be reversing the historical facts that are known, read, and believed everywhere. Oliver P. Morton, whoever may have liked him or disliked him, whatever may have been his faults or his virtues, however people may have agreed or disagreed with his political record in the Senate or as governor, I say Oliver P. Morton had the confidence, the attachment, almost the idolatry of the soldiers of Indiana; had all these in a greater degree than any governor that was in the gubernatorial chair of any State during the war. To come here now and pretend, on the part of the honorable Senator or his colleague, that the soldiers of Indiana are supporting them as they supported Morton, is to assert what will not be believed by any intelligent human being in the wide world.

Mr. McDONALD. The Senator from Maine will allow me to say that in this very canvass of 1864 the candidate on the ticket with me for lieutenant-governor was General Manson, who was then so far in the front that he could not get home to vote. He was with the Army in Tennessee. The candidate for Congress on our ticket on that day was General John Love, who was commander of the Indiana Legion, an organization for the purpose of protecting the Indiana border. I will say further to-day that of the State officers in Indiana our lieutenant-governor was a soldier in the war, Colonel Gray.

Mr. BLAINE. I am willing to let the honorable Senator occupy my time if he will tell me the bearing of all this.

Mr. McDONALD. I am merely showing that this adoration of which the Senator speaks of the soldiers of Indiana for Governor Morton and the republican party does not apply to a very large number of the soldiers and officers of that State.

Mr. BLAINE. When I speak of two hundred thousand men rallying with a wonderful unanimity to the support of one man, I do not mean that every solitary human individual of the two hundred thousand was there. The Senator will prove my rule by quoting a few exceptions; that is all.

Mr. McDONALD. But the gentleman will find that in that State the majority of the soldiers who were in the service are with the democratic party.

Mr. BLAINE. The honorable Senator cannot come into the Chamber, nor can his colleague, and reverse history. You might as well come in here and tell us that George Washington did not have the support of the people of the American colonies when he was fighting the battles of the Revolution as to tell this country that the soldiers of Indiana that were fighting for the Union did not support Morton. It is absurd; with all due respect to the honorable Senator, it is positively absurd, and nothing short of it. But when the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] was going over his list which he seemed to think, from the amusement it afforded himself, was very conclusive and very cutting, that there were Senators on this side sitting here who were no more in the war than he, using me more than any other Senator at the moment, as an illustration, I wanted to remind him that, however that may be numerically as to the Senators that are here, it is true of the republican Senators that they have behind them in the proportion of seven out of ten, or even larger in many of the States, the soldiers who were in the Union Army, and if they are here as civilians they are here because those very soldiers chose them to come, chose them of their own right and their own free will.

Sir, I never twitted any Senator about his presence on this floor. The honorable Senator from Indiana has a right to come here with his votes, and so has any other Senator to come here with his votes. When a Senator has been voted in here, I consider it then to be the part of propriety to recognize his right to his seat, although I am sorry to say that is not the standard of conduct on the other side; and because of its violation to-day we are witnessing in one of the committee-rooms of this Capitol one of the most extraordinary spectacles ever seen since the history of the United States began. Sir, I challenge no man's right to his seat, and I permit no man to challenge mine; and if the Senator from Indiana had behind him the votes of the men who upheld the flag of the Union in the war as much as with confidence I know I have of the same class in the State I represent, I would congratulate him. But, sir, he has not. In all sincerity I tell him, he has not.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2252) making appropriations for certain judicial expenses, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. J. A. McMAHON of Ohio, Mr. T. R. COBB of Indiana, and Mr. JAMES MONROE of Ohio, managers at the said conference on its part.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2330) to correct an error in "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1879, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 104) defining the meaning of section 2 of the act of Congress entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of arrears of pensions," granted by act of Congress approved January 25, 1879, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2175) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President——

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I will make that motion; but as the motion is not debatable I will say before making it that I take it for granted that after the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] who held the floor by right this morning, and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] have occupied nearly the whole of the day, every moment of it when this bill has been considered except so far as one Senator on this side has participated in the debate, there will be no attempt made to hold the Senate here this evening, and to prevent Senators on this side, of whom there are several, who wish to speak not to the topics which have been discussed to-day but to the merits of this bill, having free opportunity to do so. No doubt we shall be able to get a vote in the course of to-morrow; but I hope the Senator from Virginia will not think now after six o'clock of resisting a motion to adjourn.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask the Senator to withdraw the motion a moment, until I make a statement.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. WITHERS. I will take advantage of the opportunity to say that the Senator from New York this morning, apparently with a good deal of irritation, to use his own term, stopped me in the midst of a sentence which I desired to complete, when I notified him that it was useless to appeal to my sense of courtesy in regard to this matter. I purposely used that expression, because I represented not myself but the committee of which I was the mouth-piece. The Senator's interruption of course prevented my saying that.

I wish now to say that I am not unmindful of the fact to which the Senator from New York has alluded, nor do I desire to suppress in any degree the legitimate discussion of the question which is now before the Senate. The day has been consumed, as I conceive, in discussion outside of the bill. I should be very glad to accommodate my friends on the other side of the Chamber by giving them such opportunity as they might desire to express their views on the subject; but acting as I do as the mouth-piece of the committee and in accordance with the wishes of a large majority if not every one of my party friends, and the notice previously given and repeated on two different days, I do not feel authorized to consent to a motion to adjourn now unless an hour can be fixed to-morrow at which the vote shall be taken and the debate closed. With that understanding, I shall be willing to consent to an adjournment.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I address the Chair for the purpose of saying that did I feel the irritation imputed to me, and incorrectly imputed by the Senator from Virginia, I might not seek by negotiation or appeal to prevent being driven myself and seeing others driven by discourtesy into a night session. If I felt irritated about this, I say to the Senator from Virginia that I think I have ingenuity enough to prevent the majority of this Chamber as it is situated at this moment, from attempting successfully such an act of discourtesy and aggression as would be done if after occupying the whole of the only day given to debate this bill, they should attempt to exclude Senators, almost as numerous as they are themselves, from any opportunity of debate. But I feel no irritation, and I hope neither I nor any other Senator will be driven to his reserved rights, whatever they may be, in order to get that opportunity supposed to exist in the Senate by reason of the absence of a previous question.

Therefore I will assume, having had that assurance from several democratic Senators, that they will vote for a motion to adjourn after what has occurred, notwithstanding the previous impression that the bill might be concluded to-night. I will submit a motion to adjourn and say to the Senator from Virginia that I am not willing for one to fix an hour to vote to-morrow although I am quite willing to vote to-morrow in the course of the day. We have tried that once or twice. I have myself several amendments that I want to offer to this bill, and I wish them to be fairly considered, and I do not care to bind myself, as I have done once or twice before, to an agreement to vote at a certain hour with some Senator taking the floor and speaking up to that time, and then being compelled to offer amendments without an opportunity to say one word in explanation of them.

So I think we had better leave it, there being a very strong probability, almost a certainty that we may conveniently vote during the day to-morrow unless my eloquent friend from Indiana or the Senator from Kentucky shall come in to-morrow and occupy another day by discussing matters which, with great respect to them, seem to me to have nothing in the world to do with the pending bill. But if to-morrow shall be occupied by listening to two more political speeches intended to be campaign documents on the democratic side, then we may not vote; but if Senators will allow us to discuss the bill, we can do so.

I move, Mr. President, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WITHERS. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HEREFORD, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON] on political questions. If this is a political question, as it seems to me, I must observe that pair. I would vote "yea" if the Senator from New Jersey were present.

Mr. PADDOCK, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (when the name of Mr. THURMAN was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. VOORHEES, (when his name was called.) I ask permission to make a single word of explanation. I am entirely willing to stay here; but I have occupied this afternoon longer than I expected; I have occupied two hours of the time of the Senate; and I do not think it would be personally fair toward gentlemen on the other side who desire to be heard for me to vote against an adjournment. I shall therefore vote "yea."

The Secretary concluded the roll-call.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to say that my colleague, [Mr. BAILEY,] as already announced by the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. PADDOCK,] is paired with him. If he were present, my colleague would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Allison,	Chandler,	Hill of Colorado,	Rollins,
Blaine,	Conkling,	Ingalls,	Saunders,
Booth,	Davis of Illinois,	Kirkwood,	Voorhees,
Burnside,	Dawes,	Logan,	Windom.
Cameron of Wis.,	Eaton,	Morrill,
Carpenter,	Ferry,	Platt,

NAYS—25.

Bayard,	Hampton,	McDonald,	Walker,
Beck,	Harris,	Morgan,	Wallace,
Call,	Hill of Georgia,	Randolph,	Whyte,
Coke,	Jonas,	Ransom,	Withers.
Davis of W. Va.,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Garland,	Kernan,	Vance,
Groome,	Lamar,	Vest,

ABSENT—29.

Anthony,	Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,
Bailey,	Gordon,	Kellogg,	Sharon,
Bell,	Grover,	McMillan,	Teller,
Bruce,	Hamlin,	McPherson,	Thurman,
Butler,	Hereford,	Maxey,	Williams.
Cameron of Pa.,	Hoar,	Paddock,
Cockrell,	Houston,	Pendleton,
Edmunds,	Johnston,	Plumb,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. CHANDLER, (at six o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (when Mr. THURMAN'S name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The roll-call was concluded; and the result was announced—yeas 4, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—4.

Allison,	Blaine,	Davis of Illinois,	Windom.

NAYS—30.

Bayard,	Hampton,	McDonald,	Vance,
Beck,	Harris,	Maxey,	Vest,
Call,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,	Walker,
Coke,	Houston,	Pendleton,	Wallace,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Randolph,	Whyte,
Eaton,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,	Withers.
Garland,	Kernan,	Saulsbury,
Groome,	Lamar,	Slater,

ABSENT—42.

Anthony,	Cockrell,	Hoar,	Platt,
Bailey,	Conkling,	Ingalls,	Plumb,
Bell,	Dawes,	Johnston,	Rollins,

Burnside,	Ferry,	Kirkwood,	Teller,
Butler,	Gordon,	Logan,	Thurman,
Cameron of Pa.,	Grover,	McMillan,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hamlin,	McPherson,	Williams.
Carpenter,	Hereford,	Morrill,
Chandler,	Hill of Colorado,	Paddock,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. EATON. I move a call of the Senate.

Mr. CARPENTER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EATON. I move a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn takes precedence.

Mr. CARPENTER. I move to adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. It does not take a quorum to adjourn.

Mr. EATON. Well, I call for the yeas and nays on that. I think I am right.

Mr. CONKLING. Very well, let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired on political questions with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. McPHERSON.] If he were here, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. PADDOCK, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (when Mr. THURMAN'S name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The Secretary concluded the roll-call; and the result was announced—yeas 21, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Allison,	Carpenter,	Hill of Colorado,	Saunders,
Blaine,	Chandler,	Ingalls,	Voorhees,
Booth,	Conkling,	Kirkwood,	Windom.
Burnside,	Davis of Illinois,	Logan,
Cameron of Pa.,	Dawes,	Morrill,
Cameron of Wis.,	Ferry,	Platt,

NAYS—30.

Bayard,	Hampton,	McDonald,	Vance,

Garland,	Kernan,	Saulsbury,
Groome,	Lamar,	Slater,

ABSENT—25.

Anthony,	Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Bailey,	Gordon,	Kellogg,	Teller,
Bell,	Grover,	McMillan,	Thurman,
Bruce,	Hamlin,	McPherson,	Williams.
Butler,	Hereford,	Paddock,
Cockrell,	Hoar,	Plumb,
Edmunds,	Johnston,	Rollins,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business, and on that motion the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. VANCE, (when Mr. ROLLINS's name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS.] I was paired on the last vote, but forgot it. I ask leave to withdraw that vote, apologizing to the Senate for casting it, as I was paired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (when Mr. THURMAN's name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HEREFORD. I am paired on all political questions with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] who is absent. I have just informed his colleague [Mr. DAWES] that in order to form a quorum I am entitled to vote. For that reason, I now vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 4, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—4.

Cameron of Pa.,	Davis of Illinois,	Morrill,	Voorhees.

NAYS—30.

Bayard,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Slater,
Beck,	Harris,	McDonald,	Vest,
Call,	Hereford,	Maxey,	Walker,

Butler,	Grover,	McPherson,	Windom.
Cameron of Wis.,	Hamlin,	Paddock,
Carpenter,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. WITHERS. I move a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves a call of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. CARPENTER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair a motion for a call of the Senate is not necessary, but it is the duty of the Chair to order a call of the Senate.

Mr. CARPENTER. Pending which, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WHYTE. That motion is out of order. There has been no business transacted since the last motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is always in order to move to adjourn.

Mr. WALLACE. Is it in order to move to adjourn until you learn that there is a quorum or not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But there is no quorum voting.

Mr. WALLACE. How is the Senate to determine that question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that a motion to adjourn is always in order. It is moved that the Senate adjourn.

The question being put, it was declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. CARPENTER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore asked for a second to the call, and four Senators responded.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I rise to a point of order. The Chair announced that the noes had it before the yeas and nays were asked for. Is it proper to call for the yeas and nays after the decision has been announced by the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The custom of the Senate has been otherwise. It has universally been the custom of the Senate even after a vote is taken by sound or by a division that the yeas and nays may be demanded; but the demand for the yeas and nays was not seconded in this case.

Mr. CARPENTER. I called for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But there was no second, only four Senators rose.

Mr. CARPENTER. I understand that the hands up were enough.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There were only four up before. The Chair will put the question again. [Several Senators rose.] There is a second now, it seems. The Secretary will call the roll on the motion to adjourn.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. VANCE. I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS.] To keep the pair I shall not vote even to make a quorum as republican Senators do not seem to be voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator wish his name called?

Mr. VANCE. No, sir.

The result was announced—yeas 2, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—2.

Burnside,	Davis of Illinois.

NAYS—28.

Bayard,	Groome,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Harris,	McDonald,	Slater,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hereford,	Maxey,	Vest,
Coke,	Houston,	Morgan,	Walker,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Pendleton,	Wallace,
Eaton,	Jones of Florida,	Randolph,	Whyte,
Garland,	Kernan,	Ransom,	Withers.

ABSENT—46.

Allison,	Cockrell,	Hoar,	Plumb,
Anthony,	Conkling,	Ingalls,	Rollins,
Bailey,	Dawes,	Johnston,	Saunders,
Beck,	Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Bell,	Farley,	Kellogg,	Teller,
Blaine,	Ferry,	Kirkwood,	Thurman,
Booth,	Gordon,	Logan,	Vance,
Bruce,	Grover,	McMillan,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Hamlin,	McPherson,	Williams,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hampton,	Morrill,	Windom.
Carpenter,	Hill of Colorado,	Paddock,
Chandler,	Hill of Georgia,	Platt,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate refuses to adjourn, but the vote discloses the lack of a quorum. The second rule reads as follows:

If either at the commencement of any daily session of the Senate, or at any time during its daily sessions, a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the presiding officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll of Senators, and shall announce the result to the Senate; and these proceedings shall be without debate.

Under this rule, in the opinion of the Chair, it is not necessary by a vote to order a call of the Senate, but it being suggested that there is not a quorum present the call must be made. The Secretary will proceed to call the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE. My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] was called home to-day by the death of a friend.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. BAILEY] has retired to his room because of indisposition. He is paired on this bill with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. PADDOCK.]

On the call of the roll the following Senators answered to their names:

Bayard,	Ferry,	Logan,	Saunders,
Burnside,	Garland,	Maxey,	Slater,
Call,	Groome,	McDonald,	Thurman,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harris,	McMillan,	Vance,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hereford,	Morgan,	Vest,
Carpenter,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,	Voorhees,
Chandler,	Houston,	Paddock,	Walker,
Cockrell,	Ingalls,	Pendleton,	Wallace,
Coke,	Jones of Florida,	Platt,	Whyte,
Davis of Illinois,	Kernan,	Randolph,	Windom,
Davis of W. Va.,	Kirkwood,	Ransom,	Withers.
Eaton,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CARPENTER. I suppose the pending question is on the motion to go into executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CARPENTER. I did not make that motion, but I ask if that is not the pending question? It was upon that question that it was ascertained there was no quorum. I suppose, as a quorum has been ascertained to be present now, the question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is entirely right; but as it happened, in the confusion, after the motion had been made, it was ascertained there was no quorum, and then a motion to adjourn disclosed a quorum. Upon a quorum being disclosed, the Chair should have put the question upon the motion that had been previously made, but the Senator from New York moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, and that question was put. The only difference is a mere matter of form. The Chair should have put the question on the motion of the Senator from Michigan instead of upon the motion of the Senator from New York.

Mr. CARPENTER. It is the pending question in either case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not the pending question now, because it has been voted upon.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then I move to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONKLING. How is that, may I inquire? Did not the roll-call on the motion to proceed to executive business disclose the absence of a quorum?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It did.

Mr. CONKLING. Does not that motion, then, no matter by whom made, remain the pending question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York probably did not hear the statement made by the Chair. The Chair will state it again.

Mr. CONKLING. I tried to hear the Chair; I listened to him carefully.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, and the yeas and nays were ordered. On that motion a quorum did not vote. Then a motion was made to adjourn, and on that motion a quorum did vote. Then before the Chair could put the question upon going into executive session, which was the proper question, for that question recurred, the Senator from New York rose and moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, and that question was put and voted down, the Chair thinks.

Mr. CONKLING. Not at all; it was on that vote that the want of a quorum was ascertained.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there was no quorum on the second vote, then the Senator is quite right and the question now before the Senate is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. CONKLING and Mr. CARPENTER. That is the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was under the impression that the motion was voted down.

Mr. CONKLING. No, it was not.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is not debatable.

Mr. BLAINE. By unanimous consent the Senator can be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no objection is made the Senate will hear the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CONKLING. Nobody objects to hearing the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I simply rose to appeal to both sides of the Chamber to quit this trifling, if I may call it so, with the public business and to fix an hour to-morrow when we can take the vote on the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. We cannot do that.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. If you say so on behalf of all the Senators here, then I withdraw the proposition.

Mr. CONKLING. I say so on behalf of myself. I will object to any arrangement by unanimous consent after such an exhibition as we have had. We will see if we cannot stay here as long as other people.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. If that spirit is displayed I do not care how much Senators vote on such questions; I do not share that spirit with the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. I do share the whole of it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I want in good faith to have the vote taken on the bill some time to-morrow.

Mr. CONKLING. So do I.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I believe a majority of Senators on both sides of the Chamber desire that to be done; and I say also that if we are to be kept here all night both parties will regret it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. We are willing to fix an hour on this side.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Senators say they are willing on this side to fix an hour. It seems to me that is reasonable, I do not care who objects to it.

Mr. LOGAN. That side has got through talking.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when Mr. BECK's name was called.) The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has been called home, and is paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER.] I make this announcement to apply to this and subsequent votes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (when Mr. EDMUNDS's name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 1, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—1.

Davis of Illinois.

NAYS—29.

Bayard,	Hampton,	McDonald,	Vest,
Call,	Harris,	Maxey,	Walker,
Cockrell,	Hereford,	Morgan,	Wallace,
Coke,	Houston,	Randolph,	Whyte,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Ransom,	Withers.
Eaton,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Garland,	Kernan,	Slater,
Groome,	Lamar,	Vance,

ABSENT—46.

Allison,	Booth,	Carpenter,	Ferry,
Anthony,	Bruce,	Chandler,	Gordon,
Bailey,	Burnside,	Conkling,	Grover,
Beck,	Butler,	Dawes,	Hamlin,
Bell,	Cameron of Pa.,	Edmunds,	Hill of Colorado,
Blaine,	Cameron of Wis.,	Farley,	Hill of Georgia.
Hoar,	Logan,	Platt,	Thurman,
Ingalls,	McMillan,	Plumb,	Voorhees,
Johnston,	McPherson,	Rollins,	Williams,
Jones of Nevada,	Morrill,	Saunders,	Windom.
Kellogg,	Paddock,	Sharon,
Kirkwood,	Pendleton,	Teller,

Mr. WHYTE. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact of the absence of a quorum, and ask that the roll be called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No quorum has voted. The Secretary will call the roll of Senators.

Mr. HEREFORD. On the last vote I neglected to announce the pair between the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.] If the Senator from Ohio had been here, he would have voted "nay." I cannot say how the Senator from Iowa would have voted.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bayard,	Groome,	Kernan,	Thurman,
Burnside,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Vance,
Cockrell,	Harris,	McDonald,	Vest,
Coke,	Hereford,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Colorado,	Randolph,	Walker,
Davis of W. Va.,	Houston,	Ransom,	Wallace,
Eaton,	Ingalls,	Saulsbury,	Whyte,
Ferry,	Jonas,	Saunders,	Withers.
Garland,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,

Mr. SAUNDERS. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BELL] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is no quorum and the absentees will be called.

The Secretary called the absentees, as follows:

Allison,	Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Pendleton,
Anthony,	Carpenter,	Johnston,	Platt,
Bailey,	Chandler,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,
Beck,	Conkling,	Kellogg,	Rollins,
Bell,	Dawes,	Kirkwood,	Sharon,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	Logan,	Teller,
Booth,	Farley,	McMillan,	Williams,
Bruce,	Gordon,	McPherson,	Windom.
Butler,	Grover,	Maxey,
Call,	Hamlin,	Morrill,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Georgia,	Paddock,

Mr. COKE, Mr. MAXEY, and Mr. RANDOLPH appeared and answered to their names.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. BAILEY] is absent from the Senate by reason of indisposition. He is at his rooms unwell.

Mr. WITHERS. I desire to make a similar statement in regard to my colleague, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] who has gone home in consequence of indisposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is no quorum.

Mr. WHYTE. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of the absent Senators.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] was called home by the death of a friend.

Mr. CARPENTER. I understand that the pending question is on proceeding to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not know whether that is the pending question.

Mr. WHYTE. There is no pending question.

Mr. CONKLING. That is the question.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is the pending question. The roll-call on that motion disclosed the fact that no quorum was present. In the absence of a quorum, and it being late at night, I move that the Senate adjourn and ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. WHYTE. I make the point of order that pending the call and the sending for absent Senators there can be no such motion.

Mr. CONKLING. That will not do. A motion to adjourn is always in order.

Mr. WHYTE. It is not in order during a call of the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The third rule of the Senate reads as follows:

> No Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave of the Senate first obtained. Whenever it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request, and when necessary, to compel the attendance of the absent Senators, which order shall be determined without debate; and pending its execution—

That is, the execution of the order requesting the attendance of absent Senators—> and until a quorum shall be present, no motion, except a motion to adjourn, nor debate, shall be in order.

If a motion to adjourn would be in order after the Sergeant-at-Arms had proceeded to the execution of the order, it seems to the Chair very clear that it is in order before he starts out on that mission.

Mr. McDONALD. I wish to make an inquiry.

Mr. CARPENTER. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the point of order?

Mr. CARPENTER. I have made a motion to adjourn, which I understand is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not debatable.

Mr. McDONALD. Did the Senator from Wisconsin answer to his name on the roll-call?

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Indiana is out of order.

Mr. McDONALD. If the Senator did not, then he is absent.

Mr. WHYTE. Absent without leave.

Mr. McDONALD. I submit that no Senator who is shown to be absent on the roll-call can make a motion.

Mr. CARPENTER. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will be in order. The Chair supposes a question of order may be made, even when a motion to adjourn is made.

Mr. McDONALD. I object to any motion being made by the Senator from Wisconsin, who is shown to be absent, until it is ascertained that he is present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order of the Senator from Indiana. The Senator from Wisconsin is in his seat now, and he moves to adjourn. He has not lost any right to move an adjournment because he did not answer to his name before. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CARPENTER. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WHYTE. I want to understand the ruling of the Chair, because it strikes me as somewhat novel, and I say it with great respect. Until the question is taken whether a majority of the Senate determine that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be sent for the absent Senators, a motion to adjourn is not in order. After they have so determined, and while the Sergeant-at-Arms is out, then a motion to adjourn is in order.

Mr. CARPENTER. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The opinion of the Chair remains as it was before, that a motion to adjourn is at any time in order, whether there is a quorum present or not present. If there is a quorum present, of course it is in order. If there is no quorum present, it is in order because less than a quorum may adjourn, and the Chair does not think it is necessary that the Sergeant-at-Arms should have stepped out of the Chamber on his way to request Senators to attend for a motion to adjourn to be in order which would not be in order before he left the Chamber for that purpose. The question is on the motion to adjourn, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and having called the name of Mr. BLAINE——

Mr. EATON. I hope that the call will be suspended for one moment. Rule 16 provides that—

When the yeas and nays shall be called for by one-fifth of the Senators present——

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator is out of order.

Mr. EATON. I am not out of order.

Mr. CONKLING. Entirely.

Mr. CARPENTER. He is entirely out of order.

Mr. EATON. The rule proceeds:

Each Senator, when his name is called——

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a point of order, and I call the Senator from Connecticut to order.

Mr. EATON. The Senator from Connecticut insists that he is in order in reading a rule of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. I submit to the Chair that during the roll-call the Senator is not in order.

Mr. EATON. I submit that I am.

Mr. CONKLING. Let the Chair decide that.

Mr. EATON. Very well, the Chair may decide.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point is answered by the last clause of Rule 17:

And these proceedings—

That is, the proceedings to require Senators to account for not voting—shall be had after the roll shall have been called and before the result of the vote is announced.

The Senator can raise the question, but he must wait until the roll is called through, and before the vote is announced. The Secretary will proceed with the call.

The Secretary resumed the call of the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The Secretary resumed and concluded the call of the roll.

The names of those voting were read by the Secretary, as follows:

Bayard,	Harris,	Maxey,	Walker,
Call,	Hereford,	Morrill,	Wallace,
Cockrell,	Houston,	Randolph,	Whyte,
Coke,	Jonas,	Ransom,	Withers.
Eaton,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Groome,	Kernan,	Vance,
Hampton,	McDonald,	Vest,

Mr. EATON. Before the announcement of the result I desire to call the attention of the Chair to Rules 16 and 17; and I ask that the rules be read by the Clerk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The two rules will be read.

The Secretary read Rule 16, as follows:

When the yeas and nays shall be called for by one-fifth of the Senators present, each Senator, when his name is called, shall, unless for special reasons he be excused by the Senate, declare openly and without debate his assent or dissent to the question; and in taking the yeas and nays upon any question, the names of the Senators shall be called alphabetically.

Mr. EATON. Now, I desire to call attention to the fact (and I think I was entirely right before, but I bowed submissively to the decision of the Chair) that it was my time to call attention to this rule when honorable Senators declined to vote, because the rule says that when a Senator's name is called he "shall, unless for special reasons he be excused by the Senate, declare openly," &c. I called attention to that rule when the name of the honorable Senator from Maine was called, whom I noticed in his seat and he did not respond. I also noticed very many of my friends upon the other side who have paid no attention to this rule of the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. In connection with what rule of the Senate has the Senator mentioned my name? I was not giving attention.

Mr. EATON. It has been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Rule 16.

Mr. EATON. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that that rule, I will not say has been violated, for that might be discourteous, but it has not been complied with.

Mr. BLAINE. If it is not imposing on the good nature of the Senator, I should like to hear the rule read again.

Mr. CARPENTER. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the Senator's point of order?

Mr. CARPENTER. The point of order is that there is no business pending before the Senate except the announcement of the vote taken by yeas and nays. The Senator from Connecticut makes no motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order. These two rules must be taken together. Rule 16——

Mr. CARPENTER. Do I understand the Chair to overrule the point of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARPENTER. I appeal from that decision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator state his point of order distinctly again? Let it be distinctly made.

Mr. CARPENTER. It was the point of order which was overruled by the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin, as the Chair understood, made the point of order that the Senator from Connecticut could not call the attention of the Chair to these two rules with a view to their execution, because there was a call of the yeas and nays pending, the result of which had not been announced. Was that not the point?

Mr. CARPENTER. That was not the point at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Chair wishes to hear what it was.

Mr. CARPENTER. The point of order was that the Senator from Connecticut had made no motion whatever. He had called the attention of the Chair to a rule. The attention of the Chair is supposed always to be directed to every rule there is in force. That is all the Senator from Connecticut did. He made no motion; he did not move to expel the Senator from Maine, or attach him, or to send him to jail, or anything else. Consequently, by calling the attention of the Chair to the rule he had done nothing more than was vivid in the mind of the Chair all the while; and the next business is to declare the result of the roll-call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the Senator from Connecticut called attention to Rules 16 and 17 and asked that they be read, as the Chair understood with a view of proceeding under those rules. The Secretary read Rule 16. It is necessary that we should understand what these rules mean. The Chair is not of opinion that the Senator from Connecticut was out of order in calling attention to these rules.

Mr. CARPENTER. The Chair will pardon me, I did not claim that he was, but after he got through and had taken his seat and had made no motion whatever, I then insisted that the next thing was to have the result of the roll-call declared.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reason why the Senator from Connecticut made no motion, the Chair supposes, is that the Senator intended to submit whether it was the duty of the Chair to require a Senator to vote or whether it required a motion of the Senate.

Mr. CARPENTER. He did not submit anything.

Mr. BLAINE. I heard my name called by the honorable Senator from Connecticut. I imagined I was the victim of something, but I do not know what.

Mr. HARRIS. I rise to object to this discussion unless it is ruled to be in order, and I maintain that it is not in order.

Mr. BLAINE. If a Senator has been guilty of disorder and is called to account for that, it is not lawful to send him to prison without signifying the charge laid against him. I have a right to hear it.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must answer the proposition of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BLAINE. What is the proposition of the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CARPENTER. If the Chair will allow me, I rise to a point of order. Does the Chair sustain the point of order or overrule it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin will take his seat, and the Chair will state what is the question. The Chair understands the Senator from Connecticut to submit the question, he having brought to the attention of the Chair the fact that the Senator from Maine was here and did not vote, whether the Chair has the power and it is the duty of the Chair to require the Senator to assign his reasons for not voting under Rule 16? The Chair was about to state that, in the opinion of the Chair, a Senator cannot be required to assign his reasons without a vote of the Senate requiring him to do so. If the Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senator from Maine be required to assign his reasons, that will be perfectly in order at this time before the announcement of the result of the roll-call.

Mr. EATON. That was not the motion that I proposed to make. I called the attention of the Chair to the sixteenth and seventeenth rules; first the sixteenth rule. I think I was entirely right in insisting that the roll-call should cease when I first discovered that my honorable friend from Maine had not voted. Rule 16 provides that—

When the yeas and nays shall be called for by one-fifth of the Senators present, each Senator, when his name is called, shall, unless for special reasons he be excused by the Senate, declare openly and without debate his assent or dissent to the question—

Then, not afterward, at the time when his name is called—and in taking the yeas and nays upon any question the names of the Senators shall be called alphabetically.

The proposition that I wish to call to the attention of the Chair is this: Is it not the duty of the Chair that again under Rule 16 the names of the gentlemen who declined to vote be called?

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator misconstrues the rule. The rule is that a Senator shall vote at that time and that he shall not get up at some other time in an irregular manner and vote; but it is not compulsory upon him to vote.

Mr. EATON. It is, in my judgment, compulsory.

Mr. BLAINE. He shall not disturb the proceedings of the body by coming in at some irregular and odd time, but shall come in then. But the rule does not say that it is his duty to come in. Suppose I did not want to vote?

Mr. CONKLING. What is the question on which this debate proceeds?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This debate——

Mr. BLAINE. I want to ask the honorable Senator, with the permission of the President of the Senate, how you are going to construe a pair under that rigid enforcement of the rule? The Senator from Connecticut gets up very often and says he is paired with a certain Senator, and he declines to vote. Now, as he construes the rule, he is forced to vote; he shall vote.

Mr. EATON. Not very often do I make a pair.

Mr. BLAINE. But a great many Senators pair. Now, how does the Senator construe that with his rigid construction of the rule at the present time? Does not the Senator see that my construction of the rule harmonizes with the liberty of pairing, and his does not?

Mr. EATON. I do not think that that argument is strong, but still I will make my motion in accordance with the opinion of the Chair, surrendering my own opinion. I will read the seventeenth rule:

When a Senator, being present and declining to vote when his name is called, shall be required to assign his reasons therefor, and shall so assign them, the presiding officer shall thereupon submit the question to the Senate: "Shall the Senator, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting?" which shall be decided without debate.

Therefore, I now move that the Senator from Maine be required to assign his reasons for not voting.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his question of order.

Mr. CONKLING. I submit that that motion is not in order, because the last vote taken in the Senate disclosed the absence of a quorum, and the rule declares that in that state of case no motion is in order except a motion to adjourn. I submit to the Chair that the absence of a quorum having been disclosed, and there being no motion possible under the rules save a motion to adjourn, the motion now proposed by the Senator from Connecticut is out of order.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This question is not debatable. The Chair overrules the point of order made by the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, respectfully.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York appeals.

Mr. WHYTE. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know what I am going to vote on, or whether I am to be permitted to vote? In the first place the Senator from Connecticut——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend; no debate is in order. A motion is made to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. BLAINE. What is the appeal from?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The appeal is from the decision of the Chair overruling the point of order made by the Senator from New York.

Mr. BLAINE. And what was the point of order made by the Senator from New York?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator must recollect.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no. I have a right to inquire that from the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point made by the Senator from New York was that no motion was in order now but a motion to adjourn or for a call of the Senate, as on a previous call there had not been a quorum voting. The Chair has overruled that point of order, and now an appeal is taken, and a motion is made to lay the appeal on the table, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. CARPENTER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I took an appeal from the decision of the Chair a few moments ago, and the Chair ordered me to sit down, but what becomes of my appeal?

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator took it down with him. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (to the Secretary.) Call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when Mr. BECK'S name was called.] I make the announcement that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] was compelled to go home, and is paired on all questions with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER.]

Mr. BLAINE, (when his name was called.) As this decision affects my right, does the Presiding Officer rule that I have a right to vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has a right to vote. This is not a question affecting him.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I believe I will not vote. [Laughter.]

The Secretary resumed and concluded the call of the roll; and the result was announced—yeas 26, nays 0; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bayard,	Harris,	McDonald,	Voorhees,
Call,	Hereford,	Morgan,	Walker,
Cockrell,	Houston,	Randolph,	Wallace,
Coke,	Jonas,	Ransom,	Whyte,
Eaton,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,	Withers.
Garland,	Kernan,	Vance,
Hampton,	Lamar,	Vest,

NAYS—0.

ABSENT—50.

Allison,	Chandler,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,
Anthony,	Conkling,	Hoar,	Platt,
Bailey,	Davis of Illinois,	Ingalls,	Plumb,
Beck,	Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Rollins,
Bell,	Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Saunders,
Booth,	Farley,	Kirkwood,	Sharon,
Bruce,	Ferry,	Logan,	Teller,
Burnside,	Gordon,	McMillan,	Thurman,
Butler,	Groome,	McPherson,	Williams,
Cameron of Pa.,	Grover,	Maxey,	Windom.
Cameron of Wis.,	Hamlin,	Morrill,
Carpenter,	Hill of Colorado,	Paddock,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No quorum has voted.

Mr. CONKLING. What becomes of the appeal, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not decided.

Mr. CONKLING. Then it is debatable, is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The appeal remains unacted on, on the table, no quorum voting.

Mr. CONKLING. Then an appeal from the decision of the Chair is debatable, is it not?

Mr. HARRIS. Pending a motion to lay on the table it is certainly not debatable, I should say.

Mr. CONKLING. That will not do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All the Chair can now do is to order a call of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. How can the Chair order a call of the Senate while an appeal from the decision of the Chair is pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That appeal is on the question of order, and the roll discloses that there is no quorum; so that the Chair shall forthwith order a call of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. But I believe I have a right to submit this to the Chair: A call of the Senate was proceeding. The Chair allowed the Senator from Connecticut to interpose this motion. A point of order was raised. The Chair held that despite the rule that motion was in order. From that decision an appeal was taken. There the right of debate existed. The Senator from Maryland, to cut off that right, moved to lay that appeal on the table. That motion fails. Now if the Chair were right in entertaining the original motion or in making the ruling, have we not a right to debate the appeal from that decision?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will understand, the Senator from Connecticut could make a motion that the Senator from Maine should be required to state his reason for not voting; but the Chair has not decided that less than a majority of a quorum could decide that it should be required at all. The Chair has only decided that that motion was in order, overruling the point of order made by the Senator from New York. From that decision an appeal was taken. A motion was made to lay the appeal upon the table non constat, because there was no quorum voting on the previous occasion, that there would not be a quorum when the yeas and nays were called on the motion to lay on the table. Now the call discloses a want of a quorum, and all the Chair can do is to order a call of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask a question of the Chair? Has the Chair ever a right to make a decision from which a Senator has not a right to appeal?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In respect to what?

Mr. CONKLING. In respect to anything.

Mr. WHYTE. Under Rule 2 he has positively.

Mr. CONKLING. In respect to anything, I do not care what. Is not the right of appeal just as broad as the right to decide a question of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Rule 2 says:

If either at the commencement of any daily session of the Senate, or at any time during its daily sessions, a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the presiding officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll of Senators, and shall announce the result to the Senate.

In the opinion of the Chair that is a peremptory duty of the President of the Senate, and no appeal from his direction to the Secretary to call the roll can be taken.

Mr. CONKLING. I submitted a question to the President of the Senate in the form of a point of order; I understood the Chair to overrule it; and may I now inquire what call of the Senate is to proceed? Is it that call in the midst of which we were when this motion interrupted it, or is it a new call of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a call of the Senate because it appears there is no quorum present.

Mr. CONKLING. Then it is to be a new call of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed with the call.

Mr. CONKLING. With which call? I believe we have a right to know.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be a new call, certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Then what becomes of the other call?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That we will inquire of when the time comes.

Mr. CONKLING. I make the point of order at this time that the Chair has no right to dismiss the proceedings under the other call of the Senate without a vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will come to order.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask a question of the Chair?

Mr. CONKLING. What becomes of my point of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is overruled.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has already stated that from the order of the Chair to the Secretary to call the roll when no quorum appears, there can be no appeal.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not appeal from that decision. I appeal from the decision of the Chair that he has a right to dismiss the pending call of the Senate without a vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has dismissed nothing.

Mr. CONKLING. Then what becomes of the other call?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When a quorum of the Senate is present we shall find out.

Mr. CONKLING. I propose to find out now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed to call the roll.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to ask a question of the Chair, if I may, to ascertain in regard to my vote, what has become of the perfection of the roll-call upon the motion which was interrupted by the reading of the rule by the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to know what has become of that.

Mr. BAYARD. That was a question raised. The roll-call had proceeded——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will answer the Senator. A vote was being taken, and certain Senators did not vote. The Senator from Connecticut moved that one of them, naming him, be required to give his reasons for not voting. The Senator from New York made the point of order that that motion could not be made because, not the vote not yet announced, but the last preceding vote, showed no quorum present; that is, no quorum voting. The Chair overruled that point of order. The Senator from New York appealed from the decision of the Chair. Then the motion was made to lay the appeal on the table. On that the yeas and nays were ordered, and the vote was 26 yeas and no nays, showing a want of a quorum. Under those circumstances, although there was not a quorum at a previous vote, it did not follow that there would not be a quorum then; and the Chair sees nothing for it to do but to order a new call of the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. May I state one fact? My desire is that it should be understood that these are the rules of the Senate, and I am sure that the personal respect of each Senator will induce him to obey them according to his conscience. I remember very well when these Rules 16 and 17 were put in force upon myself and by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] who then occupied the chair. I was present in the Senate and my name being called I did not respond. The fact was brought to the attention of the Chair.

Mr. CONKLING. Is this debate in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is trying to get the ear of the Senator from Delaware to say to him that if this debate proceeds it must be by unanimous consent.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to make a statement because it will render the point of order clear.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no objection if we have the same right; I do object unless we have.

Mr. BAYARD. I thought the Senator had been arguing his own motion.

Mr. CONKLING. Not at all; I have simply been making a point of order. If the Senator from Delaware is going to be heard I insist on the same right. Otherwise I object.

Mr. HARRIS. I rise to a question of order, which I will state. The Senate proceeding to decide a question that it was competent for less than a quorum to decide, a question of order was raised by the Senator from Wisconsin I believe, which the Senator from Maryland moved to lay on the table. I maintain that it was competent for less than a quorum to determine that question of order, and I maintain that the vote of 26 yeas and no nays upon the motion of the Senator from Maryland was a decision of that question of order by laying the appeal on the table.

Mr. CARPENTER. It was not laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] is not well taken.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, I want to see if I understand the question so that I can vote understandingly. The Senate was proceeding with business and found itself without a quorum on a vote. Then there was a call of the House; it proceeded until a gentleman moved to have certain members called to account for not voting. A point of order was raised which the Chair overruled. The Senator from New York appealed, and a motion is made to lay that appeal upon the table. If I have stated the case correctly the last vote was upon the motion to lay upon the table, and that was a business motion that required a quorum to carry it there. It cannot be carried by anything less than a quorum, and there was no quorum on that vote; and therefore under the rule it was the duty of the Chair to call the roll.

Mr. CONKLING. What becomes of the other call?

Mr. HOUSTON. The other call is in the rear, because it cannot be reached. The Senator's motion has got in front and has to be gotten out of the way before we can go back to the other call of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. "If two ride a horse, one must ride behind."

Mr. HOUSTON. I rather think so, and that is just what I want the Senator to do, to ride behind.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair wishes it understood this discussion is proceeding only by unanimous consent.

Mr. CARPENTER, (at seven o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. BLAINE. I know it is not, but I rise to a point of order; there is a motion pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There has been business since the last motion to adjourn.

Mr. BLAINE. But a motion is pending before the Senate and it was on that motion that the Senator from Connecticut arrested the proceeding of the Senate.

Mr. CARPENTER. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine is out of order and will take his seat. There has been business before the Senate since the last vote, and it does not matter that on a former occasion a motion was made to adjourn.

Mr. BLAINE. One single remark. I do not possess much knowledge of parliamentary law, but I think it will be novel in the history of parliamentary bodies that two motions to adjourn were pending before us at the same moment of time and ruled to be both in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin has moved that the Senate do now adjourn. The question is on that motion.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 19, noes 21.

Mr. CARPENTER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I wish to withdraw my vote if I can. I would like to state for the RECORD that I voted out of misapprehension. [Laughter.]

The result was announced—yea 1, nays 23; as follows:

YEA—1.

Burnside.

NAYS—23.

Bayard,	Harris,	McDonald,	Vance,
Call,	Hereford,	Maxey,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Houston,	Morgan,	Walker,
Garland,	Jonas,	Randolph,	Whyte,
Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,	Withers.
Hampton,	Kernan,	Slater,

ABSENT—52.

Allison,	Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton.
Anthony,	Conkling,	Hoar,	Platt,
Bailey,	Davis of Illinois,	Ingalls,	Plumb,
Beck,	Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Rollins,

Cameron of Wis.,	Grover,	McPherson,	Wallace,
Carpenter,	Hamlin,	Morrill,	Williams,
Chandler,	Hill of Colorado,	Paddock,	Windom.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. WHYTE. Now, Mr. President, I believe the motion I made is in order and is still pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion made by the Senator from Maryland to request the attendance of the absentees.

Mr. CONKLING. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise now to a point of order, and I submit to the Chair that the only roll-call in order is the roll-call which has been ordered by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is disclosed that there is not a quorum present. Less than a quorum may request the attendance of absentees. The Chair overrules the point of order, and will now put the question on the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. CONKLING. Let the record show that the Chair overrules it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 0; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Bayard,	Hampton,	McDonald,	Walker,
Call,	Hereford,	Randolph,	Whyte,
Cockrell,	Houston,	Ransom,	Withers.
Davis of Illinois,	Jonas,	Slater,

Chandler,	Hill of Georgia,	Paddock,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order is made and the Sergeant-at-Arms will now proceed to request the presence of the absentees.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that no business has intervened since the last motion to adjourn.

Mr. BLAINE. This business just done has intervened.

Mr. WHYTE. I raise the point of order that the call discloses the absence of the Senator from Maine. He has been sent for and until the Sergeant-at-Arms reports where he is, he has no right to be here.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator reports himself.

Mr. WHYTE. He cannot report himself. He is in contempt of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask a parliamentary question of the Chair? The last vote being an order that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall invite absent Senators, does the Chair rule that a motion to adjourn is not in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule is that—

Whenever it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of the absent Senators, which order shall be determined without debate; and, pending its execution, and until a quorum shall be present, no motion, except a motion to adjourn, nor debate, shall be in order.

Mr. CONKLING. Exactly. Is not a motion to adjourn in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to adjourn is in order pending the execution of the order.

Mr. CARPENTER. I make that motion.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Wisconsin has submitted that motion, and I demand the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. WHYTE. I raise the point of order that the Sergeant-at-Arms has been directed to ask the attendance of that absent Senator, and he has no right to be constructively present and make motions to adjourn, until it is reported whether he is present or absent.

Mr. CARPENTER. I escaped from the Sergeant-at-Arms and got into the Chamber before he got out. [Laughter.] Now I move that the Senate adjourn. I understand the Chair to rule that motion to be in order.

Mr. WHYTE. It is not in order from that Senator.

Mr. CONKLING. How does the Chair rule?

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I desire to say one word.

Mr. CONKLING. Is this question of order debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been debated a good deal.

Mr. EATON. Suggestions have been made. I do not desire to debate.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not care to object to my honorable friend.

Mr. CARPENTER. I call for the rule on my motion to adjourn, and ask the Chair to decide whether it is in order or out.

Mr. EATON. Whenever Senators are absent and the Sergeant-at-Arms is directed to produce those gentlemen on the floor of the Senate, they are to be produced here by him, and until he brings them here they are constructively absent.

Mr. BLAINE. Then, Mr. President, if I understand the Senator from Connecticut, nobody can make a motion until the President of the Senate looks on that list to see if he answered to that call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that under the rule the motion to adjourn is in order, and it will be put.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BELL, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] Otherwise I should vote "yea."

Mr. CHANDLER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. BOOTH, (when Mr. FARLEY'S name was called.) I wish to state in justice to my colleague, [Mr. FARLEY,] that he has been called home by very important business.

Mr. MCMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired on all political questions with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.] I understand this to be a political question, and I would vote "yea" if Mr. MCPHERSON were here, and he, I presume, would vote "nay."

Mr. HEREFORD. Do I understand from the Senator from Minnesota that it is a political question here to break a quorum of the Senate?

Mr. CARPENTER. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. CONKLING. I call the Senator from West Virginia to order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call will proceed.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. President——

Mr. CONKLING. I call the Senator to order.

Mr. HEREFORD. I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator cannot interrupt the roll-call.

Mr. HEREFORD. It has already been interrupted.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the call of the roll.

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—14.

Blaine,	Conkling,	Kirkwood,	Rollins,
Booth,	Davis of Illinois,	Logan,	Windom.
Burnside,	Dawes,	Morrill,
Carpenter,	Ferry,	Platt,

NAYS—25.

Call,	Harris,	McDonald,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Hereford,	Maxey,	Walker,
Davis of W. Va.,	Houston,	Morgan,	Whyte,
Eaton,	Jonas,	Randolph,	Withers.
Garland,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Groome,	Kernan,	Slater,
Hampton,	Lamar,	Vance,

ABSENT—37.

Allison,	Chandler,	Ingalls,	Saunders,
Anthony,	Coke,	Johnston,	Sharon,
Bailey,	Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Teller,
Bayard,	Farley,	Kellogg,	Thurman,
Beck,	Gordon,	McMillan,	Voorhees,
Bell,	Grover,	McPherson,	Wallace,
Bruce,	Hamlin,	Paddock,	Williams.
Butler,	Hill of Colorado,	Pendleton,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Georgia,	Plumb,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Saulsbury,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is disagreed to; the Senate refuses to adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. A quorum has voted. Mr. President, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with and on that motion demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. Is not that done by general consent when the presence of a quorum is disclosed? [Oh, no.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No general consent was given. The Secretary will proceed with the call.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask unanimous consent that proceedings be dispensed with.

Mr. KERNAN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call will proceed.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MCMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] on all political questions. If this is a political question I shall refrain from voting. If he were here, I should vote "yea." I do not know whether the question is regarded as political or not.

The roll-call was concluded; and the result was announced—yeas 4, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—4.

Davis of Illinois,	Eaton,	Morrill,	Windom.

NAYS—22.

Bayard,	Hereford,	Lamar,	Vest,
Call,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,	Walker,
Cockrell,	Houston,	Randolph,	Whyte,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Ransom,	Withers.
Hampton,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Harris,	Kernan,	Vance,

ABSENT—50.

Allison,	Beck,	Booth,	Butler,
Anthony,	Bell,	Bruce,	Cameron of Pa.,
Bailey,	Blaine,	Burnside,	Cameron of Wis.,

Carpenter,	Groome,	Logan,	Saulsbury,
Chandler,	Grover,	McDonald,	Saunders,
Coke,	Hamlin,	McMillan,	Sharon,
Conkling,	Hill of Colorado,	McPherson,	Teller,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Maxey,	Thurman,
Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Paddock,	Voorhees,
Farley,	Johnston,	Pendleton,	Wallace,
Ferry,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt,	Williams.
Garland,	Kellogg,	Plumb,
Gordon,	Kirkwood,	Rollins,

Mr. CARPENTER. Is there a quorum voting?

Mr. WHYTE. Has the Sergeant-at-Arms reported?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not require a quorum to vote on this question. The Sergeant-at-Arms will execute the order of the Senate, or, if he is ready to report, will report.

Mr. CARPENTER, (at eight o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) Mr. President, it is now after eight o'clock, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WHYTE. I object, and make the point of order that the Sergeant-at-Arms having been sent for the absent Senators, a Senator not voting is not entitled to stand in his seat and move an adjournment until a report is made by the Sergeant.

Mr. CONKLING. This is the third time the point has been made; and it has been twice overruled.

Mr. WHYTE. I shall make the point again whenever a motion is made by the Senator from Wisconsin until he is reported by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. BLAINE. Then a Senator cannot come in the Senate Chamber himself, but must come escorted by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. WHYTE. I say that he must be excused by the Senate.

Mr. CARPENTER. I rise to a point of order. I have made a motion to adjourn, which is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland raised a point of order, and that is always in order unless the Senate is dividing. The Senate was not dividing, so the Senator from Maryland was in order.

Mr. CARPENTER. If that is the decision of the Chair, I appeal from it.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President——

Mr. WHYTE. I make the point of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that the Senate do now adjourn. Everything turns, if the Chair may be permitted to say it, upon the question whether business has intervened since the last motion to adjourn. The Chair is compelled to say that, in the opinion of the Chair, a motion to dispense with further proceedings under the rule is business, and therefore the motion to adjourn is in order.

Mr. CARPENTER. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this motion the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON] on political subjects. This seems to be a political question, and I will not vote. I would vote "yea" if he were here.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BAILEY. I am paired on all political questions with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. PADDOCK.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 3, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—3.

Booth,	Davis of Illinois,	Windom.

NAYS—24.

Bayard,	Hereford,	Lamar,	Slater,
Call,	Hill of Georgia,	Maxey,	Vance,
Davis of W. Va.,	Houston,	Morgan,	Vest,
Eaton,	Jonas,	Pendleton,	Walker,
Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Randolph,	Whyte,
Hampton,	Kernan,	Ransom,	Withers.

ABSENT—49.

Allison,	Cockrell,	Hoar,	Plumb,
Anthony,	Coke,	Ingalls,	Rollins,
Bailey,	Conkling,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,
Bell,	Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Sharon,
Blaine,	Farley,	Kirkwood,	Teller,
Bruce,	Ferry,	Logan,	Thurman,
Burnside,	Garland,	McDonald,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Gordon,	McMillan,	Wallace,
Cameron of Pa.,	Grover,	McPherson,	Williams.
Cameron of Wis.,	Hamlin,	Morrill,
Carpenter,	Harris,	Paddock,
Chandler,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is not in order.

Mr. McMILLAN. May I inquire why?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order because the rule forbids all motions except a motion to adjourn.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think since that motion was made a vote on a motion to adjourn showed a quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A roll-call was ordered by the Senate, and it must be proceeded with unless overridden by a motion to adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. Or to dispense with further proceedings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Or to dispense with further proceedings.

Mr. CONKLING. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms informs the Chair he is ready to make his report.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the President of the Senate:

SIR: In obedience to the order of the Senate in regard to absent Senators, I would respectfully report that of the Senators reported absent by the Secretary I found present in the Senate the following, to wit:

Senators Bell, Blaine, Booth, Burnside, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Davis of West Virginia, Dawes, Eaton, Ferry, Harris, Jones of Florida, Kirkwood, Logan, McMillan, Morgan, Morrill, Platt, Rollins, Vance, Vest, Voorhees, and Withers.

R. J. BRIGHT,
Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I rise to inquire, since the Sergeant-at-Arms over his own signature has assured the Senate that I am here, and the Senator from Wisconsin, with others, is it now in order for a motion to come from any of us, against the point of order made by the Senator from Maryland? In other words, does that fact release us from the embargo under which the Senator from Maryland has been placing us all? I want to know another thing, whether I am a Senator from Maine or an embassador from Maine? [Laughter.]

Mr. WITHERS. I wish to make a statement simply that the report of the Sergeant-at-Arms is incorrect as far as I am concerned. I have not been reported absent.

Mr. CONKLING. This is out of order, Mr. President. I move that further proceedings under this call of the Senate be dispensed with.

Mr. EATON. I hope that my friend will withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly I will if the Senator from Connecticut wishes to say anything.

Mr. EATON. I simply want to say this: I am found by the report of the Sergeant-at-Arms in very good company generally, that of my friend from New York, my friend from Maine, and my friend from Wisconsin; but I should like to have that report amended, because I am not willing to be found with them in violation of the rules of the Senate, and therefore I desire my name erased, as I have not been out of the Chamber.

Mr. CONKLING. I am sorry I gave way to the Senator from Connecticut, because of the unkindness of his observation, and because of the fact that he has been absent just as much as any of us, and I object to his complaining standing in with the rest under the action of his party. Now I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. ALLISON. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. VEST. I wish to make an inquiry. I should like to know whether that report states that I am absent when I have voted on every question this evening? I have a right to make that inquiry.

Mr. CONKLING. Not now. If the Senator wants to discipline the Sergeant-at-Arms, he can do it some other time but not now, I submit.

Mr. McMILLAN. If that inquiry is in order, I should like to make an inquiry of the same character, for I am present and my pair has been announced on almost every vote. I have been present all the evening.

Mr. CONKLING. The whole report is a mistake, evidently.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Sergeant-at-Arms has a right to amend his report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was on the point of stating that if the Senator rose to a question of privilege of this kind, to have the report corrected, he might do so, although probably the right time to do so would be to-morrow, if this report goes into the Journal, because then you can have the Journal corrected; but if there is no objection, it can be done now.

Mr. ALLISON. There will certainly be no objection.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope it will be corrected in reference to myself. I have been present all the evening.

Mr. ALLISON. I am present also.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The record is not to be corrected in that way, by gentlemen saying they were not absent when they do not answer to their names.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I voted under a misapprehension, but I voted nevertheless; and yet I am reported absent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, shall further proceedings under this call be dispensed with?

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Now, Mr. President, I wish to say a word. I noticed in the list which was handed in by the Sergeant-at-Arms that the Senator from West Virginia was stated to be absent. I have not been out of the Chamber nor missed a call I think to-night. I think that ought to be corrected. I call attention to it now.

Mr. CONKLING. That is the case with me; I believe it is with all of us.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. CONKLING. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The roll-calls disclose that on many calls the Senator from New York was not present so far as the roll was concerned. That is not the case with the Senator from West Virginia. He has answered to his name every time. Some of the calls the Senator from New York did not answer.

Mr. CONKLING. That is, the Senator thinks I omitted to vote. That is possible; it may be so; but I have been here all the time.

Mr. CARPENTER, (at eight o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CARPENTER called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BELL, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MCMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] on all political questions. If he were here, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay," as this seems to be a political question.

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. COKE.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (when Mr. THURMAN'S name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BURNSIDE. My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] My colleague, if he were here, would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Allison,	Davis of Illinois,	Kirkwood,	Rollins,
Blaine,	Dawes,	Logan,	Windom.
Burnside,	Ferry,	Morrill,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Paddock,
Conkling,	Ingalls,	Platt,

NAYS—27.

Bailey,	Hampton,	Kernan,	Slater,
Bayard,	Harris,	Lamar,	Vance,
Call,	Hereford,	Maxey,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,	Walker,
Davis of W. Va.,	Houston,	Pendleton,	Whyte,
Eaton,	Jonas,	Randolph,	Withers.
Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,

ABSENT—32.

Anthony,	Chandler,	Hoar,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Coke,	Johnston,	Saunders,
Bell,	Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Booth,	Farley,	Kellogg,	Teller,
Bruce,	Garland,	McDonald,	Thurman.
Butler,	Gordon,	McMillan,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Pa.,	Grover,	McPherson,	Wallace,
Carpenter,	Hamlin,	Plumb,	Williams.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to inquire of the Chair what is the pending motion and what has become of the question pending before the Senate when the absence of a quorum was disclosed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will endeavor to find out what that question is. The Chair will consult the Journal and see.

Mr. WHYTE. The presence of a quorum having been disclosed, a motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call was adopted, and then a motion to adjourn was made.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, what has become of the motion pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state what the pending motion is. There was a vote taken in the Senate that has never yet been announced, which was on a motion to adjourn. Before the announcement of that vote the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] moved, under Rule 17, that the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] be required to give his reasons for not voting, he being present in the Senate; and that was followed by other motions for a call of the Senate and to dispense with the call. The last unfinished business is the motion of the Senator from Connecticut to require the Senator from Maine to give the reasons why he did not vote.

Mr. BLAINE. I have understood that heretofore Senators have been called on to give reasons why they were not voting upon a pending question. Now, according to the ruling of the Chair, I am called upon to give reasons why I did not vote on a motion that is not now before the Senate and which has never been submitted and which has been stamped out by three or four intervening motions that have since occurred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair may be in error.

Mr. BLAINE. If that is in order, I am willing to take the record and ask why all the absent Senators on the yeas and nays that have been taken since the session began this morning or yesterday—for I have the same right—did not vote. I may want to know why they did not cast their votes, and why they did not come forward and answer to their names. I have the same right to do it exactly. I do not care. That is not because it has any reference to the question, but I do not like to see the Senate, which has been sometimes called a dignified body—although that could not be proved by me within the last two hours—guilty of so obvious an absurdity as the motion of the Senator from Connecticut would lead to. I could discuss it with perfect sang froid because there is nothing in it that I am not willing to discuss, but the motion itself, if the Senator were in his seat, I should say was entirely absurd.

Mr. WHYTE. He is here.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I can say it as the Senator is within hearing. The motion itself is absurd. With all due respect to the Senator, it was absurd when made. There are some very few—I will admit very few—questions settled in parliamentary law, but one of those is that nothing shall interrupt a roll-call.

Mr. ALLISON. It was merely an inquiry.

Mr. BLAINE. There is no possible thing that can interrupt a roll-call.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not happen to be present in the Senate at the moment, but I understood there was only an inquiry.

Mr. BLAINE. There was a roll-call of the Senate solemnly interrupted to inquire why I did not vote.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BLAINE. Why was that? Am I on trial at the bar of the Senate?

Mr. HARRIS. Is there a debatable question before the Senate?

Mr. BLAINE. You will find it is susceptible of very considerable debate.

Mr. HARRIS. But I inquired of the Chair first to say. I am inclined to think there is no question before the Senate that is debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would seem to be necessarily debatable or to lead to debate, for the rule is that—

When a Senator, being present and declining to vote when his name is called, shall be required to assign his reasons therefor, and shall so assign them.

Mr. BLAINE. I will give the reasons. I want to give those reasons, and I am glad that I have got, with a quorum of the Senate here, the right to the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that since the Chair announced that that was the question before the Senate, upon looking into the Journal he finds that the question which was pending, and upon which the Senator did not vote, was different from what the Chair supposed. It was on a motion to adjourn. It has been disclosed and announced since that, and it would be a very singular proceeding now if the Senator could be required to vote on a motion to adjourn, and when his vote might have carried an adjournment, the Senate had been doing business for an hour afterward. The Chair——

Mr. BLAINE. The Chair is anticipating my speech.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend. That being the case, it being upon a motion to adjourn in view of what has taken place since, the opinion of the Chair is that the motion has fallen and is not now before the Senate. Then the question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALLISON. That I think we had better do.

Mr. BLAINE. Then there is nothing left for me to debate at this point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Nothing at all.

Mr. BLAINE. The honorable Presiding Officer of the Senate made my speech.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to go into executive session is not debatable.

Mr. BLAINE. The question is not debatable?

Mr. CONKLING. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. What motion is not debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to go into executive session is not debatable. That is the motion pending.

Mr. BLAINE. Then the decision of the Chair is—I want to get at this accurately—that a motion to adjourn can be arrested by a point of order being made that a Senator shall vote on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is out of order.

Mr. BLAINE. On what ground?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Because the motion to go into executive session is not debatable.

Mr. BLAINE. But nobody has made a motion since this question came up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending motion.

Mr. BLAINE. How does that happen?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was a motion made by the Senator from Michigan to proceed to the consideration of executive business, on which the call of the roll disclosed the want of a quorum.

Mr. ALLISON, (at eight o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) Pending that I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask whether any business has intervened. That was the last motion voted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If so, the motion is not in order.

Mr. CARPENTER. Well, let us go into executive session.

Mr. BLAINE. I understood that a motion was pending to proceed to executive business, and certainly it is in order pending that motion——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion to proceed to executive business was pending before the motion to adjourn was made. The motion now is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MCMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.] If he were here, I would vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 4, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—4.

Allison,	Burnside,	Ferry,	Kirkwood.

NAYS—26.

Bailey,	Hampton,	Kernan,	Vance,
Bayard,	Harris,	McDonald,	Vest,
Call,	Hereford,	Maxey,	Walker,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,	Whyte,
Eaton,	Houston,	Randolph,	Withers.
Garland,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,

ABSENT—46.

Anthony,	Coke,	Johnston,	Rollins,
Beck,	Conkling,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,
Bell,	Davis of Illinois,	Kellogg,	Saunders,
Blaine,	Dawes,	Lamar,	Sharon,
Booth,	Edmunds,	Logan,	Teller,
Bruce,	Farley,	McMillan,	Thurman,
Butler,	Gordon,	McPherson,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Pa.,	Grover,	Morgan,	Wallace,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hamlin,	Morrill,	Williams,
Carpenter,	Hill of Colorado,	Paddock,	Windom.
Chandler,	Hoar,	Platt,
Cockrell,	Ingalls,	Plumb,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish to say that in obedience to the instructions of the Appropriations Committee I have endeavored to progress this bill——

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the question of order?

Mr. CONKLING. It is this: a call of the roll of the Senate having disclosed the absence of a quorum nothing is in order of business or of motion except a motion to call the Senate or a motion to adjourn; and I object to the Senator from Virginia debating when there is nothing before the Senate.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, I simply say that I propose to make a motion, and until I submit that motion the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. CONKLING. I submit to the Chair that no business is in order until a quorum is present. I ask the Chair to rule on that.

Mr. WITHERS. I claim the right, being in possession of the floor, to make a motion.

Mr. CONKLING. Very well; I make the point of order.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish to make a remark relative to that motion before I submit it. If the decision of the Chair is that I cannot proceed, very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the point of order is insisted upon the Chair will have to sustain it.

Mr. WITHERS. I have made no motion yet, but I propose to submit a motion. I proposed to make that motion when I was interrupted by the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. I object to the Senator doing anything except making a motion to adjourn, and I insist upon my point of order.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator's objection will not prevent me making my motion, as the Chair has ruled that it is in order. I simply propose to make a motion, in view of the fact that the effort to secure the dispatch of business has failed, that the minority of the body have by their filibustering procedure obstructed business to such a degree——

Mr. CONKLING. Now, I call the Senator to order, and I insist that I have a right to a ruling on my point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has already ruled it.

Mr. WITHERS. The ruling has already been made.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Chair rule that it is in order for a Senator to stand here to debate and talk about filibustering?

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator from New York has done the same thing half a dozen times——

Mr. CONKLING. I call the Senator to order, and I insist upon it that debate is out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is not debatable.

Mr. CONKLING. Why does not the Chair rule on the point of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has ruled on it twice.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the ruling of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That the Senator from Virginia was not in order to debate, but to make a motion.

Mr. CONKLING. Very well, then I ask the Chair to enforce the rule.

Mr. WITHERS. I was not debating. I respectfully submit that I have a right to precede my motion by an explanation——

Mr. CARPENTER. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. WITHERS. I therefore say that we cannot procure action by a quorum. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CARPENTER. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. WITHERS. I have moved an adjournment.

Mr. CONKLING. Ah, well, that is all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Did the Senator from Virginia make a motion?

Several SENATORS. He moved to adjourn.

Mr. WITHERS. I withdraw the motion in view of the opposition to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Several SENATORS. He has withdrawn it.

Mr. ALLISON. I renew it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the question before the Senate, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no quorum voting.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The only thing in order is a call of the Senate or a motion to adjourn. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll; and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Dawes,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Bailey,	Eaton,	Jones of Florida,	Rollins,
Bayard,	Ferry,	Kernan,	Slater,
Bell,	Garland,	McDonald,	Thurman,
Blaine,	Groome,	McMillan,	Vance,
Call,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Vest,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harris,	Morrill,	Walker,
Carpenter,	Hereford,	Paddock,	Windom,
Chandler,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,	Withers.
Conkling,	Houston,	Platt,
Davis of W. Va.,	Ingalls,	Randolph,

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WHYTE in the chair.) The call of the Senate discloses forty-two Senators present; consequently a quorum.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, it seems now that there is a quorum present; and I think, in view of the fact that it is after nine o'clock and that the Senator from Virginia was inclined to move an adjournment a few moments ago, we had better on all sides agree to adjourn. I am quite satisfied that we can proceed more rapidly with the real business in hand by adjourning now than by remaining here any longer. Therefore I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. With the general understanding—no bargain—that to-morrow we sit the bill out.

Mr. CONKLING. No understanding.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. With that kind of general understanding——

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to say "no unanimous consent."

Mr. WITHERS. I call the Senator to order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] is entitled to the floor; until he yields it no one else is in order. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. No, sir. The Senator from Iowa yielded to me and I believe I am entitled to the floor. The Senator from Iowa has made a suggestion which I think is a very proper one, and I appeal to my friend who has charge of this bill to answer it and, if he thinks it best to do so, to consent to it. My own opinion is that we ought to agree to it with a general understanding; I do not ask unanimous consent, and I do not ask the Senator from New York to consent if he will not do it; therefore I make no appeal to him whatever——

Mr. CARPENTER. I rise to a point of order. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia will suspend for a moment until the Senator from Wisconsin makes his point of order.

Mr. CARPENTER. My point of order is that there is no motion before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate; and the Senator from Iowa moved that the Senate adjourn. He withdrew that motion for a moment to enable the Senator from West Virginia to make an explanation or suggestion.

Mr. CARPENTER. May I inquire, then, of the Chair what is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine to the Army appropriation bill now before the Senate.

Mr. CARPENTER. No; the question, I understand, is on the motion to go into executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has been voted down.

Mr. CONKLING. No, sir.

Mr. CARPENTER. No quorum voted on the question.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it is too late to go into executive session, and I will insist on my motion to adjourn, although of course I will yield briefly to the Senator from West Virginia if he wishes to be heard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa having withdrawn his motion temporarily, gave the floor by courtesy to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. CARPENTER. I raise the point of order that the pending question is the motion to go into executive session, which is not debatable.

Mr. CONKLING. No debate is in order.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I think the Senator from West Virginia has made a sufficient explanation, and I insist on my motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The question being put, a division was called for, and the ayes were called upon to rise.

Mr. ALLISON. I see our friends on the other side do not vote.

Mr. CARPENTER. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.]

Mr. CHANDLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. GARLAND, (when Mr. COKE'S name was called.) The Senator from Texas is paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.] I announce this pair for the evening.

Mr. MCMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired on political questions with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.] I should be glad to have this announcement taken for all the votes to-night, if it can be done. I would vote "yea" if he were here.

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. COKE.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WALLACE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague [Mr. CAMERON] on all political questions, and I infer this to be one. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BLAINE. I should like to make a point of order that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] did not vote on this motion.

Mr. EATON. What motion?

Mr. BLAINE. The pending motion.

Mr. EATON. I did. The Senator from Maine's ears are not sufficiently large; he did not hear my vote.

Mr. BLAINE. Is the Senator from Connecticut recorded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The name of the Senator from Connecticut does not appear on the roll-call.

Mr. EATON. I voted.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Connecticut's ears seem to be the ones that are elongated slightly.

Mr. EATON. Not at all. I said I did vote; I did not say that the Clerk had taken down my vote.

Mr. BLAINE. That is, the Senator intended to vote.

Mr. EATON. I was standing conversing with my friend from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] and I turned around as my name was called and voted.

Mr. BLAINE. I move that the Senator be requested to vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut having stated on his own authority that he had voted, the Clerk will record his vote.

Mr. ALLISON. That ought to be satisfactory to the Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is satisfactory to the Chair.

Mr. BURNSIDE. How will the vote be recorded?

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Connecticut has not indicated on which side he voted. Will the Clerk record him the way——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator votes with such regularity on the democratic side that the Chair does not think there will be any difficulty in recording it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. Is that a decision of the Chair which goes into the permanent record?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I do not speak as the Chair now.

Mr. BLAINE. The Chair decides that as the Senator from Connecticut is a well-known, unvarying, dyed-in-the-wool democrat, his vote may be inferred upon any given case. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine is not in order. The Senator from Connecticut said that he had voted——

Mr. BLAINE. But not on which side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When the Clerk reads the vote, if the Senator's name is not recorded properly, he will correct the roll.

Mr. EATON. If there be any doubt about it, record me on the other side from the way the Senator from Maine voted. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. That means that we get a decision that I am a dyed-in-the-wool republican.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the names as recorded on the yeas and nays.

The Secretary read the list of yeas and nays on Mr. ALLISON'S motion to adjourn, as follows:

YEAS—14.

Allison,	Carpenter,	Kirkwood,	Rollins,
Blaine,	Dawes,	Morrill,	Windom.
Booth,	Ferry,	Paddock,
Burnside,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt,

NAYS—26.

Bailey,	Garland,	Hereford,	Jones of Florida,
Bayard,	Groome,	Hill of Georgia,	Kernan,
Call,	Hampton,	Houston,	McDonald,
Eaton,	Harris,	Jonas,	Maxey,
Pendleton,	Saulsbury,	Vest,	Withers.
Randolph,	Slater,	Walker,
Ransom,	Vance,	Whyte,

Mr. BLAINE. I insist, although the point is of no value practically, that the Senator from Connecticut has not responded to his name; that as the Clerk has read the list he has assigned the Senator to a place arbitrarily; that it is in contravention of the rules of the Senate as palpably as anything in the world can be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine called the attention of the Chair to the alleged fact that the Senator from Connecticut had not voted, and the Senator from Connecticut rose in his place and announced that he had voted.

Mr. BLAINE. But he did not say which way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk has called the roll and has him recorded in the negative.

Mr. BLAINE. By whose direction did the Clerk record it so?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair cannot tell by what authority the Clerk performs his duty.

Mr. BLAINE. The Clerk has no right whatever without the Senator responding——

Mr. SAULSBURY. I call the Senator from Maine to order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine is not in order. The roll-call has been read by the Secretary and the Senator from Connecticut has accepted the roll-call as correct, and the Senator from Maine has no right to question it.

Mr. BLAINE. One moment. I insist I have——

Mr. SAULSBURY. I insist that the Senator shall not proceed out of order.

Mr. BLAINE. I am not going to proceed out of order. The Clerk himself stated——

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator has no right to occupy the floor, and I call him to order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware calls the Senator from Maine to order.

Mr. BLAINE. I will state my point: First, the Clerk stated to the Presiding Officer that the Senator from Connecticut had not voted. The Senator from Connecticut has given no response since then. Now by whose authority was that record made? I have the right to know.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I insist that the Senator is out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has indicated that his vote was in the negative.

Mr. BLAINE. By what?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By what he has said from his chair approving the act.

Mr. BLAINE. By no means; I object to that. You might as well vote by holding up your hat or by raising your handkerchief.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Nothing is in order while the roll-call is pending.

Mr. BLAINE. I want to know how the Clerk made that record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine is out of order.

Mr. BLAINE. Not until I have that information am I out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine has no right to inquire of the Chair anything that is not within the knowledge of the Chair.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I have the right to know where the Clerk got his information. I make the accusation that the Clerk has made a fraudulent entry of a name as voting that was not responded to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Maine charges that the Clerk has incorrectly recorded the vote of the Senator from Connecticut the Chair will have the roll-call corrected.

Mr. BLAINE. I insist that the Senator from Connecticut before his name is recorded there shall answer in open Senate how he votes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That there may be no mistake——

Mr. EATON. Oh, I shall answer you myself.

Mr. BLAINE. If your name is recorded there I insist——

Mr. EATON. Do not insist.

Mr. BLAINE. I do just exactly insist, and I insist that your name shall not be recorded there unless you answer the roll-call.

Mr. EATON. That answer has been made.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Maine has been ruled out of order by the Chair, and I insist on order, sir, or that he shall be arrested by the Sergeant-at-Arms and taken into custody.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine will come to order.

Mr. BLAINE. I will state the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine——

Mr. BLAINE. One moment. The Senator from Connecticut made a point of order——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine will take his seat until the Chair passes on the question of order.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to make the Senator from Maine take his seat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware will take his seat as well as the Senator from Maine. There being a controversy as to the vote of the Senator from Connecticut, the Clerk will be directed to call the name of the Senator from Connecticut again.

Mr. BLAINE. That is right.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. EATON.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I have once voted.
Mr. BLAINE. No, sir.
Mr. EATON. It is not for the Senator from Maine to say "no," when I have said on my honor that I have voted. I do not take any language of that sort from the Senator from Maine. It is unbecoming him to use language of that character to a Senator on this floor when the Senator says he has voted. My friend from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] was standing by me when I voted.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut will bear in mind that the accuracy of the Clerk has been called in question, and it is that the Clerk may be put right that the vote of the Senator is again requested, so that he may have the vote properly announced.
Mr. EATON. The Clerk is right.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then that settles the whole question.
Mr. BLAINE. It does not settle it, Mr. President.
Mr. BAYARD. The Senator from Connecticut voted audibly in the negative, standing by my desk.
Mr. BLAINE. Now this is to come in as a vote from another Senator telling how a Senator present voted.
Mr. HARRIS. Is the Senator from Maine in order?
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine is not in order.
Mr. BLAINE. I insist, Mr. President——["Order!" "Order!"]
Mr. HARRIS. I insist upon the point of order.
Mr. BLAINE. I appeal from the decision of the Chair and say that that vote is not properly recorded, because the Senator from Connecticut did not respond so that the Clerk heard him and recorded it, and parol testimony like that the Senator from Delaware volunteers, is not within the competency of the Senate to receive.
Mr. SAULSBURY. That is aliunde, I suppose. [Laughter.]
Mr. McMILLAN. As I understand——
Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I must submit that nothing is in order during the roll-call but the announcement of the result.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. A question of order has been raised in regard to the roll-call itself, and the decision of the Chair was that the point of order was not well taken, and upon that the Senator from Maine has taken an appeal. That is the question pending.
Mr. McMILLAN. I believe I have the floor.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon that question the Senator from Minnesota has the floor.
Mr. McMILLAN. As I understand the facts transpiring here, the Senator from Maine, discovering that the vote of the Senator from Connecticut was not recorded, moved that he be requested to give his reasons for not voting.
Mr. BLAINE. Just as he had done to me.
Mr. McMILLAN. It was then said by the Senator from Connecticut that he had voted. The vote did not appear upon the record kept by the Clerk. The President directed that the vote of the Senator from Connecticut be recorded in the negative, the Senator from Connecticut not having responded——
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator must come to order. He is mistaken when he says the Chair directed that the vote should be recorded in the negative.
Mr. McMILLAN. I will not say "directed." The occupant of the chair said that the vote of the Senator would be recorded. Is that correct? And subsequently the record of the Clerk showed that the vote of the Senator from Connecticut was recorded in the negative, no response from the Senator from Connecticut having been made to the call for his vote. That, as I understand it, is the case. The Senator from Connecticut said he did vote; the Senator from Delaware has also said that he voted; but the Clerk's record did not show it until the remark from the Chair and the subsequent notice made.
Mr. HOUSTON. The Senator forgets a very important fact, that the Senator from Connecticut said expressly that his vote was recorded correctly by the Clerk. Now what more could be asked?
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would also state for the information of the Senator from Minnesota that the Senator from Connecticut said that he voted in the opposite way from the Senator from Maine.
Mr. CONKLING. Has the Senator from Maine voted?
The PRESIDING OFFICER. He had voted "yea."
Mr. McMILLAN. That was not till after the fact appeared that his vote had been recorded.
Mr. BLAINE. The rule prescribes one way of voting. It does not say my vote is the opposite of that of the Senator over there with the light cravat, or that my vote is correctly understood by the Clerk or by any other words except "yea" or "nay."
Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a point of order. I understand this question of order has been settled and there is nothing now before the Senate.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. An appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair.
Mr. HOUSTON. That is not debatable.
Several SENATORS. It is debatable.
Mr. HEREFORD. I move to lay the appeal of the Senator from Maine on the table.
Mr. BLAINE. Not while I have the floor.
Mr. HEREFORD. The Senator from Alabama had the floor.
Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine.
Mr. BLAINE. What I insist is that by none of the forms that the Senator from Connecticut has alleged, do the rules recognize that mode of voting. He states that he said that vote is correctly recorded, and he states that he voted on the opposite side from that on which I voted. Now, does the Chair pretend to rule or would the Chair (who is as good a judge of the proprieties of debate and of all other proprieties as any Senator on this floor) rule that that mode of voting is permissible here? And the Chair himself—I wish to call the attention of the Chair to this—directed that the Senator from Connecticut should have his name called again; and he then, in absolute defiance of the rules of the Senate, refused to vote. When his name was called the second time by the direction of the Chair, the honorable Senator from Connecticut refused to respond.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the contrary he informed the Chair that he voted "nay."
Mr. BLAINE. Oh no, he did not. He said his vote was correctly recorded.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was "nay."
Mr. BLAINE. Does the Chair think that was a fair way to vote?
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly.
Mr. BLAINE. Does the honorable Presiding Officer state that that is a permissible mode of voting in the Senate? I will state the whole proceeding, now that I am on the floor. The Senator from Connecticut, I thought, with some gratuitous forwardness, brought my name prominent as not having voted. Well, on that there became a certain confused proceeding which ended in smoke. When this last roll-call was going on I noticed myself distinctly that he did not respond to his name in such a manner as to be audible at the Clerk's desk, and that is the only test, for I was within ear-shot. I went to the Clerk's desk myself and saw his name was not recorded there. The Clerk afterward informed the President of the Senate that it was not there. All those facts are patent here in the eye of the Senate, and then the Senator from Connecticut, not relishing with as keen a zest as he might the medicine which he tried to commend to my palate, endeavored to put on a little high dudgeon and to be a little indignant that I should try on him exactly the thing he had tried ineffectually upon me.
Mr. EATON. It will be ineffectual on me.
Mr. BLAINE. That may be; I do not know but that I may not succeed in having the Senator made to respond and that he will be allowed to have a record without responding; but whether it be done by order of the Presiding Officer, for whom I need not express my respect, or whether it be done by a vote of this Chamber by laying the appeal on the table, it is my judgment that you will have to get a quorum of the Senate on the other side of the Chamber before you commit that outrage. That is my judgment. I merely guess at that My judgment is that that outrage upon the rules of this House will never go upon the Journal of the Senate until a quorum of the Senate composed of democratic members say it shall go there. Make the most of that.
Mr. McDONALD obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. EATON at his request.
Mr. EATON. A single word, sir. There is a maxim which perhaps ought not to be applied and which I will not apply, about the old gentleman who resides below rebuking sin. The Senator from Maine who has sat here in absolute violation of the rules of this Senate for two hours, undertakes to rebuke me, and he has again said, standing here out of his place, near the seat of my friend from Indiana, that I did not vote.
Mr. BLAINE. Audibly to the Clerk.
Mr. EATON. How do you know? You are not the Clerk.
Mr. BLAINE. The Clerk says so.
Mr. EATON. I voted; my vote is correctly recorded, and the Senator from Maine says it will be an outrage to record the vote of a Senator who says that he voted and that the vote is correctly recorded. It is possible that every Senator on the other side of this Chamber will say that. If so, then we shall wait until we get a quorum, I trust, if it is until twelve o'clock to-morrow. But I have said I voted.
Mr. BLAINE. You have not got a quorum in the city of Washington of democratic Senators.
Mr. EATON. I have said I voted. The Senator from Maine has said I did not.
Mr. BLAINE. Audibly?
Mr. EATON. The Senator from Maine has said I did not. It is for the Senators on that side of the Chamber to choose upon a question of veracity between him and me. I say that I did vote; he says that I did not.
Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——
Mr. EATON. Wait one moment, if you please. My friends, the republican Senators on this floor, may choose between the Senator from Maine and myself.
Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, one moment. What I stated was this——
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD] is entitled to the floor.
Mr. McDONALD. As we have been informed it will take all night to settle this question, I move to lay the appeal on the table, and thus we shall commence now to settle it.
Mr. BLAINE. I want to make one remark.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. CARPENTER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ALLISON, (at nine o'clock and thirty-two minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BLAINE. May I say a word? Does the Senator from Indiana make that motion to prevent my responding?

Mr. McDONALD. To bring this debate to an end.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator make the motion to prevent my responding to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. McDONALD. I made it in order that we might start now on that long road we are told we have to travel.

Mr. BLAINE. Did the Senator make the motion to prevent me from responding to the Senator from Connecticut?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will address the Chair.

Mr. McDONALD. I made the motion in response to the threat made by the Senator from Maine that a vote should not take place to-night——

Mr. ALLISON. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator made that motion knowing——

Mr. ALLISON. I have moved to adjourn——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine will come to order. It is a violation of the rules of order in the Senate for the Senator from Maine, or any other Senator who proposes to speak, not to address the Chair and obtain the privilege of the floor from the Chair.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask, through the Chair, to have consent to speak one minute in answer to what the Senator from Connecticut has said.

Mr. McDONALD. For that one minute I withdraw my motion.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine will suspend until the Senator from Iowa withdraws his motion to adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. I also withdraw my motion for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Now the Senator from Maine is in order.

Mr. BLAINE. I only want one minute. The Senator from Connecticut may assert, and assert, and assert, but he cannot make this a question of veracity between me and him. What I said was that on the roll-call he did not answer so as to be audible to the Clerk. I am willing to have the Clerk put at the bar of the Senate and interrogated. That is what I asserted, and the Senator comes and states that it is a question of veracity between me and him. I said the Clerk stated so to me; I said he stated so to the President of the Senate. If the Senator wants a question of veracity on that point he can butt his head against the piers of truth as long as he pleases.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state——

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin will suspend until the Chair states a fact. The Senator from Connecticut did answer to the roll-call audibly, and so audibly that the Reporter took his vote down.

Mr. BLAINE. Did the Clerk take his vote down?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I am not talking about whether the Clerk heard him; the Reporter heard him. It was audible enough for the Reporter to take down the vote as it was cast.

Mr. BLAINE. But that was not the point. I said the Clerk did not hear it; and I said the Clerk so informed the President of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk did so inform the President of the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. And he also informed me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The acting President of the Senate had the Senator's name called again, and he responded, and it is so recorded.

Mr. BLAINE. He never responded audibly to the Clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senate that the Senator did respond in a manner which indicated his vote.

Mr. BLAINE. "Indicated!"

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no rule of the Senate that requires any specific language to be used by a Senator in voting.

Mr. BLAINE. There is none?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is none whatever.

Mr. CARPENTER. He is required to answer "yea" or "nay."

Mr. BLAINE. Would the Chair consider that——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that a Senator can say that he is in favor of a bill or against a bill, without saying "yea" or "nay."

Mr. CARPENTER. The Chair is mistaken; the rule is express; he must answer "yea" or "nay" without debate; unless the rule has been changed of late years.

Mr. ALLISON, (at nine o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate now adjourn.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate adjourn. There is no other question pending before the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. I thought there was an appeal and a motion to lay the appeal on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to adjourn the Chair presumes takes precedence of an appeal.

Mr. BLAINE. But that will come up and will be found to have a good deal of life in it, if the Senate does not adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate adjourn.

The question being put, the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. McDONALD. As the minute given to the Senator from Maine is up long since, I renew my motion to lay the appeal on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question, then, is on the appeal of the Senator from Maine from the decision of the Chair on the point of order.

Mr. McDONALD. I move to lay that appeal on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana to lay on the table the appeal taken by the Senator from Maine from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this subject with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. McPHERSON.]

The Secretary resumed and concluded the call of the roll.

Mr. BLAINE. I wish the ruling of the Chair on whether the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] has the right to vote on this question, in the result of which he is directly interested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the Senator from Connecticut is entitled to vote.

Mr. BLAINE. I merely wanted the ruling of the Chair.

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 0; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Bailey,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Bayard,	Hampton,	Kernan,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Harris,	McDonald,	Slater,
Cockrell,	Hereford,	Maxey,	Vance,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,	Walker,
Eaton,	Houston,	Pendleton,	Withers.
Garland,	Jonas,	Randolph,

NAYS—0.

ABSENT—49.

Allison,	Coke,	Johnston,	Saunders,
Anthony,	Conkling,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Beck,	Davis of Illinois,	Kellogg,	Teller,
Bell,	Dawes,	Kirkwood,	Thurman,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	Lamar,	Vest,
Booth,	Farley,	Logan,	Voorhees,
Bruce,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Wallace,
Burnside,	Gordon,	McPherson,	Whyte,
Butler,	Grover,	Morrill,	Williams,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hamlin,	Paddock,	Windom.
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt,
Carpenter,	Hoar,	Plumb,
Chandler,	Ingalls,	Rollins,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. CONKLING. What becomes of the appeal?

Mr. BAYARD, (at nine o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope not; I hope the Senate is not going to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. What becomes of the appeal?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote upon the appeal disclosing that there is no quorum present, the Presiding Officer will direct that the roll be called to see what Senators are absent.

Mr. CONKLING. Meanwhile I wish to ask a question of the Chair: what becomes of the appeal?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The appeal falls as a matter of course, there being no quorum to vote upon it.

Mr. CONKLING. When we get a quorum will the appeal be the first question in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will.

Mr. CONKLING. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Dawes,	Kernan,	Rollins,
Bailey,	Eaton,	Kirkwood,	Saulsbury,
Bayard,	Garland,	Lamar,	Saunders,
Bell,	Groome,	McDonald,	Slater,
Blaine,	Hampton,	McMillan,	Vance,
Booth,	Harris,	Maxey,	Vest,
Burnside,	Hereford,	Morgan,	Walker,
Call,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,	Wallace,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Georgia,	Paddock,	Whyte,
Carpenter,	Houston,	Pendleton,	Windom,
Chandler,	Ingalls,	Platt,	Withers.
Cockrell,	Jonas,	Randolph,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon the call of the roll fifty Senators have answered, and a quorum is consequently present. The question now recurs on the motion to lay the appeal taken from the decision of the Chair upon the table, and on that the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 0; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Bailey,	Harris,	McDonald,	Vance,
Bayard,	Hereford,	Maxey,	Vest,
Call,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,	Walker,
Davis of W. Va.,	Houston,	Pendleton,	Wallace,
Eaton,	Jonas,	Randolph,	Withers.
Garland,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Groome,	Kernan,	Saulsbury,
Hampton,	Lamar,	Slater,

NAYS—0.

ABSENT—47.

Allison,	Chandler,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt,
Anthony,	Cockrell,	Hoar,	Plumb,
Beck,	Coke,	Ingalls,	Rollins,
Bell,	Conkling,	Johnston,	Saunders,
Blaine,	Davis of Illinois,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Booth,	Dawes,	Kellogg,	Teller,

Burnside,	Farley,	Logan,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Whyte,
Cameron of Pa.,	Gordon,	McPherson,	Williams,
Cameron of Wis.,	Grover,	Morrill,	Windom.
Carpenter,	Hamlin,	Paddock,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon the question of laying the appeal on the table, no quorum voted. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORRILL, (when his name was called.) After ten o'clock I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.]

The Secretary resumed and concluded the call of the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bailey,	Conkling,	Jones of Florida,	Rollins,
Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Kernan,	Saulsbury,
Bell,	Dawes,	Kirkwood,	Slater,
Blaine,	Eaton,	Logan,	Vance,
Booth,	Garland,	McDonald,	Vest,
Burnside,	Groome,	McMillan,	Walker,
Call,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Whyte,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harris,	Morgan,	Windom,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hereford,	Pendleton.	Withers.
Carpenter,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt,
Chandler,	Hill of Georgia,	Randolph,
Cockrell,	Houston,	Ransom,

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The roll-call discloses forty-five Senators present, being a quorum to transact business.

Mr. WHYTE, (at ten o'clock p. m.) It seems to be manifest that there is to be no end of these proceedings in the nature of filibustering. Therefore, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BLAINE. I am opposed to adjourning until the appeal is settled.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 18, noes 16.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate stands adjourned——

Mr. BLAINE. I ask for the yeas and nays. We want to see who aids the motion over here.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHANDLER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. MCMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.] I should vote "yea," if he were here.

Mr. PLATT, (when his name was called.) Upon this vote I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.]

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] for to-night.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. THURMAN. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. CHANDLER. My colleague [Mr. FERRY] is paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.]

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—12.

Bayard,	Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Georgia.	Morgan,
Booth,	Dawes,	Kernan,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Hill of Colorado,	Kirkwood,	Windom.

NAYS—25.

Bailey,	Garland,	Lamar,	Vance,
Blaine,	Hampton,	Logan,	Vest,
Call,	Harris,	McDonald,	Walker,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hereford,	Maxey,	Withers.
Carpenter,	Houston,	Pendleton,
Conkling,	Jonas,	Randolph,
Eaton,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,

ABSENT—39.

Allison,	Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Anthony,	Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,
Beck,	Farley,	Kellogg,	Sharon,
Bell,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Teller,
Bruce,	Gordon,	McPherson,	Thurman,
Butler,	Groome,	Morrill,	Voorhees,
Chandler,	Grover,	Paddock,	Wallace,
Cockrell,	Hamlin,	Platt,	Whyte,
Coke,	Hoar,	Plumb,	Williams.
Davis of Illinois,	Ingalls,	Ransom,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the question before the Senate now?

Mr. EATON and others. The roll-call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no quorum present, the Chair will direct a call of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll of Senators and ascertain those who are present and the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Conkling,	Ingalls,	Randolph,
Bailey,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Bayard,	Dawes,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Bell,	Eaton,	Kernan,	Slater,
Blaine,	Garland,	Kirkwood,	Thurman,
Booth,	Groome,	Lamar,	Vance,
Burnside,	Hampton,	McDonald,	Vest,
Call,	Harris,	McMillan,	Walker,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hereford,	Maxey,	Withers.
Carpenter,	Hill of Colorado,	Paddock,
Chandler,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,
Cockrell,	Houston,	Platt,

Mr. BURNSIDE. My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] was called home by the death of a friend; otherwise he would have been here to answer to his name.

Mr. ALLISON. I think I ought to announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] is called home by illness in his family; otherwise he would be here to answer to his name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A call of the Senate discloses the presence of forty-five Senators, a majority of the Senate, and the question now recurs on the motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] to lay the appeal of the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] on the table, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. Pending that, in view of the last vote awhile ago, the rising vote, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Senate refused to adjourn; there being on a division—ayes 13, noes 27.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Indiana to lay the appeal of the Senator from Maine on the table, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. MCMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.]

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 26, nays 0; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bailey,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Bayard,	Hampton,	Kernan,	Vance,
Call,	Harris,	Lamar,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Hereford,	McDonald,	Walker,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Maxey,	Withers.
Eaton,	Houston,	Morgan,
Garland,	Jonas,	Pendleton,

Carpenter,	Hoar,	Randolph,
Chandler,	Ingalls,	Ransom,

Mr. CONKLING. What is the question before the Senate, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no quorum of the Senate present. If the present occupant of the chair had to decide he would leave it to the Senate to say what would be the further pleasure of the Senate, it having been ascertained by the last roll-call that there is no quorum of the Senate present. The Chair understands, however, that it has been decided that in such a case a call of the Senate is first in order.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, (at ten o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) Mr. President, I have taken no part at all in these proceedings to-night. I have no doubt that every member of the Senate is actuated by a desire to do right. I think this whole proceeding is the result of an unnecessary misunderstanding. I desire to say for myself especially that the gentleman who has the floor on the bill is a gentleman who never occupies the time of the Senate either unwisely or unnecessarily. I think he ought to have the floor to-morrow, and I think he ought to have it without limitation or restriction of any kind or character. I think that is due to him as well as due to the Senate. I expect to hear him with a very great deal of pleasure myself. I regret that there is this misunderstanding; I think it is unnecessary all around; and with the kindest feelings for all sides, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The Senate refused to adjourn; there being on a division—ayes 17, noes 22.

Mr. BURNSIDE. If it is in order, I should like to ask why we are staying here. If it is very important, I should like to know it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not competent to answer the question. What is the further pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. CARPENTER. The next thing is a call of the Senate, is it not?

Mr. BLAINE. There is a quorum.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a quorum of the Senate present, disclosed on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the motion pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending motion is the motion of the Senator from Indiana to lay upon the table the appeal of the Senator from Maine, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] I should vote on one side and he would vote on the other.

Mr. CHANDLER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. McPHERSON.]

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired to-night with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] He would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 27, nays 0; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Bailey,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Bayard,	Hampton,	Kernan,	Vance,
Call,	Harris,	Kirkwood,	Vest,

Cameron of Pa.,	Hamlin,	Paddock,	Williams.
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt,
Carpenter,	Hoar,	Plumb,
Chandler,	Ingalls,	Ransom,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (at ten o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question and declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHANDLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 10, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—10.

Blaine,	Hill of Colorado,	Paddock,	Windom.
Burnside,	Hill of Georgia,	Platt,
Cameron of Wis.,	Kirkwood,	Rollins,

NAYS—25.

Bailey,	Garland,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,

Davis of W. Va.,	Houston,	Randolph,
Eaton,	Jonas,	Slater.

ABSENT—41.

Allison,	Davis of Illinois,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,
Anthony,	Dawes,	Kellogg,	Sharon,
Beck,	Edmunds,	Lamar,	Teller,
Bell,	Farley,	Logan,	Thurman,

Cameron of Pa.,	Hamlin,	Morrill,	Williams.
Chandler,	Hoar,	Plumb,
Cockrell,	Ingalls,	Ransom,
Coke,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. As no quorum has voted, what is the next question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will decide that the question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD] to lay on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair taken by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.]

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will state his question of order.

Mr. CONKLING. My point of order is founded upon the rule of the Senate which declares that, whenever the want of a quorum appears, all business shall cease except a motion to adjourn and a motion for a call of the Senate. If I understood the announcement aright, no quorum voted on the last vote.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the fact.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon the motion last before the Senate to adjourn the yeas were 10 and the nays were 25.

Mr. CONKLING. Thirty-five is not a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That vote does not disclose a quorum. Under Rule 2—

If, either at the commencement of any daily session of the Senate, or at any time during its daily sessions, a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the presiding officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll of Senators, and shall announce the result to the Senate; and these proceedings shall be without debate.

Rule 3 provides that—

Whenever it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of the absent Senators, which order shall be determined without debate.

As the Chair announced before, if it were left to the present occupant of the chair he would submit it to the Senate to determine whether there should be a call of the Senate or not, and the Chair would not take the responsibility of ordering the call himself. The Chair is advised that the President pro tempore of the Senate has decided otherwise, and he will adhere to that decision.

Mr. CONKLING. Then the first thing in order is a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A call of the Senate, under the ruling as stated by the Chair. There being no quorum of the Senate present, the Secretary will call the roll of Senators to ascertain the presence or absence of a quorum.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Garland,	Kernan,	Rollins,
Bayard,	Hampton,	Kirkwood,	Saulsbury,
Blaine,	Harris,	Lamar,	Slater,
Burnside,	Hereford,	McDonald,	Vance,
Call,	Hill of Colorado,	Maxey,	Vest,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Georgia,	Paddock,	Walker,
Carpenter,	Houston,	Pendleton,	Windom,
Chandler,	Ingalls,	Platt,	Withers.
Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Randolph,
Eaton,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the call of the Senate there are only thirty-eight Senators present, which is not a quorum. What is the further pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. CONKLING. What is the next question, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pleasure of the Senate will indicate what shall be done.

Mr. CONKLING. In the absence of a motion, I ask the Chair what is the business in order?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Was my name called?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's name is recorded.

Mr. BLAINE. The call has been announced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The business pending before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. McDONALD.]

Mr. CONKLING. But my inquiry, if the Chair will pardon me, is what, in the absence of a motion, is the next proceeding before the Senate, the absence of a quorum having been ascertained by a call of the roll?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no power to determine what course the Senate shall pursue in such an emergency. A majority of the Senators present must take action, and the Chair cannot decide what that action shall be.

Mr. CONKLING. Cannot the Chair advise the Senate what it would be well to do?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not empowered to advise.

Mr. CONKLING. I withdraw my request.

Mr. PADDOCK. If there is no other business before the Senate, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask what is now before the Senate? What is the result of the call of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair announced that the call of the Senate disclosed that there was no quorum present, and asked what was the further pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. HOUSTON. Call the absentees, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call has already been made, and disclosed that there was no quorum present.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I ask that the absentees be called.

Mr. CONKLING. Who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD] has the floor, and no other Senator will be heard or recognized.

Mr. McDONALD. I move that the doors be closed and absentees sent for.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves that the doors of the Senate be closed, and that the absentees be sent for. Pending that motion, the Senator from New York rises to a question of order; and he will state it.

Mr. CONKLING. My point of order is this: If a call of the Senate is to take place, the next proceeding in order is to call the absentees, and until that is done the motion of the Senator from Indiana is not in order. After that has been done, I have another objection of order against the motion which the Senator makes.

Mr. McDONALD. I understood the Chair to say that the call of the Senate had disclosed that there was not a quorum. That being the case I insist on my motion.

Mr. CONKLING. You cannot do that.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask if my name was recorded on the last call?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will decide that the motion of the Senator from Indiana is not in order, and the Chair will decide that the absent Senators shall be called.

The Secretary proceeded to call the list of absentees, and called the names of Messrs. ANTHONY and BAILEY.

Mr. BAILEY. I was present a little while ago when my name was called and answered.

The Secretary resumed the call of the list of absentees, and called the names of Messrs. BECK, BELL, BOOTH, BRUCE, BUTLER, CAMERON of Pennsylvania, COKE, CONKLING, and DAVIS of Illinois.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, (when the name of Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, was called.) Mr. President, on this call of the absentees I desire to state that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] is absent, owing to indisposition.

The Secretary called the names of Messrs. DAWES, EDMUNDS, FARLEY, FERRY, GORDON, GROOME, GROVER, HAMLIN, and JOHNSTON.

Mr. WITHERS, (when the name of Mr. JOHNSTON was called.) I wish to state that my colleague, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] is absent because of indisposition.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. JONES, of Florida, and he responded.

The names of Mr. JONES, of Nevada, and Mr. LAMAR were called.

Mr. LAMAR. I was present. If I did not answer to my name, it was because I did not hear it called.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the call of the absentees; as follows:

Messrs. LOGAN, McMILLAN, McPHERSON, MORGAN, MORRILL, PLUMB, SAUNDERS, SHARON, TELLER, THURMAN, VOORHEES, WALLACE, WHYTE, and WILLIAMS.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] has gone home and is paired.

Messrs. BURNSIDE, PADDOCK, RANSOM, and WALKER announced that they were present.

Mr. BURNSIDE. My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is called home by the death of a friend; otherwise he would be here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call of absentees discloses that there are now present forty-one Senators, a quorum. The question recurs——

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators, notwithstanding there is a quorum present.

Mr. CARPENTER. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, yes; let us have the yeas and nays on that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not until the question is stated and before the Senate. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. HARRIS. That is the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question, upon which the yeas and nays have been demanded? Is the call for the yeas and nays sustained.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. I rise to a point of order. On the motion of the honorable Senator from Tennessee it will require a majority of the Senate to carry it. This is different from the absence of a quorum. This order which he moves cannot be adopted except by a majority of a quorum, a quorum being present.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That question is not before the Chair, and is not before the Senate to be debated.

Mr. BLAINE. I merely give warning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is the motion of the Senator from Tennessee that the Sergeant-at-Arms be required to request the presence of absent Senators, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, pending that, I desire to announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] is detained from the Senate by reason of sickness in his family, and requested that I should pair with him. Therefore I ask that the Senator from Maryland and also myself may be excluded from the operation of this direction—excepted from the call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. ALLISON. Is it not in order for me to make this request of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Iowa as making any request to be submitted to the Senate. The Chair thought he made an announcement.

Mr. ALLISON. I do make the request that the Senator from Maryland, who is absent by reason of sickness in his family, may be exempted from the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa moves——

Mr. CARPENTER. I move to amend the motion of the Senator from Iowa by adding to it the words "and all other absent Senators."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is not before the Senate, and therefore is not amendable. When the Chair shall have stated the question to the Senate then the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin will be entertained.

Mr. CARPENTER. I appeal from that ruling of the Chair, and claim the right to make my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no ruling to be appealed from. The Chair will state the question to the Senate. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senator from Maryland be excused from the operation of the motion of the Senator from Tennessee. That is the question now before the Senate.

Mr. CARPENTER. I move to amend the motion of the Senator from Iowa by adding after the words "the Senator from Maryland" the words "and all other absent Senators," there being a quorum of the body.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin moves to amend the motion of the Senator from Iowa by adding after the name of the Senator from Maryland the words which he has stated to the Senate, "and all other absent Senators."

Mr. CONKLING. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the question now before the Senate, on which the Senator from New York demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. McDONALD. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A question of order is raised by the Senator from Indiana, which he will state.

Mr. McDONALD. It is this, that the motion of the Senator from Iowa is not now in order.

Mr. CONKLING. Why not?

Mr. McDONALD. And it cannot be made until the question of the excusing of absent Senators comes up after the order has been entered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a quorum of the Senate present. The Senator from Tennessee made a motion; that motion has been submitted to the Senate; and pending that motion the Senator from Iowa moves that an absent Senator be excused from the operation of the motion; that is, he be not required to be present at the Senate, and the Chair decides that that motion is in order.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the yeas and nays having been ordered upon my motion, it is not competent now, I imagine, for me to modify it. I would gladly, by the unanimous consent of the Senate, except from its operation not only the Senator from Maryland, but every Senator who is reported by another Senator to be absent on account of indisposition either of himself or his family.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, what has become of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Nothing has become of it, for no action has been taken upon it.

Mr. CONKLING. When is the Senate likely to act upon it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As soon, I presume, as the Chair can state the question again, and the Senate shall vote upon it.

Mr. CONKLING. In the mean time I demand the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York demands the yeas and nays upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin. Shall that call be sustained?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PADDOCK. What is that an amendment to—the motion of the Senator from Iowa?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate now is the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin to the motion of the Senator from Iowa, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PADDOCK. Well, Mr. President, is not the motion of the Senator from Iowa an amendment to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee? How can you entertain two motions of amendment at the same time to another motion?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly you can entertain two amendments at the same time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin will as your names are called answer "yea;" those opposed will answer "nay." The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. CONKLING. Are these motions debatable, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair presumes they are.

Mr. CONKLING. That is my opinion; but I merely wanted the pleasure of coinciding with the Chair. I always like to agree with the present occupant of the chair. This motion is not made at all under Rule 3, for Rule 3 does not provide for any such case. It is the instance, the Senate being present in quorum, of a Senator proposing as a motion that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be sent to invite other Senators to come in; and, therefore, it is not a call of the Senate under the rule at all. Like any other motion, it is debatable, if it is in order, which I think it is not.

Mr. CARPENTER. Of course not.

Mr. CONKLING. But if it is in order at all, it is debatable and is amendable. I do not wish to debate it, but I merely wish to concur, as I always find great pleasure in doing, with the Senator from Missouri, especially when he occupies the chair, and expresses an opinion which anybody can concur in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Chair to state the question again; I do not quite understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] to the motion of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PLATT, (when the name of Mr. CHANDLER was called.) The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] desired me to announce that he was paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. McPHERSON.]

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.]

The result was announced—yeas 3, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—3.

Kirkwood,	Pendleton,	Windom.

NAYS—25.

Bailey,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,
Bayard,	Hampton,	Kernan,	Vest,
Call,	Harris,	McDonald,	Walker,
Cockrell,	Hereford,	Maxey,	Withers.
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,
Eaton,	Houston,	Randolph,
Garland,	Jonas,	Slater,

ABSENT—48.

Allison,	Chandler,	Hoar,	Plumb,
Anthony,	Coke,	Ingalls,	Ransom,
Beck,	Conkling,	Johnston,	Rollins,
Bell,	Davis of Illinois,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,
Blaine,	Dawes,	Kellogg,	Saunders,
Booth,	Edmunds,	Lamar,	Sharon,
Bruce,	Farley,	Logan,	Teller,
Burnside,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Thurman,
Butler,	Gordon,	McPherson,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Pa.,	Grover,	Morrill,	Wallace,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hamlin,	Paddock,	Whyte,
Carpenter,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt,	Williams.

Mr. CONKLING. Is that a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides that it is not a quorum.

Mr. HEREFORD. I move, sir, under Rule 3 that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of the absent Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia moves that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the presence of absent Senators.

Mr. CARPENTER. I rise to a point of order. As I understand, the Senator from Tennessee has already made that precise motion, which is still pending and undetermined.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decided that there was a quorum, and distinctly announced that fact to the Senate, when the Senator from Tennessee made his motion. This motion of the Senator from West Virginia is made under the third rule, and in pursuance of the rule, and is in order; so the Chair decides.

Mr. CARPENTER. The motion being precisely the same?

Mr. CONKLING. Agreeing as I do with the Chair, I submit a question of order. The motion being under Rule 3 must conform to that rule. No absentees have been called; and the Chair having already ruled on the other motion for a call of the Senate that the first thing in order after the disclosure of the absence of a quorum was to call the absentees, I ask that they be called. I have been here myself all the time, for one, and I want an opportunity to answer that I am here.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia will please let the Chair state his decision on the question. The Chair has on several occasions asked what was the further pleasure of the Senate. This is the first time that immediately after the disclosure of the want of a quorum, the motion made by the Senator from West Virginia has been presented to the Chair.

Mr. HEREFORD. There is no right to insist on a call of the absentees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides that the motion is now in order. Had the Chair announced the want of a quorum——

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin will wait until the Chair states his decision. If the Chair had announced his decision that there was no quorum, and no motion had been made, the only proceeding that the Chair could have taken on his own motion would have been to have ordered a call of the absentees. The Senator from West Virginia has now made the motion which has been stated.

Mr. HEREFORD. And it should be decided without debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides that the motion is in order.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President——

Mr. HEREFORD. I call the Senator to order.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor until the Chair ascertains what he has to say.

Mr. CARPENTER. I wish simply to inquire how the Sergeant-at-Arms is to know whom he is to go for if it is not in some way ascertained who is absent. Nothing of that kind has been announced. The last call showed certain Senators present and who the absentees were, and whether they have not come into the Chamber while the roll-call was pending and failed or forgotten to vote are questions certainly to be settled in some form before the Sergeant-at-Arms is to know whom he is to go after.

Mr. HEREFORD. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. CONKLING. So do I.

Mr. CARPENTER. So did I.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York rose before the Senator from West Virginia, and if he has a point of order he will state it.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise, Mr. President, to appeal respectfully from the decision of the Chair. That appeal is debatable, and on that I believe I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When it is pending before the Senate the Senator will have the floor.

Mr. CONKLING. That is all the time I want to have it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York appeals from the decision of the Chair, and that is now the question pending before the Senate. The Senator from New York is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, Mr. President, I understand the Chair to have ruled in deference to the decision of a prior occupant of the chair, that Rule 3 executes itself without a motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Rule 2, it is the decision of the Chair, executes itself without a motion; but Rule 3 cannot execute itself unless there be a motion.

Mr. CONKLING. The Chair rules, then, if I may understand him, that Rule 2 executes itself without a motion. Did not the Chair rule also, as the President of the Senate pro tempore has ruled twice during this session, that the absentees were to be called and the Sergeant-at-Arms was to notify them to come in?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, as stated before, ruled, as he understood the President pro tempore had ruled, that under Rule 2 a roll-call disclosing the want of the quorum of the Senate, and no motion being made, the Chair being left to decide what would be the further action of the Senate, the only action he could decide upon was the call of absentees. That was stated and so ruled by the Chair two or three different times. Now a question was raised, a roll was called, and that roll ascertained that a quorum of the Senate was not present. Before the Chair had taken any action the Senator from West Virginia moved, in pursuance of Rule 3, that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the presence of absent Senators.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Chair allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And the Chair decided that that motion was in order.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Chair allow me to correct him on a point of fact?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. With pleasure.

Mr. CONKLING. I submit that the Chair is very correct in saying that it was on a call of the Senate that the absence of a quorum was disclosed. It was on a call of the yeas and nays on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is aware of the fact that it was upon the call of that. The Chair stated that it was on a call of the yeas and nays. If he said "a call of the Senate," he did not mean that it was a formal call of the Senate. It was on a call of the yeas and nays which disclosed the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CONKLING. If I understand aright the ruling of the Chair I appeal from it for two reasons: in the first place I understand that other occupants of the chair have ruled otherwise; and in the next place, as I understand Rule 3, it cannot be executed in the mode proposed by the ruling from which I appeal:

No Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave of the Senate first obtained. Whenever it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request, and when necessary, to compel the attendance of—the absent Senators, which order shall be determined without debate; and pending its execution, and until a quorum shall be present, no motion, except a motion to adjourn, nor debate, shall be in order.

Of whom?

Now I submit to the Chair, and with much confidence, that it is not in order to send the Sergeant-at-Arms promiscuously among Senators or under this rule anywhere, except to those who are absent; and, as the Chair has ruled heretofore, occupied as it is now, and occupied by the regular Presiding Officer, until the absentees are called the Sergeant-at-Arms cannot know in point of fact, nor has he any right to know, who is absent and who is not. If during the roll-call, and too late to vote, a Senator has come in, the Sergeant-at-Arms is not to be sent after him. He has a right, under the usage of the House, under the usage of the Senate, to answer when the roll of absentees is called; and I think the Chair, on reflection, will see that this mode of proceeding reverses both the general and necessary usage under the rule, and also the ruling which has prevailed heretofore.

As to Rule 2, it does not touch at all the matter of the Sergeant-at-Arms proceeding to do anything. Rule 2 provides merely:

If either at the commencement of any daily session of the Senate, or at any time during its daily sessions, a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum—

That case has not arisen at all—the presiding officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll of Senators, and shall announce the result to the Senate; and these proceedings shall be without debate.

That is the customary case where we find during the latter hours of the day when looking about the seats seem largely empty, and some Senator (as we have frequently heard) calls the attention of the Chair to the fact and the Chair in practice counts the Senate by unanimous consent, and if a quorum is found present that ends it; but strictly according to the rule he directs the roll to be called. That is on the suggestion of a member of the Senate made to the Chair. But when on a call of the yeas and nays the record, the Journal, for such it is, shows that no quorum is here, then and then only Rule 3 operates, and under that rule I submit you cannot send out the Sergeant-at-Arms to any persons except, in the language of the rule, the absent Senators, and they are to be ascertained by being called.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. President, if the construction of the rule as contended by the Senator from New York is maintained, he very clearly sees what would be the result—this rule would be a mere nullity. The very moment you call the absentees, then, as occurred a moment ago, the call discloses the presence of a quorum, and when the presence of a quorum is disclosed then you can make any motion you please and you never do get a call of the Senate at all. You can move, as was done a moment ago, that the Senator from Maryland be excused. That is all proper; but then some other Senator, as the Senator from Wisconsin did, can move to amend so that all the absent Senators be excused, and that being done they are all excused and you never do get a call of the Senate at all. You are just going around in a circle as we have been doing all night. With all due deference to the Senate it is a simple absurdity, it is an endless chain.

Mr. CONKLING. It is a revolution. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEREFORD. Yes, sir; a revolution created by my friends on the republican side. They have been engaged in this revolution some time and we want to put a stop to it.

Now, the Senator says that you have no means of information as to who the absentees are. Why not? The Secretary calls the roll. Each one who is present answers. That roll-call is handed to the presiding officer, and he sees who has answered and who has not answered, and that is recorded, and that very document goes upon the records of this body. That is the way the presiding officer ascertains who the absentees are. How does he ascertain the absentees in the manner proposed by the Senator from New York? Exactly in the same way. You call over the same roll of absentees. It is partly called again; that is, you call the absentees and that is handed to the presiding officer, the same paper; and you ascertain it in the same way that you did before. Does the Senator from New York undertake to say in the presence of this Senate that when that roll is called and certain Senators do not answer and that roll is called and handed to the presiding officer, he has not the record of this body before him which shows who are absent and who are present? Any other construction of Rule 3, in my humble judgment, is an absurdity, and only serves to have the effect desired by my friend from Wisconsin and my friend from New York, that there never shall be a call of the Senate and that the absentees never shall be sent for; and if their construction is maintained the absentees never can be sent for. The ruling of the Chair is correct, and is not in contravention of any rule or any decision made by the presiding officer before this evening, for the question has not been raised before.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, the view taken of this subject by the Senator from West Virginia will be seen to be erroneous by a moment's reflection. He says you are to take the roll-call of the yeas and nays on the question that is pending, and then you are to assume that every man who does not vote is absent; and yet we know the practice of the Senate is to pair. Half a dozen Senators may be here who do not answer to their names and vote because they are paired; and yet they are Senators in their seats answering to make a quorum, but not voting on the pending question.

Mr. HEREFORD. Allow me a moment.

Mr. CARPENTER. Well, yes.

Mr. HEREFORD. The Senator says that they may have paired. Senators have no right to pair under the rule; it is their duty if they are present to answer; the rule says so, and Senators have no right to absent themselves from the Senate under the rule without the consent of the Senate, and no consent of the Senate has been given.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I am greatly mistaken if the Senator who has just taken his seat did not announce here this evening that he was paired.

Mr. HEREFORD. I did, but I had no right to do it.

Mr. CARPENTER. He can now condemn himself as having done a very improper thing.

Mr. CONKLING. Move to expel him!

Mr. CARPENTER. I will not move to expel him, because I think he is mistaken in criminating himself. I think he has a perfect right to pair. At all events, if he has not, the whole Senate for forty years has been subject to a motion to be expelled. All have done this, and nobody ever before got up and publicly accused himself for doing it.

For instance, to see how correct the Senator is, we want to ascertain whom the Sergeant-at-Arms is to go after, to whom he is to make the request. The Senator says look at the roll-call. As that roll-call was taken I was conversing with the Senator from New York and did not vote; but I have not been out of the Senate Chamber this evening. I am not an absentee; and yet am I to be sent for as one of the absentees because I did not vote? What is the Sergeant-at-Arms to do? Where is he to go? He comes to my seat and requests me to stay here, I suppose. I have been staying all day and all night and propose to stay here until the democrats of this body who have control of it want to adjourn. When they do, of course they have got the power to adjourn, and we shall go home like loyal submissive republicans. If we can ever dispose of this interminable appeal of the Senator from Maine I want to go on and discuss the Army bill, and I have the floor to do so.

Mr. McDONALD. The Senator from New York read Rule No. 3:

3. No Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave of the Senate first obtained. Whenever it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of the absent Senators, which order shall be determined without debate; and, pending its execution, and until a quorum shall be present, no motion, except a motion to adjourn, nor debate, shall be in order.

Now, Mr. President, as has been stated by the Chair, the last roll-call disclosed that there was no quorum of the Senate present.

Mr. CARPENTER. Not a quorum voting.

Mr. McDONALD. There is no mode of ascertaining the presence of Senators except their answer to the roll-call or upon a call of the Senate. There are no other modes officially of bringing that fact before the Senate. The motion of the Senator from West Virginia to enforce this rule, I apprehend will bring us, in the progress of that enforcement, to the consideration of Rule 16:

16. When the yeas and nays shall be called for by one-fifth of the Senators present, each Senator, when his name is called, shall, unless for special reasons he be excused by the Senate, declare openly and without debate his assent or dissent to the question; and in taking the yeas and nays upon any question, the names of the Senators shall be called alphabetically.

The roll-call upon the last motion does not determine the question on which that call was made, and I apprehend that if this order is enforced the Senators not voting, and therefore officially or in contemplation of this rule not present, will be brought by the Sergeant-at-Arms to the bar of the Senate, and their names will then be called and they will be required there to give their reasons for not voting on that vote and be excused or not according to the will of the Senate.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from Indiana——

Mr. McDONALD. There must be some mode of giving force and effect to this call of the Senate, or else it is not a well-organized mob.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me ——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes.

Mr. McMILLAN. I merely wish to ask the Senator from Indiana whether, under the rule he read, the announcement of a pair by a Senator on the floor of the Senate would not be one of the special reasons which would be embraced within that exception and be an excuse for not voting; and would not all such Senators be counted as present?

Mr. McDONALD. It would be for the Senate to determine whether that would be a sufficient reason or not. Of course, if the Senator so considered, he might be excused on that account; but I apprehend that the Senate might refuse to consider that a good excuse for not voting.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir; certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. I should like to ask the Senator this question: Suppose when the roll is called five Senators rise in their places and say they are paired, and that is entered on the record of the Senate and therefore they do not vote; the Senate makes no objection, passes on with the roll-call, and of course admits the excuse to be sufficient at the time. Now my question is, does that roll-call, which has not the names of five men who answered to the Chair when their names were called and said they were paired, stand on the record of the absent Senators?

Mr. McDONALD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CARPENTER. And it shows that five who answered are absent?

Mr. McDONALD. They are for the purposes of legislation absent Senators. It will be remembered that some time ago when the Senator from Wisconsin who had been absent on several roll-calls, undertook to make a motion before the Senate, I insisted that, being absent as shown by the roll-call, he had no right to make a motion until his presence was properly ascertained.

Mr. CONKLING. The Chair overruled it.

Mr. McDONALD. The occupant of the chair at that time, I believe, overruled it, but that does not by any means decide that there is no force or effect in this attempt to secure a quorum who will be required to decide their official duty so that legislation can progress. If these rules do not properly enforce and reach that result then they are of very little value indeed.

Of course, in looking around the Senate I know that there is a quorum of Senators present; my eyes tell me that fact as I look around; but when the roll is called, for reasons satisfactory perhaps to them but certainly not satisfactory to the Senate because the Senate has not been called upon to pass upon those reasons, they decline to vote, and in that way disclose the fact that there is not so far as the work of legislation is concerned a quorum. If they cannot be sent for, cannot be brought to the bar of the Senate, cannot be called upon to stay under the rules of the Senate, then we have rules that are not as good as ropes of sand.

The Sergeant-at-Arms will take the names given him as they have appeared from the last roll-call, and go to each Senator thus disclosed to be absent and bring him to the bar of the Senate; and I shall move an amendment that he be directed to compel the attendance of the absentees, I do not care where they are so that they are not present for the purposes of legislation; suppose they were in the ante-chamber or anywhere else, or suppose they sit here mute——

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. McDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. I submit that to accomplish the purpose the Senator has in view it would be necessary to do something more than for the Sergeant-at-Arms to request Senators in their seats to stay. They are here now. He should go further and require the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring them to the bar of the Senate and make them vote; and if he cannot do that he cannot do anything in the line the Senator is now proposing.

Mr. McDONALD. In my opinion he may bring them to the bar, and then under the rule I have read they can be required either to vote or to give such reasons for not voting as will be satisfactory to the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. With the permission of the Senator from Indiana, I wish to make an inquiry and a remark. I believe, although I am not well versed in the ancient usages of the Senate, that the compulsory attendance is a new feature in the Senate, and I submit to old Senators who have much larger experience than myself that it is a process entirely unadapted to the Senate. In the House of Representatives you have compulsory attendance. Why? Because you have there a previous question and can compel the member to come and vote. But here, suppose you scour the city and empty the beds and create discomfort, and bring the Senators in here, for what is it all? The Senator from Indiana rises and says we need not talk about that, and now you have got Senators here for a blank shot in the air. You cannot compel them to vote.

Mr. McDONALD. The Senator from Maine was firing a blank shot.

Mr. BLAINE. I never did that in my life. I am not traversing any view of the Senator's, but I am submitting one of my own. That rule, however much you may incorporate it in the system of rules of the Senate, is not adapted to the Senate until you have some rule that shall force Senators to vote, because it is a mere blank cartridge fired to bring Senators here and have nothing for them to do but sit down and listen. Are you going to have a rule that somebody shall be brought here to sit down and listen to somebody else talking? That is an undue punishment not adapted to any crime that any of us have committed. It is unusual punishment forbidden by the Constitution.

Before I sit down, I want one word further with the indulgence of my friend from Indiana. Can he not see, and cannot every Senator see that the trouble here is just one, that what we call the majority side of the Senate have not a majority. They are relying upon aid from the minority. If you had a constitutional majority here, if you had your forty-two Senators here, which is an absolute majority, we should be powerless; but here you are with twenty-eight or thirty——

Mr. McDONALD. We shall have them all.

Mr. BLAINE. When you have them, we shall bow with deference to their wishes and their will; but until you do have them you are, as I said, doing nothing but firing blank cartridges, for they amount to nothing.

My motion, based on the statement of the Senator from Indiana, is that 10,000 extra copies of to-morrow morning's RECORD be published and that it be sent to all the public libraries of the United States as a valuable contribution to the parliamentary knowledge of the United States.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. McDONALD. I yielded for a question and not a speech.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. McDONALD. I have not yielded the floor. I shall not yield for that motion. I shall yield for a question or a speech but not a motion to adjourn.

The Senator from Maine has read a very sharp lecture to the majority in this Chamber. This difficulty that we find ourselves involved in here perhaps grows out of the fact that the minority undertook to run this Senate to-night and up to this time they have not run it much; and if the majority who are here entertain the same opinion that I do we will continue running it on in this way until some time next week.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. McDONALD. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I want to make a single remark in reference to the motion made by the Senator from Maine—that is, a motion to print 10,000 extra copies of the RECORD so that the parliamentary knowledge of the Senate may be understood in the country. I am opposed to that. I do not want to see any criticism made upon the action of the Senator himself who has presided with such distinguished ability over the House of Representatives. I am really afraid the country will be ashamed not only of the Senate but of the action of the Senator from Maine on this occasion. When I first came into the Senate this evening the Senator from Maine, clearly out of order, stood upon the floor and retained the floor when the Chair had ruled him out of order time and again. I do not want that record to go out.

Mr. BLAINE. That from a Senator who has admitted that he was absent.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Now I will say why I was absent. I had paired with one of the Senator's colleagues on that side of the House, and could not vote. But I have been compelled, because of the persistent refusal of the Senator from Maine and his associates to answer to their names when called, to write a note and send to the hotel asking the Senator from Michigan with whom I was paired to relieve me from the pair because of the action of his political associates in this body; that duty to my political associates required me to withdraw from the pair by his consent which I had agreed to make with him.

I am opposed to the publication of any extra copies of that record; it will go out to the country sufficiently if the usual number of copies of the RECORD are published. It shows that the minority on this floor have sat in their seats to-night and obstructed the business of the Senate by persistently refusing to vote. I will not say it is revolution, but I will say it is contrary to the ancient usages of this body. It is a new feature, so far as I can remember in my short experience in this body, for the minority to sit in their seats and persistently refuse to vote. I have seen gentlemen retire to the cloakroom, get out of the sight of the President, and thus absent themselves; but the Senator from Maine and his political associates have sat here in the presence of the President of the Senate, and have been mute when their names were called. Sir, I do not want to see that record printed in any extra numbers. I am fearful that the character of this body will suffer because of the action of the political associates of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. WINDOM. I rise to a point of order. What is the question before the Senate?

Mr. CONKLING. The question is the appeal which I have taken from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Minnesota went out when the Senator from New York took his appeal and spoke upon it.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask that the debate be confined to the question before the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, no, let him make his speech as he wishes.

Mr. WINDOM. We have disgraced ourselves before the country, and I want to have the thing stopped.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware is in order.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Minnesota has had his full share in bringing the disgrace upon the Senate to which he refers.

Mr. WINDOM. I have, because I have been in the presence of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. SAULSBURY. And I say now, Mr. President, that I join with the Senator from Indiana, in the determination to test the endurance of the factious opposition. I am good for one whole week with an occasional cup of coffee and a little something to eat—and I join the Senator from Indiana, and so we shall see how long this fight can last.

Mr. WINDOM. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware must wait until the question of order is stated.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask that I may be excused from further attendance on the Senate to-night if we are to have this sort of thing till morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is not a question which can be entertained while the Senator from Delaware is on the floor. The Senator from Delaware will proceed.

Mr. WINDOM. Then I raise the point of order, and insist he shall be confined to the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has decided that the Chair has no power to make the remarks of any Senator pertinent to any question that may be before the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think I am addressing myself pertinently to the question now under consideration.

Mr. CONKLING. Perfectly in order; no doubt of it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am commenting on the action of the republican minority on this floor. We are here, sir, anxious to transact the public business, anxious to vote supplies for the Army, anxious to pass this bill, and we would have passed it but for the action of the republican minority this evening.

We have been charged with the responsibilities of an extra session. That charge is wholly untrue. It originated from the disagreement between the two Houses at the last session. I do not say that the republican Senate was wholly responsible for the extra session, but I maintain that the democratic party of the House of Representatives was no more responsible for the extra session than the Senate. It was because of the action of the two Houses in failing to agree that this extra session has been called. We have met in this session and attempted to pass bills, and have passed bills to supply the Government with necessary funds—a legislative bill, a judicial bill, and an Army bill. The President of the United States has seen proper to veto the bills which we have passed. We have passed other bills which we had hoped would meet his approval, but the republican minority in this Chamber have interposed by their votes and by their speeches, and are now interposing by their silence and refusals to vote, to defeat the honest attempt of the democratic party to pass the necessary appropriation bills. Who are responsible for this delay?

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Oh, yes. My friend from Minnesota is always entitled to be heard.

Mr. McMILLAN. When was the Army bill called up in the Senate?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Is the Senator's memory so short that he has forgotten it?

Mr. McMILLAN. I should like to know when it was, if the Senator can tell me; and I should like to ask him whether his side of the Chamber have not spent this whole day in discussing this bill, and not permitted the minority to express their views on the subject?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Not by a long shot. We should have been perfectly willing to take the vote on this bill without any debate.

But, Mr. President, it is not worth while to attempt to conceal the fact; the people of the country will understand that the democratic party of the Senate to-day have been perfectly willing to vote the necessary supplies for the Army of the country; but there sits the republican minority on the other side of this Chamber persistently refusing to vote and thereby defeating a quorum sitting in their seats, and for the purpose of defeating a vote refusing to respond when they are called, contrary to the ancient usages and law of this body.

Mr. President, I do not intend to enter into any discussion upon the merits of the bill or the appeal taken from the decision of the Chair, but I want to call the attention of the country more emphatically to the action of the minority than it will be called by the simple record of the facts. I want, in other words, to emphasize what the record will disclose, that the republican minority in this Chamber are responsible for the delay in passing the necessary appropriation bill for the Army. If they had seen proper to indulge in debate on the political features of that bill, no one on this side of the Chamber would perhaps have questioned their right to do so; but we do question their right—by attempting to filibuster, by refusing to vote, by a persistent determination—to delay the appropriation bills; we do question their right as Senators, not their right as politicians, but their right as Senators, bound to aid in the legislation of the country, to obstruct legislation, and we arraign them before the intelligent judgment of the people for sitting persistently in their seats and refusing to vote upon questions necessary and essential to carry on the business of the Senate. I shall leave gentlemen to their own reflections. I am sure that the Senator from Maine, unless he is lost to all proper reflections with reference to such action, will, when he comes to reflect, coolly and calmly, regret the part he has taken to-night. He is a prominent parliamentarian, a gentleman occupying a high position not only in the Senate, but in the country, and when he comes to reflect upon the course which he and his political associates have pursued this evening, he will have cause to regret it, whether he feel at liberty to confess it publicly or not.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, differing as I do with the Senator from Delaware in almost everything he has said, I differ especially with his unwillingness to have the RECORD of to-day's proceedings go out in unusual numbers. I would be glad to have it go to every household in all this land; and I want now to put into it a statement which I would gladly have go with it.

Night before last, at the conclusion of the so-called judicial bill, more than the ordinary hour of adjournment of the Senate having been reached, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] rose and moved to take up the so-called Army appropriation bill. Inquiring his purpose, we found it was that yesterday morning it might be unfinished business. No Senator on this side objected, all promoted his purpose; and yesterday morning at the conclusion of the morning hour the Army bill was the unfinished business. The Senator from Virginia then requested that the reading of the bill be waived, that no preliminary reading take place, but that it be read by paragraphs and the amendments as reached considered. No Senator on this side objected. Then the Senator proposed that he and his committee should have precedence in considering their amendments and all of them. No Senator on this side objected; but during the whole day it was the right of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] and of every other Senator to debate the Army bill, and yet the committee had the right of way, and every Senator belonging to the minority promoted and facilitated expedition with the bill. When the clock indicated one quarter of five, the amendments of the committee were concluded. I indicated that I had some amendments which I wished to offer to the bill; another Senator on this side indicated at least one; and we signified a wish briefly to assign some reasons of objection to the measure as it is. That having been done, a motion was made to adjourn at a quarter before five, and it was promptly voted down, the Senator from Virginia who had the bill in charge heading the hunt on that occasion and voting down the motion to adjourn. A member of the Committee on Appropriations, a democratic member of this body, one of the Senators from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] thereupon took the floor and proceeded in a general political speech to recite and read that in Kentucky, festering with disloyalty, and martial law there proclaimed, most wholesomely in my opinion, troops were present near the polls, and on one occasion, of which he read, an officer rose and said that disloyal men must cease to vote at that poll, and thereupon, in the language of the document, nearly all the voters left. I was not surprised at that, although I was somewhat surprised that the Senator should bring forward for political purposes a statement containing such a confession. However, the Senator from Kentucky continued for some twenty minutes, and then he yielded to a motion to adjourn which promptly took place, nobody on this side objecting, and the adjournment being carried by the votes of democratic Senators.

Thus on this day at the end of the morning hour, the democratic Senator from Kentucky, who had occupied twenty minutes in a political speech yesterday, was entitled to the floor. Then the democratic Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] made to the Senate and made to me an appeal which for one I regret that I did not refuse. I have been annoyed since this monstrous and offensive proceeding which we have resisted, that I did not refuse an appeal which I was weak enough to listen to. He appealed to us to give way to allow him to proceed with his bill about levees upon the Mississippi. I rose and said that if time were to be subtracted from the beginning of the day, as we wished to debate the Army bill, I should repose on the courtesy of democratic Senators for the expectation and in the belief that no final vote would be pressed to-day. Looking to that side I received a nod, not from one, not from two, not from three, but from five democratic Senators. Thereupon the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] cautioned me not to rely upon his courtesy, and I promptly informed him that his courtesy was not the reliance upon which I rested; and the Senator from Virginia no doubt had technically and individually the right to do what has followed.

When a little more than thirty minutes after the morning hour had been consumed by the bill about the levees of the Mississippi, the Chair announced that the unfinished business was to be taken up and that the Senator from Kentucky was entitled to the floor. Thereupon the Senator from Kentucky proceeded to devour one hour and forty minutes of the Senate's time in a democratic political speech which he said was designed for the hustings in his State, but which he would regale the Senate by delivering. That over, a Senator on this side, the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] as I am told by an associate—I did not observe the clock—occupied exactly twenty-two minutes, at the end of which time the ornate and eloquent Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] proceeded with a very brilliant speech for something over two hours and sat down at ten minutes after six o'clock, the entire day save twenty-two minutes having been consumed by those two democratic speeches delivered, one by a democratic member of the Committee on Appropriations from which the bill came, and the other by the democratic Senator from Indiana.

Meanwhile the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] wished to address the Senate. I may remind the Senate how little time that Senator has consumed during this extra session. I may remind the Senate that that Senator has found himself suffering from ill-health, and I may remind the Senate that it was well known before he sought the floor that he wished to speak, not at undue length, upon the Army bill. I went to the Senator from Arkansas who now hears me, who then sat in the chair, [Mr. GARLAND,] and I said to him "if the Senator from Indiana is to occupy all day even to the hour of adjournment or afterward, I take it for granted no vote will be pressed to-day." If I do not quote that Senator correctly I hope he will set me right; he said "I suppose not; I wish myself to make a brief speech upon this bill, and if need be I will go down myself and see to it; I do not think there will be any such disposition." I spoke to three other Senators, two of whom are within the sound of my voice on the democratic side, and from each of them received assurance that there would be no question about an adjournment, the day having been occupied by these two democratic speeches. I so informed the Senator from Wisconsin who had borrowed the seat of his friend from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] on which his books and papers were, and carried them away and dismissed his preparation, and assumed as he had a right to do, that after a day of fasting and more than an hour after the customary hour of adjournment when the democrats had swallowed the whole day, he should not be subjected to a proceeding so insulting as to say to him that he must go on and deliver his argument then or he should not deliver it at all.

The Senator from Wisconsin had the floor, yielded to the Senator from Maine to read something from a book, and resuming it I at his request made a motion to adjourn, prefacing it with a statement that we had had no opportunity to debate this bill whatever and that therefore I assumed that there would be no objection. The Senator from Virginia rose with such a disclaimer as he had a right to make in order that he might keep within the bounds of his instruction from the committee; but when I heard every democratic Senator vote to commit such an outrage as that upon the minority of this body and upon the Senator from Wisconsin, I do not deny that I felt my full share of indignation; and during this evening, Mr.

President, I wish to assume all my own responsibility and so much more as any republican Senator feels irksome to him for what has taken place. I have endeavored to show this proud and domineering majority, determined apparently to ride rough-shod over the rights of the minority, that they cannot and they should not do it. But I am ready to be deemed responsible in advance for the assurance that while I remain a member of this body, and at all events until we have a previous question, no minority shall be gagged down or throttled or insulted by such a proceeding as this. I say, Mr. President (and I measure my expression) that it was an act not only insulting but an act of bad faith. I mean that.

Now, sir, one other word, and I have done. What is this Army bill? It is a juggle, in my opinion a contemptible juggle and subterfuge. It is an attempt, by indirection, by stealth, by trick, by an act which is to operate as a fraud, to do that of which we had high-sounding proclamation at the end of the last session. It is to compel the Executive and to compel the minority to pay the democratic party of this country a price as the condition on which they will make appropriations and allow the Government to live. That is what it is.

On what did we in the minority stand at the beginning of this session? On two ideas and only two that I could ever comprehend. First, that no political party should be allowed to take the Government by the throat and say to it "surrender, conditions and terms, to us, or the Government shall not exist;" and second, we stood upon the idea that the laws which our fathers made, which their children had preserved, which were to be found in the statute-books, were just and wholesome laws and that they should not be cloven down by any majority and especially by such a majority coming into power by any such means as mark the history of majorities in the two Houses of Congress in the year 1879.

We went to war upon those two issues. We took the responsibility before the country of confronting the democratic party on both of them. And now what? After twelve weeks of agitation, of anxiety, of disturbance in the country, after twelve weeks during which bill after bill originated in the democratic caucus has struck the rock of the Constitution and gone down where nothing but the hand of the resurrection will reach it, when the time has come that this majority dare not—dare not adjourn this session leaving the Government or the Army to languish or to starve, now when the whole battle has been fought, it is proposed, by trick, by artifice, by a juggle of words, to accomplish that which we have said and which the nation has said these members and Senators, majority though they be, shall not accomplish.

They have put in one section of this bill that none of the money appropriated shall be used to maintain any part of the Army employed to keep the peace at the polls. I do not stop to talk about what is a "police" It is what astronomers would call point without magnitude. There is nothing in it but a cheat. The operative words are "to keep the peace at the polls." They have said no part of the money shall be used for that, and they have said in another bill what a statute that speaks to-day has said already, namely that without the money appropriated, no contract shall be made, no obligation shall be incurred by which it can be done. Taking the two things together, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] said well to-day; he said well yesterday when he chose the word "negation" to describe what his associates had done. The Senator from Indiana said yesterday having been unable to accomplish the repeal of these laws, this bill was to accomplish their negation. That word is well chosen. "Negation" means to say no, to deny, to paralyze and it is for that that this sixth section was contrived. It was for that that men elsewhere were told and persuaded to believe that it was harmless for two reasons: first, because it said that troops should not be employed as a police, when for one hundred years in England, and always here, every lawyer has known and admitted that, except as a police, troops could not be used to enforce the laws at all—never until you get martial law as in Kentucky; and a great definer of words has said that martial law is the will of the commander. Inter arma silent leges. With martial law, troops as troops may act, an army as an army; but, the civil law speaking, troops are to act in the enforcement of laws as an auxiliary to the police; and were the hour earlier, I would read repeated decisions from the highest authorities both in England and in this country to show that the quality of the act, be the men soldiers or citizens, is identical, and the rights, the immunities, the liabilities are exactly the same in a given case whether the posse be of the yeomanry and the citizen or the militia or the regular soldiers of the realm. But for that reason it was said that this was harmless, and for another, and what was that? Why there are no national elections this year and no congressional elections known save in California and one in the Westchester district in New York. True, true.

Mr. President, it has been said that the devil is subtle but weaves a coarse web and this web when you come to look at it is coarse enough to be plainly discernible.

What is the purpose of these democrats? To induce as many republicans as possible in the House to vote for this bill with the sixth section; if possible to get republican votes for it here; but whether so or not, if possible to secure the executive signature. Then what? Next December the same majority is to be here, the same majority in the House, the same occupant of the executive chair; and when the same words for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, have been incorporated in the Army appropriation bill the President who signs it this year must sign it next; and thus for the year when all the elections in all the States for members of Congress and the presidential election, too, are to take place, the polls are to be naked to the State troops, the rifle clubs, the white-leaugers, the night-riders, and the demons who infest the Southern States, and they are to be exposed to all the thugs, the ruffians, and the mobs to be found in all the cities of the land.

That is this programme. That is what this majority means. That is what we mean to resist; that is what we mean to debate; and because we sought the privilege of uncovering this wrong, uncovering this act which in effect is to be a fraud if it succeeds, because we would debate it and expose it, we have been driven to that which Senators have been pleased to call filibustering. Mr. President, call it what you will; for one, I claim my part of the responsibility; for one I will take it as often upon a measure only half as iniquitous and monstrous as this is, I will take it as often as even half such a measure comes here and an attempt is made either by stealth to manage it through or by the brute force of numbers to gag it through the Senate.

So, Mr. President, I think with only these few moments for reflection, that I do not agree with the Senator from Delaware. I am quite content the RECORD should go out. I would be glad to have to-morrow's RECORD go containing what the Senator from Wisconsin, if he speaks like the lawyer he is, will say, what a pitiful attempt by introducing the word "police" to cheat and defraud the American people. I will vote for extra numbers of to-day's RECORD and to-morrow's RECORD.

So much, Mr. President, without having had the slightest purpose to do so or to say anything, I have been moved to say by the coaxing invitation of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. President, I desire to make one statement personal to myself in reference to this matter. I do not intend to go into the discussion of the question concerning this measure that the Senator from New York has been discussing. I learn for the first time that an impression exists on the mind of any Senator on this floor that further time was to be extended for the discussion of the bill which the Senator from Virginia reported, based upon any proceedings or upon any occurrence connected with the measure that I had the honor of reporting this morning and asked unanimous consent to consider and have passed. I am not aware of anything that occurred which would produce such an impression. If I had, although I would not have been instrumental consciously in producing such an impression, I should have felt myself bound by it and would have made the motion myself for an adjournment, in order to give the Senator from Wisconsin an opportunity to discuss this bill.

I repeat, sir, that if I had imagined that any Senator had any such expectation from anything that occurred in the incidents of that proceeding, it would have been my pleasure to have made that motion. In fact, sir, I was not here. I was not aware of the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin had risen for the purpose of addressing the Senate. I came in at a later stage of these proceedings.

With reference to the charge of bad faith that the Senator from New York has intimated toward those of us who have been engaged in opposing these motions to adjourn, I have only to say that if I am not superior to such attacks from such a source, I have lived in vain. It is not my habit to indulge in personalities; but I desire to say here to the Senator that in intimating anything inconsistent, as he has done, with perfect good faith, I pronounce his statement a falsehood, which I repel with all the unmitigated contempt that I feel for the author of it.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I was diverted during the commencement of a remark the culmination of which I heard from the member from Mississippi. If I understood him aright, he intended to impute, and did in plain and unparliamentary language impute, to me an intentional misstatement. The Senator does not disclaim that.

Mr. LAMAR. I will state what I intended, so that there may be no mistake——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. LAMAR. All that I——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LAMAR. He appealed to me to know, and I will give——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LAMAR. But the Senator declines to yield to me to know——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CONKLING. And I am willing to respond to the Chair. I shall respond to the Chair in due time. Whether I am willing to respond to the member from Mississippi depends entirely upon what that member intends to say, and what he did say. For the time being, I do not choose to hold any communication with him. The Chair understands me now; I will proceed.

I understood the Senator from Mississippi to state in plain and unparliamentary language that the statement of mine to which he referred was a falsehood, if I caught his word aright. Mr. President, this not being the place to measure with any man the capacity to violate decency, to violate the rules of the Senate, or to commit any of the improprieties of life, I have only to say that if the Senator,—the member, from Mississippi, did impute or intended to impute to me a falsehood, nothing except the fact that this is the Senate would prevent my denouncing him as a blackguard and a coward. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There shall be no cheering in the galleries. If there should be any more, the Chair will order the galleries to be cleared. The Senator from New York will proceed.

Mr. CONKLING. Let me be more specific, Mr. President. Should the member from Mississippi, except in the presence of the Senate, charge me, by intimation or otherwise, with falsehood, I would denounce him as a blackguard, as a coward, and a liar; and understanding what he said as I have, the rules and the proprieties of the Senate are the only restraint upon me.

I do not think I need to say anything else, Mr. President.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. President, I have only to say that the Senator from New York understood me correctly. I did mean to say just precisely the words, and all that they imported. I beg pardon of the Senate for the unparliamentary language. It was very harsh; it was very severe; it was such as no good man would deserve and no brave man would wear. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate must be in order; and there can be no cheering upon the Senate floor.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the question before the Senate, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is the appeal of the Senator from New York from the decision of the Chair ruling the motion of the Senator from West Virginia to be in order. The Senator from West Virginia moved that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators. The Senator from New York raised a question of order as to whether that motion was in order. The Chair decided that it was in order. The Senator from New York appealed from the decision of the Chair to the Senate, and that is the question now pending before the Senate.

Mr. HEREFORD. I move to lay the appeal of the Senator from New York from the decision of the Chair upon the table.

Mr. CARPENTER. I call for the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) The Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] is compelled to be absent this evening on account of illness in his family, and he requested me to pair with him, which I have done; and therefore I refrain from voting.

Mr. GORDON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MCMILLAN, (when Mr. MCPHERSON'S name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.]

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.] I have notified him that I desire to withdraw the pair, and have asked to be relieved. He sent me word that it was impossible for him to get here, and I observe the pair.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 25, nays 0; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Bayard,	Harris,	Lamar,	Vest,
Call,	Hereford,	McDonald,	Walker,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Maxey,	Windom,
Eaton,	Houston,	Pendleton,	Withers.
Garland,	Jonas,	Randolph,
Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Hampton,	Kernan,	Vance,

NAYS—0.

ABSENT—51.

Allison,	Chandler,	Hoar,	Plumb,
Anthony,	Cockrell,	Ingalls,	Ransom,
Bailey,	Coke,	Johnston,	Rollins,
Beck,	Conkling,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,
Bell,	Davis of Illinois,	Kellogg,	Saunders,

Cameron of Wis.,	Hamlin,	Paddock,	Williams.
Carpenter,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon the question to lay the appeal taken by the Senator from New York on the table, the yeas are 25 and the nays none.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the next question before the Senate?

Mr. HEREFORD. The execution of the order, I presume.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Is there a quorum present?

Mr. HEREFORD. There is no necessity for a quorum to execute the order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia make any motion?

Mr. HEREFORD. I did make the motion that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of the absent Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides, as the Chair has decided twice before, that if there is no motion made to transact any other business or to proceed to the order, the Chair will direct a call of the Senate. The Chair will now direct a call of the Senate, there having been no motion made, and the last call of the roll having disclosed that there was no quorum. Unless some motion is made the Chair is compelled to execute the order.

Mr. HEREFORD. I did make a motion, and that is what we have been at for the last two hours. I renewed it; although I did not think there was any necessity for renewing it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has decided repeatedly that the only order the Chair can make of his own motion is to order a call of the roll. If the Senator desires another course to be taken, he must make a motion.

Mr. HEREFORD. I ask that the motion I made shall now be put to the Senate; that is, that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of the absent Senators. That is the motion I made some two hours ago, and I now renew it if necessary; but there is no necessity for a renewal, because if it should be renewed the same thing would occur that has just taken place—an appeal from the decision of the Chair and a motion to lay the appeal on the table. The Senator from New York appealed from the decision of the Chair. I made a motion to lay that appeal upon the table. It has been laid upon the table. The question now recurs upon my motion; that is, that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be directed to request the attendance of the absent Senators, as disclosed by the roll-call. The motion has never been withdrawn.

Mr. CARPENTER. Nor has the appeal been withdrawn from the former ruling of the Chair.

Mr. HEREFORD. But, if the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me, the appeal was laid upon the table.

Mr. CARPENTER. No, it was not; there is the trouble.

Mr. HEREFORD. I beg your pardon.

Mr. CARPENTER. I beg yours. I understand that upon the question of laying the appeal upon the table no quorum voted. Consequently the appeal was never laid on the table, and is now pending before the Senate. I understand the facts of the proceeding to be that after the ruling made by the Chair the Senator from New York appealed; and then a Senator on the left moved to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. HEREFORD. I made that motion.

Mr. CARPENTER. Yes. The yeas and nays were called, and no quorum voted, and of course nothing was accomplished. The appeal was, therefore, not laid upon the table, but is still before the Senate, and is the pending question now.

Mr. HEREFORD. I think the Senator from Wisconsin certainly will see that he is in error. If his view of this matter should be carried out, as I said in the first argument that I made on the question, this rule is a nullity.

Mr. CARPENTER. That may be.

Mr. HEREFORD. I do not think the rules of the Senate are a nullity. If so, you might as well blot them out. When this motion was made what was the condition of the Senate? We had no quorum. Then the Senator from New York had the power, which he exercised, to appeal from the decision of the Chair, there being no quorum here. Then I moved to lay that appeal upon the table. If it takes a quorum to do that we never can have a call of the Senate, because if I were to renew that motion now a similar appeal would be taken, another discussion would take place, another vote would be taken, and the absence of a quorum would be again disclosed in the body. So that it would be again an endless chain.

There is no way to enforce the third rule in this body if you require a majority. The very object of my motion is to secure a majority of a quorum in this body. If the Senator from New York by an appeal from the decision of the Chair can do away with that, it is mere folly to make the motion. The very object of this whole proceeding is to get a quorum into this body.

If the President of the Senate thinks it will be necessary to renew the motion, I now renew it; but I do not think it necessary. If the President holds with me that there is no necessity for renewing the motion, which I hope he will, we shall go back to my original motion and the order will be made. But if the President should disagree with me, I renew the motion that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of the absent Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to adhere to the ruling in the former cases. In this case when the announcement was made that the yeas were 25 and the nays were none, the Senator from New York, before any other proceedings had been taken, called attention to the want of a quorum. Under that call and the former ruling of the Chair, the Chair will decide that it is his duty to have a call of the Senate, and the Chair therefore directs a call of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Is this to be a call of the roll to see who is here?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A call of the Senate to ascertain whether there is a quorum present or not.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand it to be a call of the roll and not a call of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING A call to see who is here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not a call of the Senate ordered by the Senate, but it is a call of the roll ordered by the Chair to ascertain whether there is a quorum present or not. The roll-call will proceed.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

The roll-call was concluded, the following Senators having answered to their names:

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Ingalls,	Randolph,
Blaine,	Eaton,	Jonas,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Groome,	Kernan,	Slater,
Call,	Hampton,	Logan,	Thurman,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harris,	McDonald,	Vance,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hereford,	McMillan,	Vest,
Carpenter,	Hill of Colorado,	Maxey,	Walker,
Cockrell,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,	Windom,
Conkling,	Houston,	Platt,	Withers.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to announce that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] is not here, and is paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. WITHERS. I wish again to announce that my colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON] is absent from the Senate in consequence of indisposition.

Mr. GORDON. I announce again that I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. BURNSIDE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] has been called home by the death of a friend. He is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this call of the Senate it is disclosed that there are thirty-six Senators present, which is not a quorum of the Senate.

Mr. HEREFORD. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Is it in order to have the absent Senators called first?

Mr. HEREFORD. I think not, Mr. President. The roll shows who the absentees are.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It shows no quorum, and I think the usual practice is to call the absentees.

Mr. HEREFORD. The rule says that all Senators present shall vote; and the presumption of law is that those who do not vote are absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll of the absentees will be called, pending the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

The Secretary called the names of the absentees, and the following Senators responded to their names:

Mr. BAILEY, Mr. GARLAND, Mr. GORDON, Mr. LAMAR, Mr. PADDOCK, and Mr. SAULSBURY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call of the absentees discloses the presence of forty-two Senators, which is a quorum of the body.

Mr. CARPENTER. What is the pending question, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] to lay the appeal of the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] upon the table.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, was there not a motion made by the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. HEREFORD. The motion that I made has not been exhausted. There are still absent Senators. The fact that the last call shows there is a quorum here does not dispense with the motion I made to bring the other absent Senators here. There are seventy-six Senators in this body and there are still thirty-four absent. My motion was to require the Sergeant-at-Arms to request the attendance of the absent Senators, and the last call shows that there are thirty-four absent Senators still.

Mr. BLAINE. It requires a majority of a quorum to make the order the Senator from West Virginia now moves.

Mr. HEREFORD. It makes no odds how many it takes. The gentleman may decline to vote again; that makes no difference; that does not dispense with the motion I have made. If Senators choose to refuse to answer again they have the right to do it, but that does not dispense with my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will decide that when a call is ordered by the Chair and a quorum is disclosed, the Chair cannot put of his own motion a motion previously made to require the presence of absent Senators when there is a quorum competent to do business. If the motion is made the Chair will put it to the Senate.

Mr. HEREFORD. I made a motion that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of the absent Senators. That order has not yet been carried out, and it can only be stopped by a motion to dispense with the call. The call was proceeding. The rule says:

> No Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave of the Senate first obtained. Whenever it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of the absent Senators, which order shall be determined without debate; and, pending its execution, and until a quorum shall be present, no motion, except a motion to adjourn, nor debate shall be in order.

The motion I made is not exhausted because there is at present a majority here. We still have a right to have that motion put to the Senators who are present. If not, there never can be a call of the Senate; it is an endless chain as I said before. If a minority is disclosed upon any vote and a motion is made similar to the one I made, and then the absentees are called, or the roll called again and a quorum is disclosed, as has been done on every occasion, then if the rule is correct that was invoked by the Senator from Maine a moment ago, we never can have a call of the Senate.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President——

Mr. CARPENTER. I move to lay the motion of the Senator from West Virginia upon the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman moves to lay the motion upon the table it is not debatable. I wanted to say a few words upon the question.

Mr. CARPENTER. Is that motion debatable?

Mr. CONKLING. No, the Senator says it is not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not debatable.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a point of order, and the point of order which I present is that it is not in order to move to lay upon the table a call of the Senate. A call of the Senate has been ordered, and the Senate cannot now lay it upon the table. There is but a single way to get clear of it, and that is by dispensing with further proceedings under the call of the Senate, but certainly it cannot be laid upon the table after the Senate have ordered the call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama will excuse the Chair in stating that the Senate has not yet been able to make any order touching that question. The Senate has not sustained any motion requiring the Sergeant-at-Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. CONKLING. That is the point exactly.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Presiding Officer, however, decides that a motion to lay on the table is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Presiding Officer, under Rule 2, has ordered the roll of the Senate to be called.

Mr. HOUSTON. Before the Presiding Officer decides that a call of the Senate is not necessary to be made by the Senate itself——

Mr. CARPENTER. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin will please state his point of order.

Mr. CARPENTER. My point of order is that having made a motion to lay the pending motion upon the table, it is not debatable until decided by the Chair and that decision appealed from.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not to make rules, only to construe those already made. If sufficient power has not been vested in the Senate or the Chair by the rules now existing the Chair cannot amend them or increase them or add to them by its decision. The Chair decided under Rule 2 that when a question was raised as to the presence of a quorum, it was the duty of the Chair to direct a call of the roll of Senators. The Chair applied his decision to a case where upon a yea-and-nay vote or a call of the Senate a quorum is disclosed, under Rule 3, which says:

> Whenever it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of the absent Senators.

The Senator from West Virginia made the motion, and the Chair decided it to be in order. The Senator from New York appealed from the decision of the Chair, and the Senator from West Virginia moved to lay the appeal of the Senator from New York from the decision of the Chair upon the table. On the vote upon the latter question it was disclosed that there was no quorum. Then no motion having been made, the Chair having been left to take action upon his own motion, the Chair directed a call of the roll of Senators.

Mr. HEREFORD. Will the Chair allow me to correct him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When the Chair is through with the statement he will hear the Senator from West Virginia. Upon a roll-call it was disclosed that there was a quorum present. Then the Senator from West Virginia made a motion that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators. The Senator from Wisconsin moved to lay that motion upon the table, and upon that the Senator from Alabama rose and raised a question of order, which the Chair has not decided. The Chair will now hear the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HEREFORD. That is where has arisen all the trouble, Mr. President.

Mr. CARPENTER. Must not the point of order raised by the Senator from Alabama be decided without debate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection to debate, the Chair would like to have information upon that point.

Mr. CARPENTER. The rule says the question shall be decided without debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I know the rule says the question shall be decided without debate. The Chair would like the Senator from Alabama to state his point of order distinctly so that the Senate can understand it. He has a right to state his point of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will not trespass upon the Senate on the subject, because my only purpose is to arrive at a proper construction of the rule. The point of order that I submit to the Chair is that there is nothing that can be laid upon the table. The Chair, if I may be allowed to state the facts with a view to make my point clear, decided, when a vote was taken and it was found that a quorum was not present, to have the roll called. When the Chair had directed the calling of the roll, even that did not disclose a quorum of the Senate. Then the Chair had complied with his construction of Rule 2, if that was all that was to be accomplished by calling the roll. But after that the Chair had the absentees called, which was really carrying out a call of the House. I ask, what is there that can be laid upon the table? The call of the House cannot be, the call of the roll cannot be, and what is it that can be laid upon the table? In all sincerity I present the point.

Mr. CARPENTER. When the call of the absentees disclosed the fact that a quorum of the Senate was present, conceding that the Senator from West Virginia could make a motion to send for the absentees, (which I do not concede because I think under the rule the only power of the Senate in that regard is in case of the absence of a quorum,) if the motion of the Senator from West Virginia was a proper motion, is there any doubt whatever that the Senate having a quorum present can lay that motion upon the table? Can a man make a motion that the Senate cannot lay upon the table? Can there be a bill, a resolution, a report, any proceeding, any motion, anything, that a majority of the Senate cannot lay upon the table? If there can be, it is a new rule to me. I never heard of such a thing.

Mr. EATON. Several things.

Mr. CARPENTER. Several things cannot be laid on the table?

Mr. EATON. One is a motion to adjourn. You cannot lay that on the table.

Mr. CARPENTER. That may be. The wily Senator from Connecticut, I see, is lying in wait to catch me in some indiscretion, and he has caught me. But a motion made like that of the Senator from West Virginia, which is not a motion to adjourn, I submit, can be laid on the table. Now the point of order raised that such a motion cannot be laid upon the table must be disposed of by the Chair without debate under the rule. Then anybody who wishes to debate it and is dissatisfied with the decision can appeal from the decision of the Chair when the question is open to debate.

Mr. HOUSTON. Before the Senator takes his seat I should like to put a question to him. I do not intend to violate the rules, and I do not want to debate the question if I am not permitted to do so. Why did the Chair order the absentees to be called?

Mr. CARPENTER. For the purpose of ascertaining whether there was then a quorum present.

Mr. HOUSTON. Under what authority could that be done unless it were a call of the House?

Mr. CARPENTER. Suppose it was a call of the House, it resulted just as everybody wanted it to result, in showing a quorum of the Senate present.

Mr. HOUSTON. If it was a call of the House, I repeat the question, how can that call be laid upon the table? It may be dispensed with.

Mr. CARPENTER. I will answer.

Mr. HOUSTON. But the main question I propose to the Senator from Wisconsin is, suppose a motion has been made by the Senator from West Virginia to send for absent members, can that be laid upon the table? I think not. But admit that it can, then what is the condition of the question? Suppose you lay that upon the table, and I should like to hear the gentleman upon that point. There is a call of the House pending, in process of being executed. If the anomaly can be presented of laying on the table a motion to go on with the execution of such an order, it seems very strange to me.

Mr. THURMAN and Mr. CARPENTER addressed the Chair.

Mr. CARPENTER. I simply wish to answer the question put to me by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask unanimous consent to make some observations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Ohio permit the Senator from Wisconsin to answer the question? He is entitled to the floor, and the Senator from Alabama asked him a question.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Senator from Wisconsin had the floor, and I interrupted him.

Mr. CARPENTER. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I ask unanimous consent to say a few words upon these rules upon which I have had to rule to-night. I do not know whether I have always ruled aright. It would be very strange if I had not sometimes fallen into error.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection the Senator from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. THURMAN. The trouble in this case arises wholly from the fact that Senators who are present refuse to vote. That is all there is of it. Now we have certain rules upon this subject. In the first place, we have the Constitution, which provides in article 1, section 5, that—

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner, and under such penalties, as each House may provide.

The first question that arose under that provision of the Constitution was, whether the "manner" here spoken of must not be previously provided. It never was contended that it must be provided by an act of Congress. Each House was obviously to decide for itself, but it was contended that the "manner" of compelling the attendance of absent members must be provided by some rule of the House, and then that rule must be observed, for the language is:

> But a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized—

"May be authorized;" that is a smaller number than a quorum—

> may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner, and under such penalties, as each House may provide.

It is not that less than a quorum had the inherent right to compel the attendance, but that when each House provided a manner for compelling the attendance of absent members, a manner which had been agreed upon by the House and not by a less number than a quorum, in that manner which had thus been provided, then a less number than a quorum might compel the attendance of absent members. That is the obvious meaning of the Constitution. It was not intended that less than a quorum should frame rules for the Senate, but when the Senate itself, having a quorum present, having provided rules for compelling the attendance of absent members, authorizing, in the language of the Constitution, less than a majority, less than a quorum, to compel that attendance, then less than a quorum might in pursuance of that authority—for that is the very word in the Constitution—compel attendance.

Mr. President, when I entered the Senate ten years ago no rule had been provided upon this subject. It was not until after I entered the Senate that a rule was provided prescribing any manner whatever. The Senate had gone upon the principle that every Senator would discharge his duty; that it was only necessary to call attention to the fact that his presence in the Senate was necessary to secure his attendance, if he had the physical ability to be here. Hence the universal practice from the foundation of the Government up to the adoption of the sixteenth and seventeenth rules, which are now in our Manual, and which were adopted only three years ago, was to send a message civilly requesting the attendance of an absent Senator. That was the practice of the Senate, and it usually had the effect of securing attendance. But when our rules were last revised the Committee on Rules saw fit to attempt to exercise the power conferred by the Constitution upon the Senate of prescribing the manner of authorizing (to use the language of the Constitution) less than a quorum to compel the attendance of absent Senators. How did they attempt to accomplish that purpose? They did it by Rule 3.

> No Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave of the Senate first obtained. Whenever it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present—> may direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel, the attendance of the absent Senators, which order shall be determined without debate; and pending its execution, and until a quorum shall be present, no motion, except a motion to adjourn, nor debate, shall be in order.

Which is a majority of less than a quorum—

That was the rule which was adopted by the Senate in order to comply with the provision of the Constitution to which I have referred. I beg leave to refer to that provision of the Constitution again. After providing that a majority shall constitute a quorum it says:

> But a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized—

A smaller number may be authorized. Authorized by whom? Authorized by the House. And in order to give that authority to a smaller number we have Rule 3, which says that when—

> A quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel, the attendance of the absent Senators, which order shall be determined without debate.

Then what is the mode of compelling the attendance of absent Senators? There is another rule that requires to be read, and that is Rule 2:

> If either at the commencement of any daily session of the Senate, or at any time during its daily sessions, a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the presiding officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll of Senators, and shall announce the result to the Senate; and these proceedings shall be without debate.

There no motion for a call is necessary; it is only necessary that a Senator shall suggest that there is no quorum present. Then it becomes the imperative duty of the President to order a call of the Senate. It is not the subject of a motion at all; it is a duty of the Chair to forthwith order a call of the Senate. He orders a call of the Senate; and suppose it appears that there is not a quorum of the Senate present upon that call; then comes Rule 3, which provides that—

> A majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel, the attendance of absent Senators.

That does require an order of the majority of the Senators present. That is not in the power of the Chair. It was the duty of the Chair to order the roll to be called. It appearing that there is not a quorum present, then it is for a majority of those present to determine what shall be done. They may adjourn if they see fit to do so, or they may make an order directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Upon the point of order raised by my friend from Alabama, or my friend from Wisconsin, it seems to me that a majority of those present may vote down the order to request the attendance of absent Senators on a direct vote. They may do the same thing by laying the motion upon the table. I do not think, therefore, the point of my friend from Alabama is well taken upon that subject.

But that does not reach the difficulty at all. It is not the fact that there is not a quorum present. There is a quorum present. Then comes the question, what are you to do when a quorum does not vote? When Senators sit in their seats and do not vote, what are you going to do then? In order to provide for that case Rules 16 and 17 were adopted by the Senate.

Mr. President, perhaps I ought to make a confession. A confession, it is said, is sometimes good for the soul. I do not know but that it was some rather contumacious conduct of mine some years ago that gave rise to Rule 17 as it now stands, when there were but seven or eight democrats in the Senate and sixty odd republicans. We would sit here night after night, (I do not mean successive nights, but again and again,) six or seven or eight democrats, who by our presence made a quorum, when a majority of the sixtv-odd republican Senators had gone to their beds. We got tired of it one night and the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] the former Senator from California, (Mr. Casserly,) and myself refused to vote. We sat in our seats around there in the northwest corner and refused to vote when our names were called. The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] rose in his place and called attention to the fact that we three had declined to vote. Had we voted there would have been a quorum; not voting there was not a quorum. The Senator from Delaware rose and inquired of the Chair whether under the rules it was his duty to vote. The Chair replied that in his opinion it was, and the Senator from Delaware thereupon voted.

Mr. BAYARD. I said I would not disobey the rule of the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, the Senator said he would not disobey the rule of the Senate, however hard he thought it to be. My somewhat gallant Irish friend, Mr. Casserly, and I were obstinate and did not vote. We wanted to know what was to be done with us, and we did not vote. In the mean time the messengers went out. A quorum came into the Senate and nothing further was said upon the subject; the bill was passed, and there was an end of it. That called attention to the matter, because Senators began to reflect upon it and ask, "Is there any way of compelling a Senator to vote?" How can you compel a Senator to vote? You may censure him for not voting; in an extreme case you may expel him for not voting, perhaps, if you first prescribe a rule that he shall be subject to expulsion for not voting. It is not very well to make the law and the sentence in the same breath. If you have prescribed by a rule that a Senator who contumaciously refuses to vote shall be subject to expulsion, if that would be a constitutional rule, then you may enforce it. But I thought then, and I think yet, I am free to say, that you must make your law before you give judgment under it. But when they came to revise these rules our Committee on Rules undertook to provide for it, and they provided the sixteenth and seventeenth rules. The sixteenth rule had existed before substantially as it is now. The seventeenth rule was intended to compel Senators to vote. The sixteenth rule reads:

> When the yeas and nays shall be called for by one-fifth of the Senators present, each Senator, when his name is called, shall, unless for special reasons he be excused by the Senate, declare openly and without debate his assent or dissent to the question.

And that was the old rule before this revision, and that was all before the revision; and then came the seventeenth rule, which is the new rule that was introduced to meet cases of such contumacious fellows as Casserly and I:

> When a Senator, being present and declining to vote when his name is called, shall be required to assign his reasons therefor, and shall so assign them, the presiding officer shall thereupon submit the question to the Senate: "Shall the Senator, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting?" which shall be decided without debate. And these proceedings shall be had after the roll shall have been called and before the result of the vote is announced; and any further proceedings by the Senate in reference thereto shall be after such announcement.

Now observe, "when a Senator, being present and declining to vote when his name is called," the sixteenth rule having declared that he shall vote unless he is excused, "shall be required to assign his reasons therefor"—that is, his reasons for not voting—the first question that arises under this rule is, who is to require him to assign his reasons? Manifestly the President of the Senate has no right to do it, it seems to me. I should think it was a usurpation of power on the part of the President to demand of a Senator why he did not vote, and to assign his reasons. The requirement upon him to assign his reasons must be by a vote; and, mark, this rule applies to the case of a full Senate, where a quorum has voted, just as much as it does to a case where there is less than a quorum. There are seventy-six Senators now in this body. If seventy-five of them had voted and one had sat in his seat and not voted, a Senator might rise and move that that Senator be required to state the reasons why he did not vote; and having stated the reasons, then comes the duty of the Chair to submit the question, "Shall the Senator, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting?" It is not a question about the want of a quorum at all. It is a question about the performance of his duty by a Senator, his duty to vote. That is what this rule is.

Mr. BLAINE. I beg pardon of the Senator. You could not run a parliamentary body in the world on that construction.

Mr. THURMAN. That is the fault of the people who made our rule; but that is the rule.

Mr. BLAINE. That same rule exists elsewhere, but was never so construed. The point is that when a quorum votes, that is the end of the matter. All these are made as the measures to secure a quorum; but when the quorum has voted the end is reached. Apply that rule in this Senate; apply that rule to the House of Representatives.

Mr. THURMAN. I will show the Senator in two minutes that his rule will not do. We have a disability bill here. It requires two-thirds of the Senate to pass it; a quorum does vote, but it requires two-thirds. If all the Senators would vote there might be two-thirds to pass the bill, but a quorum does vote and there are not two-thirds. Why in the world cannot there be a requirement upon a Senator sitting in his seat and not voting, that he shall vote?

Mr. BLAINE. The honorable Senator does not vary it at all because the law requires that on questions of that kind two-thirds shall be a quorum.

Mr. THURMAN. No; it does not require it to be a quorum at all. It requires two-thirds to pass the bill. Less than two-thirds, a majority, is a quorum. So, Mr. President, upon that subject the question whether or not a Senator shall be required to state his reasons why he does not vote, is a matter to be determined by the Senate. But whether the Senator from Maine be right or whether I be right, we have not still got to the chief difficulty, and I want to call the attention of my friends to it. Suppose you have gone through all that these rules require, and a Senator gives his reasons and the Senate considers that those reasons are insufficient and refuses to excuse him, what then are you to do with that Senator? Can you without having previously provided, as the Constitution requires, any rule upon this subject, expel the Senator? What can you do in a case like that?

I say, Mr. President, that it does seem to me the case is perfectly clear. If the Senate intends to visit punishment upon Senators for not voting, the Senate must prescribe by rule what shall be the case that subjects them to the punishment and what the punishment shall be. That has been my idea, that was my idea when I was in a little minority eight years ago and refused to vote. It is my idea still. It is not changed at all by the change in the majority of the Senate. I do not deny the power of the Senate to visit with penalties the refusal of a Senator sitting in his seat to vote. I can conceive a case in which a Senator might well be excused from voting, and I have no doubt that in every case in which he ought to be excused the Senate would have the justice to excuse him. I can conceive of plenty of cases in which he would not be excused at all, in which the course that he takes is not the course that in the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution was the duty of an American Senate. That I can well enough conceive. But before you begin to visit penalties upon Senators for refusing to vote you must, in my judgment, prescribe the offense and prescribe the penalty. That is the way I look at it; and therefore I say to my friends here to-night, your rules are not such that you can compel these gentlemen to vote. You cannot do it under the existing rules. You may censure them in your thought, in your judgment, in your speeches before the people. You may hold them up for the condemnation of the American people for sitting in their seats here and refusing to discharge that duty for which the States sent them here, and which the Constitution intended they should perform. You may do that; but when it comes to punishment, when it comes to visiting a judgment of censure or expulsion upon them, you must first make your law before you give judgment.

That is the view I have of it, and I should not think that any legislative body would be safe if it were otherwise. Having once been guilty myself perhaps makes me a little sensitive about it, but I would not like a bare majority of the Senate of the United States, in a case in which I felt that I was justified in the course that I took, make the law and the punishment in the same breath. I do not think that would be right, sir.

Then we might as well understand this business first as last, and I speak from a somewhat long experience, Mr. President. I have been one of a very small minority who have delayed action upon bills here for a long time. I remember once when there were not a dozen of us here, when we held sixty-odd republican Senators for twenty-one hours before we let them pass a bill. I remember that very well; but this I will say in respect to that, that we did not do it by breaking a quorum, with the single exception which I have confessed, which was remedied in less than fifteen minutes by sending to the committee-rooms where republican members were lying on the lounges and asleep. With that single exception I recollect of no instance—it may be my memory is at fault—in which we delayed the passage of a bill by breaking up a quorum by sitting in our seats and refusing to vote. I recollect no such case as that. The way that we did was to do much talking. We talked upon the bill; we moved amendments to give us a chance to talk upon it, to get rid of the rule that said no Senator should speak more than twice on the same question; and we moved a still further amendment, and the Chair ruled, I remember extremely well for it was on my motion, that that made a new subject and we might speak twice on that; that was allowing indefinite debate, and we talked, we talked against time, we talked in every way until we had exhausted ourselves and the patience of everybody else and then the bill passed.

This is a new idea which has been inaugurated to-night, this thing which in slang language is called filibustering. I never saw it in the Senate of the United States before in the shape in which it has been practiced to-night, never, never. I have known bills talked to death by the hour all the long night and until way into the succeeding day; I have known much time consumed in that way to the infinite annoyance of the majority; but the course of first a motion to adjourn and a call of the yeas and nays on that, and then a motion to dispense with the call of the Senate and then the yeas and nays on that, and then this dilatory motion and that dilatory motion, has never belonged to this end of the Capitol, according to my knowledge or information, until this night.

I am very sorry, indeed, to see it. I have taken great pride in the Senate of the United States as not only a body of men of experience and reputation and ability, and most of them well stricken in years, but a body that never saw it necessary to establish stringent rules, but relied upon the sense of duty, the honor, and the courtesy of its members, to conduct its business with decorum and for the public service. Such a thing as that filibustering, as the slang phrase is, which is said to take place elsewhere, is a stranger in this Chamber, as I think, until this night. But it is a matter for every Senator to decide for himself. He decides it on his responsibility to his own conscience and to his own constituents and to our common country. He must decide it for himself. All I have to say to my friends is, do what you will, enforce what rules you will, when you undertake to sit out a bill, it is simply a question of physical endurance, whether its passage is to be delayed by long speeches or by dilatory motions; try it any way you will, when you come to consider it, it is nothing but a question of physical endurance. If you have the endurance, well and good; sit out the bill. If the other side, those who are opposed to the bill have more physical endurance than you have, they will defeat you. If not, you will defeat them.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the question, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia, after it was announced that there was a quorum of the Senate present answering to the call, moved that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the presence of absent Senators. The Senator from Wisconsin moved to lay that motion on the table. A question of order was raised upon that motion by the Senator from Alabama, and by unanimous consent the discussion has been had which has taken place.

Mr. CONKLING. Has the Chair decided the question of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has not decided the question of order. Does the Senator from Alabama insist upon his question of order?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, sir; I have no doubt of its correctness. A call, either ordered by the Senate or by call of the Presiding Officer, may be rejected, but it cannot be laid on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia, after it was disclosed that there was a quorum, made his motion to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request the presence of the absent Senators, there already being a quorum present, as disclosed by the roll-call. Now there is a quorum to transact business, the business of the Senate to pass a law not requiring a two-thirds vote. The Senator from Wisconsin in that state of the case moves to lay that motion on the table. The Senator from Alabama raises a question of order, and the Chair overrules the question of order and decides that the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin is in order and is the pending question.

Mr. CARPENTER. On which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On which a call was made for the yeas and nays, but the Chair did not understand that the call had been sustained. The Chair will now put the question on seconding the call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to lay the motion of the Senator from West Virginia on the table, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MCMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I desire to state as my reason for not voting that I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON,] and under the usages of the Senate it would be a breach of honor to vote in such a case.

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) Having paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] who is not present, I shall not vote.

The roll-call was concluded; and the result was announced—yea 1, nays 25; as follows:

YEA—1.

Carpenter.

NAYS—25.

Bailey,	Hampton,	Kernan,	Slater,
Bayard,	Harris,	Lamar,	Vance,
Call,	Hereford,	McDonald,	Walker,

Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Plumb,	Windom.
Chandler,	Hoar,	Ransom,
Coke,	Ingalls,	Rollins,

Mr. CARPENTER. No quorum voting.

Mr. HEREFORD. I presume the question will now recur on my original motion that the Sergeant-at-Arms be required to request the presence of absent Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia make that motion? The Chair decides that the question does not recur upon it unless the Senator renews the motion. There is no quorum now present.

Mr. HEREFORD. Then I suppose I shall have to renew the motion, and then the Senator from Wisconsin will move to lay that on the table, and then the result will be the same, and I shall have to make the same motion I first made, the motion which I have just indicated. The Senator from Wisconsin moved to lay that upon the table. It has always occurred to me when a member of the Senate makes a motion and another Senator moves to lay that on the table and that motion fails, the original motion recurs as a matter of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there were a quorum, it would. There is no question of that.

Mr. HEREFORD. A quorum! We are trying to get a quorum. We never can get a quorum on earth in this way.

Mr. CARPENTER. I rise to a point of order. I claim that this debate is not in order.

Mr. HEREFORD. I do not see why it is not in order.

Mr. CARPENTER. Because there is not a quorum here and no business can be done.

Mr. HEREFORD. There has been a great deal said to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia moves that the Sergeant-at-Arms be required to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. CONKLING. And that is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. CARPENTER. I move to lay this motion on the table, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EATON. One word only. Is that motion in order? I simply wish to be permitted to make a suggestion. In the first place, what is the object of the rules?

Mr. CARPENTER. I object to debate.

Mr. EATON. They are to further public business. That is all; nothing else in the world.

Mr. CARPENTER. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the point of order?

Mr. CARPENTER. This motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. EATON. I am not discussing the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has risen to a point of order whether the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to lay on the table is in order, and is stating the point of order.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is not any more debatable than this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He is stating the point of order, and the Chair cannot prescribe the number of words in which the statement shall be made.

Mr. EATON. I am stating my point of order. Under parliamentary rules I say this motion cannot be entertained. Why? Because it tends not to further, but to absolutely obstruct the public business, and, therefore, the rule that permits the laying of a motion on the table does not apply to a motion of that character. Hence I make the objection. I did not hear the ruling of the Chair. If I had, perhaps I would not have made the suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will announce, as he has once announced before, that it is not for the Chair to make the rules of the Senate. It is simply for the Chair to decide under the rules which have already been made. The Chair decides as it has heretofore decided, that the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin is in order. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] I do not know how he would vote on this question, and therefore I refrain from voting.

Mr. MCMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.]

The roll-call was concluded, and the result was—yeas 0, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—0.

NAYS—26.

Bailey,	Hampton,	Kernan,	Ransom,
Bayard,	Harris,	Lamar,	Slater,
Beck,	Hereford,	McDonald,	Vance,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is lost.

Mr. MAXEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I do not pretend to understand the rules, but I should like to understand this. The fact was made known by the vote upon the pending measure that a quorum was not present. A motion was then made to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request the absent Senators to attend. A motion was made to lay that on the table. How is it possible for that motion to lay on the table to be in order where there is no Senate to act upon it? That is a point that it is impossible for me to understand.

Mr. HEREFORD. I now renew the motion that I made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has made no decision upon the point made by the Senator from Texas, but the Chair announced that the motion to lay on the table was lost, and the question now recurs upon the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HEREFORD. That is exactly the position I contended for some time ago. The question now recurs on my original motion.

Mr. CARPENTER. I understand that the last action showed the want of a quorum in this body, and the next step must be to call the roll to ascertain who is present and who is absent before any order can be made for the Sergeant-at-Arms to go for absent Senators.

Mr. MAXEY rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state its decision now.

Mr. MAXEY. I wish to answer what the Senator from Wisconsin said.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas will proceed.

Mr. MAXEY. There is nothing in Rule 3 which requires——

Mr. CONKLING. This is all out of order.

Mr. MAXEY. There is nothing in Rule 3 which requires the roll to be called——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decided before upon the motion of the Senator from Tennessee and the motion of the Senator from West Virginia directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to request the presence of absent Senators, which motions were made by them after it was disclosed to the Senate that there was a quorum present, that it was necessary to have a quorum to carry such a motion. Now, here is the fact disclosed that there is no quorum present. The Senator from West Virginia then moves a call of the Senate. That call can be sustained by a majority of a minority of the Senate. The motion was made by the Senator from Wisconsin to lay that motion of the Senator from West Virginia on the table. A majority of a quorum of the Senate, 25 nays, decided not to lay that motion on the table, and the Chair decides that that majority prevailed; and, prevailing, the question recurs upon the motion of the Senator from West Virginia. In the cases where the Chair decided before that the motion did not prevail, it was where the motion made by the Senator from Tennessee and made by the Senator from West Virginia was made after it was disclosed that there was a quorum present. It is an entirely different state of facts from what now exists.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Chair to state the question.

Mr. HEREFORD. I believe it is to be decided without debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has a right to ask a parliamentary question, and the Chair will hear the question.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire the Chair to state the question that we may know what the motion of the Senator from West Virginia is. I have been absent from the Chamber for a few moments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was disclosed that there was no quorum present in the Senate. The Senator from West Virginia then moved that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators. The Senator from Wisconsin moved to lay that motion on the table, and upon that motion it was decided to be in order. The yeas and nays were ordered, and it was not laid upon the table, as the Chair stated, by a vote of 25, a majority of all the Senators present; and now the Chair has announced that the question recurs upon the motion of the Senator from West Virginia, which is still the pending motion, and that is the question now before the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. ALLISON. And that is, how the Sergeant-at-Arms can know under the motion of the Senator from West Virginia who are the absentees. Certainly that is not disclosed by the last vote, as I was present and stated distinctly that I did not vote because I was paired with the Senator from Maryland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I do not conceive that it is the duty of the Chair to answer all imaginable questions about the performance of duty, which may be submitted. Were he required to do so, he would state that the Sergeant-at-Arms is not blind and can very easily see who are present in the Senate and can tell from the roll-call those who did not answer to their names. The roll-call has already been made; that roll-call can be furnished to him; he will see there the names of those who did not answer. The record shows those who were present and announced themselves paired.

Mr. CONKLING. What record?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The record which is being made.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Sergeant-at-Arms understand shorthand?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That can be furnished him if necessary for his information. It will show that a certain number of Senators announced their presence by their votes, a certain other number announced that they were paired, although present, and it will be the other Senators that the Sergeant-at-Arms will request the attendance of.

Mr. ALLISON. Is that a very satisfactory answer, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. CARPENTER. Is that debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not debatable.

Mr. HEREFORD. Rule 3 says it shall be decided without debate.

Mr. CARPENTER. All questions to-night that have not been debatable have been debated at the pleasure of everybody that wanted to debate them. Now, I ask permission of the Senator from West Virginia to say three words about this thing.

Mr. HEREFORD. Certainly, I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides that this is not debatable, but anything can be done by unanimous consent. If there be no objection, the Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. CARPENTER. The question here is whether the roll-call on my motion to lay this motion of the Senator from West Virginia on the table is a record conclusively showing who is here and who is not here. Of course it shows that those who voted were here; but does it show anything else? Does it show that those who did not vote are absent Senators?

The rule does not say that if any Senator being present refuses to vote the Sergeant-at-Arms shall collar him and make him vote, or request him to come into the Senate Chamber. It does not apply to the case at all. There is no case here of absent Senators ascertained, and cannot be until the Chair directs, or the Senate directs that absentees shall be called. The fact that gentlemen are in the Chamber and do not vote is, as the Senator from Ohio just said, in construing the rules, a case not provided for by the rules under which the Senate is now seeking to act. It is not that case at all. The men you want to reach are here; they are not absent, and a roll-call of the absentees will disclose that fact, and the Chair by simply opening its eyes and looking around the Chamber can see that they are not absent. What a farce then is it!

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin, if he will permit me, is it not the universal rule in making up the record that every one who does not vote is marked on the record as "absent?"

Mr. CARPENTER. No, sir; he is marked as "absent or not voting." It may be either; so that your record when it is made up to-morrow on these questions will simply show that I, for instance, was either absent or not voting, but it will not show which. Now, I say that fact must be ascertained; I say it is an absurdity to order the Sergeant-at-Arms to go out and request the attendance of Senators that the Chair can see in their seats; and that is not what is wanted here. What the majority want is to send the Sergeant out and request them to vote, not attend. They are attending. They are here now, and the Chair can see them now, as I am addressing the Chair now, and still the Senator from West Virginia proposes to have the Sergeant go out and request me to come in. It is an absurdity because it is a contradiction. It is dealing with a false pretense, a false case, a case that does not exist. If I was not here it would do to call me in, but when I am here and simply do not vote, what an absurdity it is to say that you can send the Sergeant out to ask me to come in! I have been in all night, been in all day.

Mr. MAXEY. That is the way it is marked on the RECORD. I only refer to what the RECORD shows "absent." I think you will find it everywhere that way.

Mr. CONKLING. The Journal is the record of the Senate.

Mr. CARPENTER. The Journal always shows, is required by law to show, how many vote "yea," how many vote "nay," and how many are "absent or not voting."

Mr. MAXEY. It is the same way it is there.

Mr. CARPENTER. No, this is a modern thing.

Mr. THURMAN. The Journal only shows the yeas and nays.

Mr. CARPENTER. On page 18 of this very RECORD handed to me it is called "yeas 36, nays 73, not voting 29."

Mr. HEREFORD. That is in the House where they have a very different roll.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then I am mistaken about that; but it does not touch the argument I have made here, to show that it is simply absurd to send the Sergeant out to ask me to come in when I am here protesting that I am here. When you bring me here you admit you have got through; I take the admission of the learned Senator from Ohio to be the correct statement of the law on this subject; I have no doubt of it. I always held that to be as he did when the things were reversed, and his little squad which he led here with such consummate ability and in such thorough discipline for so many sessions held the republican Senate at bay day after day and night after night, and when, as he says himself, driven to extremities he stood on his reserved rights and concluded that he would not vote.

Mr. THURMAN. Only once.

Mr. CARPENTER. Well once; and we all came to the conclusion that there was no way to compel him. Now the Senate is no stronger under its present rules than it was then; and when you want to make a man vote how absurd it is to make a motion that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall request him to come in when he is in! You have called his name; he hears it; but for some reason,—he has not perhaps made up his mind, or else he does not take any interest in the subject, he does not care which way it is decided,—he does not vote. You are not going to make him vote by asking the Sergeant-at-Arms to invite him in when he is in. That is simply absurd.

Mr. HEREFORD. That is a long three words. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARPENTER. I have stated my objection to this proceeding.

Mr. HEREFORD. I call for the vote. The rule is that it shall be decided without debate.

Mr. CARPENTER. I think I have the floor by unanimous consent. I do not want it understood that I am compelled to keep it for I do not want it.

Mr. HEREFORD. "Three words" were all the Senator from Wisconsin wanted.

Mr. CARPENTER. Three words are enough. Under this proceeding it is a farce on its face.

Mr. McMILLAN. I should like to make an inquiry of the Chair in reference to the decision which was announced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hear the inquiry.

Mr. McMILLAN. As I understand the state of the facts, the Senator from West Virginia moved that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the presence of absent Senators; and the Senator from Wisconsin moved to lay that motion upon the table. Now, do I understand the Chair to decide that the motion to lay on the table voted upon by less than a quorum disposes of the motion to lay on the table?

Mr. HEREFORD That is exactly what is decided.

Mr. McMILLAN. As I understood the Chair on other occasions, he decided that the motion to lay on the table could not be disposed of by less than a majority of a quorum, but that the motion of the Senator from West Virginia might be disposed of in that way. The motion to lay on the table, as I understood the decision, was one that could only be disposed of when there was a quorum of the Senate present.

Mr. HEREFORD. Now, Mr. President, I ask that the rule be enforced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will answer the inquiry of the Senator from Minnesota as he has answered it on two or three occasions heretofore. The Senator from Tennessee made the first motion to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request the presence of absent Senators. That motion was made after it was announced by the Chair and disclosed by the roll-call that there was a quorum of the Senate present. The Senator from West Virginia, under precisely the same circumstances, made his motion to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request the presence of absent Senators when there was a quorum already in the Senate; and in those two cases the Chair decided that it took a majority to lay those motions on the table or to decide them. Now, in the case pending there was a roll-call, a vote, and it was disclosed that there was no quorum present. Then it was that the Senator from West Virginia, under Rule 3, made his motion. That rule declares:

> Whenever it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of the absent Senators, which order shall be determined without debate; and, pending its execution, and until a quorum shall be present, no motion, except a motion to adjourn, nor debate, shall be in order.

The Senator from Wisconsin made his motion to lay on the table, which the Chair decided was in order as in all cases, except probably in the case of a motion to adjourn, and upon the motion to lay on the table the yeas were none and the nays were 25, and the Chair decided that a majority of the Senators present voting in the negative the motion failed and that the question now recurs on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. WITHERS. May I make an inquiry of the Chair? The Chair has decided repeatedly, and I think correctly, that upon a motion to lay on the table a majority only can decide it. Am I correct in that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has decided, as he has three times now explained in the Senate, that when a motion is made to require the Sergeant-at-Arms to request the presence of absent Senators when there is already a quorum to transact the business of the Senate then any motion affecting that motion must be decided by a quorum of the Senate; but when we are proceeding under Rule 3 and the proceedings are confined to that, then a majority of the Senators present decide a motion to lay upon the table, or to adjourn, or any kindred question.

Mr. WITHERS. The point I wished to call the attention of the Chair to was this, that any question which it requires a majority vote to decide should not be considered in the absence of a majority, and that when the preceding vote disclosed no quorum and a motion is made to proceed under the rule to secure a quorum on that motion being submitted and it is then moved to lay that motion upon the table, you are asking a House which is not a House to transact business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has decided no such thing. As he now states for the fourth time, when such a motion was made with a quorum of the Senate present the Chair decided that it required a quorum to do any business, but when the motion was made in the absence of a quorum, as the rule requires a majority of the Senators present to make the direction, then a majority of those present can decide a motion to lay on the table, or a motion to adjourn, or a motion to go into executive session.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, let us look at the facts as they occurred. A motion was made to adjourn——

Mr. CONKLING. Is this debate in order?

Mr. WITHERS. It is a parliamentary inquiry as to a question of order that I am propounding. Upon that motion to adjourn there was no quorum voting. The Senator from West Virginia moved then that the absentees be sent for, and the Senator from Wisconsin moved to lay that motion on the table. The last vote indicated no quorum. The motion of the Senator from West Virginia proposed to institute proceedings to secure a quorum, and the Senator from Wisconsin moved to lay that upon the table. I suppose that that motion is not in order according to my conception of parliamentary law, the fact being that you are proposing to submit it to a House in which it is disclosed that there is no quorum present——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator answer the Chair what motion is not in order?

Mr. WITHERS. The motion to lay on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion has long since been decided, and is not before the Senate.

Mr. WITHERS. I am speaking on that question. The question has been before the Senate half a dozen times to-night in the same form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Only once in the case just decided, and the Chair decided that a majority of the Senators present disposed of the motion just as the Chair would decide that a majority of the Senators present would dispose of a motion to adjourn or a motion to go into executive session.

Mr. HEREFORD. Now I hope we shall have a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. CONKLING. What is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from West Virginia that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the presence of absent Senators. That is the question.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE,] as I have stated several times, and therefore refrain from voting.

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. McPHERSON.]

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GORDON. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 0; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Bailey,	Harris,	Lamar,	Slater,
Call,	Hereford,	McDonald,	Vance,
Carpenter,	Hill of Georgia,	Maxey,	Walker,
Eaton,	Jonas,	Morgan,	Withers.
Garland,	Jones of Florida,	Pendleton,
Hampton,	Kernan,	Randolph,

NAYS—0.

ABSENT—54.

Allison,	Coke,	Houston,	Rollins,
Anthony,	Conkling,	Ingalls,	Saulsbury,
Bayard,	Davis of Illinois,	Johnston,	Saunders,
Beck,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Bell,	Dawes,	Kellogg,	Teller,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	Kirkwood,	Thurman.

Bruce,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Voorhees,
Burnside,	Gordon,	McPherson,	Wallace,
Butler,	Groome,	Morrill,	Whyte,
Cameron of Pa.,	Grover,	Paddock,	Williams,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hamlin,	Platt,	Windom.
Chandler,	Hill of Colorado,	Plumb,
Cockrell,	Hoar,	Ransom,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion prevails, and the Sergeant-at-Arms will proceed to its execution.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I rise to ask a parliamentary question. What is he to proceed to execute; those who are shown absent by this roll-call, or those shown absent by some other roll-call, unless the absentees are called to ascertain?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair cannot decide all these questions until the officer's report is made, and then it will be for the Senate to determine whether he has properly executed the order of the Senate.

Mr. CARPENTER. He cannot notify me, I think.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] is absent from the Senate by indisposition, and I hope he will not be disturbed by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote has long since been announced by the Chair, and the Chair cannot receive votes.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to ask that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] be excepted from the absentees on account of sickness in their families.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair cannot make that order.

Mr. GARLAND. I make that request so that it may go on the record.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to announce that the Senator from Michigan

[Mr. CHANDLER] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. RANSOM. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] paired with me this evening. He was not strong enough to stay in the Senate all night.

Mr. BLAINE, (at two o'clock and forty minutes a. m., Thursday, June 19.) Mr. President, as nature abhors a vacuum, I ask what is the matter pending before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is waiting upon the report of the Sergeant-at-Arms in execution of the order of the Senate.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I understand the roll discovers the absence of a number of Senators on the other side of the Chamber who are at a great distance from Washington and cannot be here to-night. The Sergeant-at-Arms will have an opportunity of reporting to-morrow, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to take a recess until twelve o'clock to-morrow that we may get a little rest; I mean twelve o'clock to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate take a recess until twelve o'clock noon. Is the Senate ready for the question?

The Chair put the question and declared the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. ALLISON. I must ask for a division on that question.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 8, noes 13.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is lost.

Mr. ALLISON, (at two o'clock and forty-eight minutes a. m.) Mr. President, in order to complete the record I desire to state that about nine o'clock I made a motion to adjourn which I understand has never been announced by the Chair as having been decided. I merely want to complete the record and have it appear that a motion was made to adjourn and it still stands undecided. I should like to know of the Chair what ought to be done in such a case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to adjourn was voted down.

Mr. ALLISON. But it was not so declared.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was distinctly and repeatedly declared by the Chair.

Mr. ALLISON. But I am speaking now about a motion made about five hours ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not remember the circumstance.

Mr. ALLISON. The Chair thinks it is hardly worth while to make any point upon that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (at three o'clock a. m.) The Chair will submit to the Senate the report of the Sergeant-at-Arms made in pursuance of the order of the Senate. It will be read by the Secretary.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the President of the Senate:

SIR: In obedience to the order of the Senate in regard to requesting the attendance of absent Senators, I would respectfully report that the Secretary reported as absent the following Senators, to wit:

Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Beck, Bell, Blaine, Booth, Bruce, Burnside, Butler, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chandler, Coke, Conkling, Davis of Illinois, Davis of West Virginia, Dawes, Edmunds, Farley, Ferry, Gordon, Groome, Grover, Hamlin, Hill of Colorado, Hoar, Houston, Ingalls, Johnston, Kellogg, Kirkwood, Logan, McMillan, McPherson, Morrill, Paddock, Platt, Plumb, Rollins, Saulsbury, Saunders, Sharon, Teller, Thurman, Vest, Voorhees, Wallace, Whyte, Williams, and Windom.

I found in the Senate Chamber and adjoining cloak-room Senators Bayard, Blaine, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conkling, Davis of West Virginia, Gordon, Groome, Hill of Colorado, Houston, Ingalls, Logan, Paddock, Ransom, Rollins, Vest, and Windom.

Reported paired: Senators Allison, Edmunds, Ferry, McMillan, Saulsbury, and Thurman.

R. J. BRIGHT,
Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to state that there is some inaccuracy in regard to my absence from the Senate Chamber. At the time the call was made my name was called and I rose to answer and subsequently proposed to record my name. I desire merely to state the fact that I was not absent at any time from the Senate Chamber this evening.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I want to state the same fact.

Mr. BLAINE. For myself, I have not been absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has the floor, and the Chair cannot hear but one Senator at a time.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say that the report of the Secretary to the Sergeant-at-Arms was inaccurate in this, that I am reported, as appears there, as absent paired. I have been present all the time, and have as often as I thought necessary announced my pair with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] I do not wish to appear as being absent when I am present and paired. I hope the record will be corrected in that regard, Mr. President.

Mr. BLAINE. By a mere inadvertence, or some other cause similar thereunto, on some of the roll-calls I may not have answered to my name; but I have been within the walls of the Senate Chamber the entire evening, I believe, without being beyond the threshold; so that there is a very unaccountable mistake on the part of somebody, whether myself or others I do not now affirm.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think the Secretary of the Senate in reporting me to the Sergeant-at-Arms as absent made a mistake. I was present in my seat. When my name was called I announced a pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] and stated as the reason for not voting that pair. I supposed that would be a sufficient reason and would be an excuse on the part of the Senate. I was present in my seat and responded to the call of the Secretary when he called my name.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire, was I reported by the Sergeant-at-Arms as absent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator was.

Mr. CONKLING. I was not absent. I stood exactly where I stand now when the Sergeant-at-Arms came to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will withhold a moment the Chair will state that the report was read, and if the Senators had been present they would have understood it definitely. The Sergeant-at Arms reports that—

In obedience to the order of the Senate in regard to requesting the attendance of absent Senators, I would respectfully report that the Secretary reported as absent the following Senators.

Among the names there mentioned the name of the Senator from New York appears. Then the Sergeant-at-Arms reports further:

I found in the Senate Chamber and adjoining cloak-rooms Senators Bayard, Blaine, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, &c.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish merely to say that I was not found in an adjoining cloak-room, but I was found exactly where I now stand. The Sergeant-at-Arms inquiring of me if he should report that I was present my reply was "I am here." I suppose that makes me present. I merely wish to say that I was neither absent nor in an adjoining cloak-room, but within four feet of my seat.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have announced several times in the course of the evening that I am paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.] I have been in the Senate Chamber nearly all the evening, and should have voted had I not been paired.

Mr. PADDOCK. Among the number of those reported as absent and not paired, as I remember, the name of my colleague [Mr. SAUNDERS] was read. I desire to state, on his behalf, that he is absent but is paired with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. COKE.] As far as I am concerned, I am here and expect to remain.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am announced as being absent. I have not been absent. I have been here the entire evening. Sometimes I have not voted, and probably I shall not hereafter vote at all times, but I have been here during the whole night, and I propose to remain as long as any one else remains.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON] is detained from the Senate by indisposition, and in addition to that he is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.]

Mr. BURNSIDE. I beg to state that my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] was called home yesterday by the death of a friend. He is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.]

Mr. PLATT. I see that my name is reported by the Secretary as one of those Senators who are absent. I believe I have not been absent at any roll-call of the Senate this evening.

Mr. LOGAN. Am I numbered among the dead or absent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is reported among the dead and living both, [laughter,] his name having been furnished to the Sergeant-at-Arms as absent from the list and having been found in the Senate Chamber or one of the cloak-rooms.

Mr. LOGAN. One or the other; I have been in one or the other all the evening.

Mr. GROOME. Since it seems to be extremely fashionable to designate the exact spot where we were, I wish to say that although I did not vote on the last roll-call I was in the Senate Chamber when summoned by the Sergeant-at-Arms to be present.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask now if the report of the Sergeant-at-Arms discloses the presence of a quorum or the absence of a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That question has not been determined.

Mr. ALLISON. I should be glad to have it determined.

Mr. MAXEY. Before that is announced I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. COKE] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.]

Mr. ALLISON. Is there a quorum present?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair could probably make an arithmetical calculation and ascertain the fact as to whether the members reported by the Sergeant-at-Arms and those answering to the roll-call constitute a quorum.

Mr. ALLISON. Assuming that a quorum is present, I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was not agreed to

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. HEREFORD. I presume we shall proceed with the further execution of the call and send for the other absentees.

Mr. ALLISON. I venture to make a motion that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] be excused.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the motion of the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. HEREFORD. The call has not been entirely executed yet, because there are Senators who have not been notified. I presume it will not take a motion to proceed further for the reason that the motion is unexecuted or only partially executed.

Mr. LOGAN. What does the Senator want to do now?

Mr. HEREFORD. To get more Senators in.

Mr. WINDOM. I suggest that we compromise this matter by taking a recess until twelve o'clock to-day while the Sergeant-at-Arms is ascertaining the whereabouts of absent members.

Mr. SLATER. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. GROVER] is absent from the city on account of the sickness of a member of his family.

Mr. BLAINE. And is understood to be paired with my colleague, [Mr. HAMLIN.]

Mr. SLATER. He is paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.]

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the Senate take a recess until twelve o'clock to-day.

Mr. HEREFORD. I rise to a point of order. No motion for a recess is in order during a call of the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask unanimous consent that we take a recess, if the Chair hears no objection..

Mr. WITHERS and others. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. PADDOCK, (at three o'clock and fifteen minutes a. m.) If my recollection serves me correctly I have not made a motion to adjourn during the present session, and in order that I may make a little record of that kind just once, I now move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska, that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PADDOCK. It has been a long time since I have made a motion of this kind and I hope I shall be indulged.

The Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. PADDOCK. I shall not indulge in any such experiment again, Mr. President.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the question before the Senate, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unexecuted order of the Senate in regard to absent Senators. The Sergeant-at-Arms has made one report, and is engaged in a further execution of the order.

After a delay of fifteen minutes,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will submit to the Senate an additional report from the Sergeant-at-Arms. It will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, June 18, 1879.

To the President of the Senate:

The following Senators are reported to be absent from the city, to wit: Messrs. Anthony, Beck, Butler, Edmunds, Farley, Grover, Hamlin, Hoar, Jones of Nevada, McPherson, Plumb, Sharon, Teller, Whyte, and Williams. And as sick: Messrs. Davis of Illinois, and Johnston.

Messengers have been sent to notify Senators Bell, Bruce, Booth, Chandler, Coke, Dawes, Kellogg, Kirkwood, Morrill, Saunders, Wallace, and Voorhees of the order of the Senate.

Respectfully reported in obedience to the order of the Senate in regard to absent Senators.

R. J. BRIGHT,
Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. PADDOCK, (at five o'clock and twelve minutes a. m.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The question being put, it was declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. PADDOCK. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GORDON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. MORGAN, (when Mr. HOUSTON's name was called.) I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. HOUSTON] has retired from the Senate on account of indisposition. Not being able to remain any longer, he has gone to his room.

Mr. MCMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.]

Mr. GROOME, (when Mr. ROLLINS's name was called.) I desire to state that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. ROLLINS] has left the Senate because of indisposition. He desired me to keep him right on the record. I therefore desire to say that he would vote "yea," if here.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to state that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] who is absent on account of indisposition.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.]

Mr. PADDOCK. I think the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] has voted through inadvertence. As I understand, he has paired with my colleague, [Mr. SAUNDERS.]

Mr. COKE, (after having voted in the negative.) I desire to withdraw my vote. I had forgotten for the moment that I was paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.]

Mr. VANCE. My colleague [Mr. RANSOM] was compelled to leave the Senate Chamber on account of ill-health.

Mr. BELL. I am paired on all political questions with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. GROOME. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. WHYTE] is paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.] If here, my colleague would vote "nay," and I doubt not the Senator from Iowa would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 7, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—7.

Burnside,	Kirkwood,	Paddock,	Windom.
Hill of Colorado,	Logan,	Platt,

NAYS—21.

Call,	Hampton,	Kernan,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Lamar,	Walker,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hereford,	Morgan,	Withers.
Eaton,	Hill of Georgia,	Randolph,
Garland,	Jonas,	Slater,
Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,

ABSENT—48.

Allison,	Carpenter,	Hoar,	Plumb,
Anthony,	Chandler,	Houston,	Ransom,
Bailey,	Coke,	Ingalls,	Rollins,
Bayard,	Conkling,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Davis of Illinois,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,
Bell,	Dawes,	Kellogg,	Sharon,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	McDonald,	Teller,
Booth,	Farley,	McMillan,	Thurman,
Bruce,	Ferry,	McPherson,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Gordon,	Maxey,	Wallace,
Cameron of Pa.,	Grover,	Morrill,	Whyte,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hamlin,	Pendleton,	Williams.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate refuses to adjourn.

After an interval of twenty minutes,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate an additional report, a report of progress, by the Sergeant-at-Arms, which will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, June 18, 1879.

To the President of the Senate:

In obedience to the order of the Senate in regard to absent Senators, I would respectfully report that Senators Booth, Dawes, and Kellogg answer that they are too unwell to come to the Senate; Senator Wallace, not found.

Senators Morrill, Saunders, and Bruce answer that they will come immediately.

Senators Bell, Coke, and Kirkwood report in person.

R. J. BRIGHT,
Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I presume all the absentees will be notified. I suppose there is a continuation of the call. I notice all who have answered are not here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair cannot tell how many have not answered and how many have. There have been three or four reports made.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. HEREFORD. I rise to a point of order, that no such motion can be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been the universal custom of the Chair to sustain all such motions, and the present occupant of the chair will decide the motion in order. It has been decided time and again. I have half a dozen records before me sustaining that point.

Mr. PADDOCK. Is it not always in order after a report made by the Sergeant-at-Arms?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is the motion made by the Senator from Nebraska to dispense with further proceedings under the call of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered and taken.

Mr. COKE. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.]

Mr. MCDONALD. I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 7, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—7.

Burnside,	Hill of Colorado,	Paddock,	Windom.
Conkling,	Kirkwood,	Platt,

NAYS—23.

Bayard,	Hampton,	Kernan,	Slater,
Call,	Harris,	Lamar,	Vance,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hereford,	Maxey,	Vest,
Eaton,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,	Walker,
Garland,	Jonas,	Pendleton,	Withers.
Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Randolph,

ABSENT—46.

Allison,	Chandler,	Houston,	Rollins,
Anthony,	Cockrell,	Ingalls,	Saulsbury,
Bailey,	Coke,	Johnston,	Saunders,
Beck,	Davis of Illinois,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Bell,	Dawes,	Kellogg,	Teller,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	Logan,	Thurman,
Booth,	Farley,	McDonald,	Voorhees,
Bruce,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Wallace,
Butler,	Gordon,	McPherson,	Whyte,
Cameron of Pa.,	Grover,	Morrill,	Williams
Cameron of Wis.,	Hamlin,	Plumb,
Carpenter,	Hoar,	Ransom,

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (at five o'clock and forty-two minutes a. m.) The Chair will lay before the Senate a report from the Sergeant-at-Arms, made out on one of the roll-call lists, showing those absent as furnished by the Clerk and those whom he has notified in pursuance of the order of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will the Chair be kind enough to have it reported, so that the Senate can understand it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read for the information of the Senate. The list of absentees will be read first.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Beck, Bell, Blaine, Booth, Bruce, Burnside, Butler, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chandler, Coke, Conkling, Davis of Illinois, Davis of West Virginia, Dawes, Edmunds, Farley, Ferry, Gordon, Groome, Grover, Hamlin, Hill of Colorado, Hoar, Houston, Ingalls, Johnston, Kellogg, Kirkwood, Logan, McMillan, McPherson, Morrill, Paddock, Platt, Plumb, Ransom, Rollins, Saulsbury, Saunders, Sharon, Teller, Thurman, Vest, Voorhees, Wallace, Whyte, Williams, and Windom.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will now read the names of those who have been requested to appear in the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Bell, Blaine, Booth, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Coke, Conkling, Davis of West Virginia, Gordon, Groome, Hill of Colorado, Houston, Ingalls, Kirkwood, Logan, McMillan, Morrill, Paddock, Platt, Ransom, Rollins, Saulsbury, Saunders, Thurman, Vest, and Windom.

Mr. Anthony is absent from the city.
Mr. Beck, out of the city.
Mr. Butler, out of the city.
Mr. Chandler, no answer.
Mr. Davis, of Illinois, sick.
Mr. Dawes, sick.
Mr. Edmunds, out of the city.
Mr. Farley, out of the city.
Mr. Grover, out of the city.
Mr. Hamlin, out of the city.
Mr. Hoar, out of the city.
Mr. Johnston, sick.
Mr. Kellogg, sick.
Mr. McPherson, out of the city.
Mr. Plumb, out of the city.
Mr. Sharon, out of the city.
Mr. Teller, out of the city.
Mr. Wallace, not found.
Mr. Whyte, out of the city.
Mr. Williams, out of the city.

Mr. CONKLING. How many are "out of the city?"

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Twelve "out of the city."

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say, once for all, that I have been here all night. I could not vote because I was paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.]

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Part of the Senators called have paired, and I see no note made of those who have paired and answered to the call. I suggest that there are a number—myself among them—who have not been out of the Chamber, but who have responded to every call that has taken place. I know that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] has been in the Chamber all the time, and yet he is down as absent. I take it the list was furnished of those who did not vote on some particular call, though they might have been in the Senate.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to state, so far as I am concerned, that the report is inaccurate. I have been in the Chamber or near to the Chamber—in the cloak-room possibly, but not out of hearing of the Clerk when the roll-call was being proceeded with—since yesterday at twelve o'clock noon.

Mr. PLATT. It seems to me, Mr. President, that there is some mistake about the absentees, as also about those who have been notified. I believe I have not been absent and I have not failed to respond to my name when there has been a call of the Senate. Sometimes I have not voted; but when there has been a call of the Senate I believe I have without exception responded to my name, and I certainly have no recollection of having been requested by the Sergeant-at-Arms to present myself here. There is some mistake about it, evidently.

Mr. CONKLING. I can confirm the Senator from Connecticut. I have not been requested by the Sergeant-at-Arms to attend. I have been present, however, at all times since twelve o'clock yesterday not having been out of the Capitol, and not more than a few steps away from my seat at any time. I have not been absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will remember that that report which was made by the Sergeant-at-Arms and was read in full in regard to the Senators who were found in the Senate Chamber includes the names of those as well as those who were notified outside of the Senate Chamber.

Mr. CONKLING. That explains it, no doubt.

Mr. PADDOCK. It seems to me that after so elaborate and satisfactory a report from the Sergeant-at-Arms, we can now dispense with further proceedings under the call. I therefore move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska moves that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (at six o'clock and five minutes a. m.) Mr. President, it is about time, I think, to proceed to business. Therefore I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with; and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WITHERS. Was not that the last motion which was acted on by the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not know that that would be an objection to it if it were; and the Chair does not know that it was the last motion. The Chair will look at the record, as so many motions of that kind have been made.

Mr. EATON. I suggest to my friend from Pennsylvania that while he is removing disabilities he take them all and move that all proceedings under all the calls be suspended. I would not expect to vote for it, but yet it seems to me that it would be better if he would make all his associates loyal Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, on which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McDONALD, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded; and the result was announced—yeas 5, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—5.

Cameron of Pa.,	Paddock,	Platt,	Saunders.
Conkling,

NAYS—22.

Call,	Hampton,	Kernan,	Slater,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Lamar,	Vance,
Coke,	Hereford,	Maxey,	Walker,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,	Withers.
Eaton,	Jonas,	Pendleton,
Garland,	Jones of Florida,	Randolph,

ABSENT—49.

Allison,	Chandler,	Ingalls,	Saulsbury,
Anthony,	Davis of Illinois,	Johnston,	Sharon,
Bailey,	Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Teller,
Bayard,	Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Thurman,
Beck,	Farley,	Kirkwood,	Vest,
Bell,	Ferry,	Logan,	Voorhees,
Blaine,	Gordon,	McDonald,	Wallace,
Booth,	Groome,	McMillan,	Whyte,
Bruce,	Grover,	McPherson,	Williams,
Burnside,	Hamlin,	Morrill,	Windom.
Butler,	Hill of Colorado,	Plumb,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Ransom,
Carpenter,	Houston,	Rollins,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. PADDOCK, (at seven o'clock a. m.) Would it be in order to call for another report from the Sergeant-at-Arms concerning absentees?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will report as soon as he has anything to report, the Chair presumes.

Mr. PADDOCK. If he has nothing further to report, I think we might as well dispense with further proceedings under the call. It is a long time since we have had a call of the roll.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator make that motion?

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SAUNDERS, (at seven o'clock and thirty minutes a. m.) I move that further proceedings under the call of the Senate be dispensed with.

Mr. CONKLING. On that let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PADDOCK, (when his name was called.) I believe the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BAILEY] is not present, and if he is not here I am paired with him.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BURNSIDE. My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 6, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—6.

Burnside,	Conkling,	Platt,	Saunders.
Cameron of Pa.,	Pendleton,

NAYS—16.

Call,	Garland,	Hill of Georgia,	Slater,
Coke,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,
Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Kernan,	Vest,
Eaton,	Hereford,	Morgan,	Withers.

ABSENT—54.

Allison,	Davis of Illinois,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Anthony,	Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Rollins,
Bailey,	Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Saulsbury,
Bayard,	Farley,	Kirkwood,	Sharon,
Beck,	Ferry,	Lamar,	Teller,
Bell,	Gordon,	Logan,	Thurman,
Blaine,	Grover,	McDonald,	Voorhees,
Booth,	Hamlin,	McMillan,	Walker,
Bruce,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Wallace,
Butler,	Hill of Colorado,	Maxey,	Whyte,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Williams,
Carpenter,	Houston,	Paddock,	Windom.
Chandler,	Ingalls,	Plumb,
Cockrell,	Johnston,	Randolph,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I judge now we can have an understanding that we shall take the vote to-day. If so, I ask general consent——

Mr. CONKLING. We can have no understanding. That is not what we have staid for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What proposition does the Senator from West Virginia make?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not make any.

Mr. MORRILL, (at nine o'clock and ten minutes a. m.) Mr. President, I have not any doubt that the Senate on each side would be willing to have this bill disposed of during the day, and I take the liberty, therefore, of moving that we adjourn at the present time. I think that reasonable men can reach some proper conclusion about the matter. I move, therefore, that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. VANCE in the chair.) The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EATON. Not unconditionally, I hope.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator from Connecticut heard what I said. I said that I had not a particle of doubt, so far as the majority on this side is concerned, that this bill can be disposed of to-day.

Mr. PLATT. I want to say that I cannot consent to any arrangement that it shall be disposed of at any particular time.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not ask that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. PENDLETON. I understood the Senator from Connecticut said he would not agree to any particular time. Will he agree that it shall be done during the day?

Mr. PLATT. I cannot agree that it shall be done at any time.

Mr. EATON. Neither to-day nor to-morrow? Vote down the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EATON. I desire it to be distinctly understood that so far as the democratic members are concerned we have been anxious all the while that there should be an adjournment if this matter could be settled to-day or, legislatively, to-morrow. I mean the legislative day of Thursday, no matter how long that may last, whether it be ten hours, or twelve hours, or twenty hours. I think I understand my colleague. The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] will not agree to this, and therefore I do not blame my colleague for what he said.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope that there will be unanimous consent to adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (at nine o'clock and twenty-four minutes a. m.) I move that the Senate take a recess for one hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate take a recess for one hour.

Mr. EATON. I hope not; we have been here so long.

Mr. PENDLETON. Make it two hours if there is to be a recess.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I hope gentlemen on the other side will consent to a recess.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the motion is not in order.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Is there no method under the rules by which I can ask that Senators be sent for, so that we can have a quorum here? I think it fair that Senators be sent for and brought to the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Rhode Island that the Sergeant-at-Arms is now endeavoring to get Senators here. That is the order of the Senate.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I ask for a report of the Sergeant-at-Arms. Has the motion prevailed directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring members here?

Mr. WITHERS. No; to request their attendance.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Then I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to bring Senators to the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion is in order.

Mr. BURNSIDE. That he proceed to bring members here promptly.

Mr. WITHERS. To carry out the rule which says the attendance of absent Senators may be requested or, if necessary, directed by the Senate.

Mr. BURNSIDE. And that he use a sufficient number of deputies to bring them here promptly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Rhode Island is that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to compel the attendance of absent members.

Mr. BURNSIDE. And that he use a sufficient force of deputies to bring them here promptly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be understood. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. EATON. What is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Rhode Island is to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to compel the attendance of absent members.

Mr. EATON. Before the motion is acted upon we ought to know who the absent members are, and therefore I move a call of the Senate, so that we may know who the absent members are.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I accept that, with the understanding that I will renew my motion after the call of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That does not require a motion in the opinion of the Chair. It can be ordered by the Chair. The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] was called home yesterday by the death of a friend; otherwise he would be present.

The roll-call was concluded; and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bayard,	Garland,	Kernan,	Vance,
Bell,	Gordon,	McDonald,	Vest,
Burnside,	Groome,	Morrill,	Walker,
Call,	Harris,	Pendleton,	Wallace,
Chandler,	Hereford,	Platt,	Withers.
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Randolph,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Rollins,
Eaton,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll-call exhibits twenty-nine Senators present, not a quorum.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Now, I move that those who are found absent by this roll-call be compelled to attend by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and I hope the Chair will give such instructions to him as will make him send men off in carriages to bring Senators here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to compel the attendance of the absent Senators is now in order.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to compel the attendance of absent members, and to use the necessary force.

Mr. BURNSIDE. When I speak of "force" I do not speak of arms, but the force of numbers, so that Senators can be reached simultaneously.

Mr. ROLLINS. You do not mean a military force.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not mean an armed force, but a sufficient force in number to bring them here quietly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All necessary force is comprehended in the term "compel attendance."

Mr. ROLLINS. Perhaps, if convenient, the Army could be used as a police force!

Mr. RANSOM entered the Chamber and his name was recorded as present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island, that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to compel the attendance of absent members.

Mr. ROLLINS. I move to strike out the word "compel."

Mr. BURNSIDE. We have heretofore used the word "request."

Mr. ROLLINS. That is all we can do anyway.

Mr. HEREFORD. They have been requested and do not come. There is no use in it.

Mr. ROLLINS. That is all you can do. I move to strike out "compel" and insert "request."

Mr. BURNSIDE. If the Sergeant-at-Arms will send eight or ten carriages and a man with each carriage for these Senators, he can get them here very soon. They went away last night with the understanding that if certain members here would stand guard they would be here at a reasonable hour in the morning. I want those Senators brought here now. I want the understanding carried out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. ROLLINS. Allow me to suggest that when the Sergeant-at-Arms finds the Senators all he can do then is to request their attendance. He will not be able to compel them to attend.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Yes, he will.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire to the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island to strike out the word "compel" and insert "request."

Mr. THURMAN. In my judgment the best thing we can do is to get on as quietly as we can until Senators get their breakfasts and they will then come in a good humor. If you send for them now, they will come in a bad humor. I think the best thing is not to pass the resolution at all.

Mr. BURNSIDE. It is time they all had their breakfast; it is half past nine o'clock.

Mr. THURMAN. Oh, no; they have not. They left here so late that many of them have not had their breakfasts yet.

Mr. BURNSIDE. All Senators have not the luxurious habits of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Ohio did not go to bed at all.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I have been called at my house at one o'clock by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and told that I was required to be at the Senate Chamber, and under an order to compel Senators' attendance. I obeyed the order of the Sergeant-at-Arms. I do not see why we cannot make Senators come. We shall not have a quorum at twelve o'clock unless we do something of this kind. I do not see why we should not try the experiment.

Mr. HEREFORD. I suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island that the difficulty is not that the Senators are not here, but that they will not vote although sitting in their seats. That is the trouble. If the Senator will compel his political friends, or induce those who act in harmony with him, to vote when they are in their seats, then the proper legislation can be carried on. It is now nearly the 1st day of July, when the regular appropriations fall, and the democratic party on this floor has been striving all night to carry out these appropriations and not stop the Government; yet the Senators on the opposite side of the Chamber have sat in their seats all night time after time and time after time, and hour after hour when their names have been called have not answered but have declined to vote. The trouble is not that they are not here, but the trouble is that they will not vote.

Mr. BURNSIDE. It has been in the power of the majority to adjourn ever since a reasonable hour for adjournment was reached yesterday afternoon; and in view of the fact that they occupied the entire day of yesterday, or nearly so, it would have been proper and just in them to have adjourned when that time arrived. Then we could have met here to-day at twelve o'clock and gone on with the bill without any delay whatever, and the republicans would have voted as occasion required; but they did not care to go on with the understanding that they would be compelled to vote upon the bill to-day, whether the debate was finished or not. I do not think there is any question as to which side of the Chamber justice rests in this case. There is no question about it in my mind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire to strike out the word "compel" and insert the word "request."

The amendment was rejected; there being on a division—ayes 7, noes 16.

Mr. ROLLINS. Is there a quorum?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No quorum is necessary, it being a question of compelling the attendance of absent members. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island, that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to compel the attendance of absent members.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will proceed to execute the order.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I understand that during a few moments' absence from the Senate there was a call of the Senate, under what rule I cannot conceive, but that is not important.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair cannot answer, for the Chair was not in himself.

Mr. CONKLING. I address the Chair merely to report myself as both here and present, and not absent.

Mr. WITHERS, (at eleven o'clock and fifty minutes a. m.) I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the Senate adjourns before twelve o'clock to-day, will the legislative day of Thursday commence at twelve o'clock?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly it will.

Mr. WITHERS. Then I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a second? There is not a sufficient number up.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, yes, if the Chair will count.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There were but two Senators who rose to second the call. The Chair will count again.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It requires one-fifth of the Senators present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can only make six up.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask that the other side be counted, if the Chair thinks one-fifth have not risen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is obvious to the Chair that there are not one-fifth. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at eleven o'clock and fifty-one minutes a. m., Thursday, June 19, 1879,) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 18, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. DAVID WILLS, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION.

Mr. DIBRELL. I am recorded as not voting on the motion to adjourn yesterday evening. I was present and voted "no."

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

The Journal was then approved.

CONWAY NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. NORCROSS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2329) authorizing the Conway National Bank, of Conway, Massachusetts, to change its location and name; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL POST-ROUTES.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table, for consideration at this time, Senate bill No. 697, to establish additional post-roads in the State of Florida.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. CONGER. There may be other gentlemen who would like to have additional routes inserted in this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear them.

Mr. CONGER. I would suggest that if the bill could be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads those who desire additional post-routes could have them inserted in the bill, and there would be no objection to the committee reporting the bill at any time.

The SPEAKER. The adoption of the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] would, the Chair thinks, facilitate business.

Mr. ACKLEN. There are some routes which I would like included in the bill.

Mr. STONE. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have already during the present session reported two post-route bills; but there is no objection, I suppose, to their reporting another.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is aware of what the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STONE] states; still, the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] seems to the Chair a good one.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to insert a route in this bill; but I have not the data here now.

The SPEAKER. It had better be understood that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads shall have leave to report back the bill at any time; and gentlemen who wish to submit amendments which they have prepared had better send them to the committee at once.

Mr. STONE. If gentlemen who desire routes inserted in the bill will send them directly to the clerk of our committee, their propositions will be attended to.

Mr. DAVIDSON. If the committee is to have another meeting during this session, I have no objection to the reference of the bill.

The SPEAKER. It is understood that the committee shall have leave to report at any time; and there is no danger of the bill failing in the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Why should we not pass this bill with the amendments now proposed, and let the committee report an additional bill if it be necessary?

Mr. CONGER. Let the bill be sent to the committee, and let amendments be sent to the Clerk, as my colleague [Mr. STONE] suggests.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It will be just as easy to get up a new bill for additional routes as to send this bill to the committee for the purpose of having them included.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Having been assured by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. EVINS] that there will be another meeting of the committee and that this bill will be reported, I consent to the reference of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, with leave to report it back at any time, and gentlemen who desire post-routes inserted are requested to send them promptly to the clerk of the committee.

C. R. FAULKNER.

Mr. BARBER, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Claims a joint resolution (H. R. No. 103) to pay C. R. Faulkner $32.50, in full for services as messenger in the Forty-fifth Congress; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PORTRAITS, ETC., FROM BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

Mr. HAYES. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 1989) relating to printing impressions from portraits and vignettes be taken from the Speaker's table, for the purpose of concurring in the amendment of the Senate. The Senate has adopted a substitute for the bill.

Mr. BUCKNER. I object to any other disposition of this bill than a reference of it to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. HAYES. The Committee on Printing have considered the subject, and are unanimous in favor of immediate action.

Mr. BUCKNER. The bill refers to what shall be done with dies and plates in the Bureau of Engraving. It ought to be considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency, not by the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HAYES. I cannot see what the Committee on Banking and Currency has to do with the question.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the Senate will be read, after which there will be opportunity for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury, at the request of a Senator, Representative, or Delegate in Congress, the head of a Department or bureau, art association, or library, be, and he is hereby, authorized to furnish impressions from any portrait or vignette which is now or may hereafter be a part of the engraved stock of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, at such rates and under such conditions as he may deem necessary to protect the public interests.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HAYES. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] had better not object. This is substantially the same proposition that passed the House a few days ago.

Mr. BUCKNER. I object to any other disposition of the bill than its reference to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot qualify his objection in that way.

Mr. BUCKNER. Well, I object absolutely.

SURVEY OF CHINCOTEAGUE INLET.

Mr. BEALE, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Commerce a bill (H. R. No. 2330) to correct the reading of an act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1879; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BEALE. I ask consent that this bill be considered and acted on now.

The bill was read. It provides that so much of the act named in the title as provides for the survey of Chincoteague Inlet, in the State of Virginia, be corrected so as to read "the channel from the wharf at Franklin to the island of Chincoteague, in the county of Accomac, in the State of Virginia."

Mr. BEALE. The purpose of this bill is simply to correct a misdescription of the place which is to be surveyed.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BEALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that the title of this bill be amended so as to read, "A bill to correct an error in the act," &c.

Mr. BEALE. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The title will be modified accordingly.

Mr. DUNNELL. I suggest a further amendment of the title. The date "March 4, 1879," should be "March 3, 1879," which the date of the approval of the act referred to.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the word "four" in reference to date will be struck out and "three" inserted.

There being no objection, the title was modified accordingly.

MICHAEL MEENAN.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2331) granting pensions to the widow and minor children of Michael Meenan, deceased; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PENSIONERS UNDER SPECIAL ACTS.

Mr. NEAL. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to introduce for consideration at this time a joint resolution (H. R. No. 104) defining the meaning of section 2 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of arrears of pensions granted by act of Congress approved January 25, 1879."

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, and the Chair will then ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas doubts have arisen as to the proper construction of the second section of the above-recited act in this, to wit, whether it extends to and includes persons placed upon the pension-rolls by virtue of special acts of Congress: Therefore, to remove all doubts in this respect,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That said section of said act of Congress shall be so construed and defined as to include within its provisions and entitled to its benefits all persons who may have been or who may hereafter be placed upon the pension-rolls by virtue of any special act of Congress by reason of wounds or injuries received or of disease contracted in the military service of the United States since the 4th day of March, 1861, or because of the death of any person while in said service.

There was no objection; and the joint resolution was received, read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NEAL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALTERATION IN THE HOUSE WING.

Mr. KIMMEL. I am directed, Mr. Speaker, to report from the select Committee on Ventilation a resolution authorizing a change in the plan of the House, and to ask for its consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, and the Chair will then ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker be, and he is hereby, authorized to make such change in the accommodations for committees and officers of the House as are rendered necessary by the alterations of the House and the rooms in the south wing of the Capitol provided for by the last Congress; and that he be, and is hereby, authorized to assign the reception-room of the House to the Committee on Appropriations, and to cause a door to be cut through the eastern wall of said room into the adjoining corridor for the accommodation of said committee: Provided, These changes can be made without interfering with the plans already adopted, and in accordance with existing laws in regard to the ventilation of the Hall of the House: Provided also, That in making connection between the reception-room and the room of the Committee on Appropriations no material obstruction shall be made to the admission of light and air into the corridor.

Mr. KIMMEL. I ask, Mr. Speaker, for the passage of the resolution.

Mr. WRIGHT. I rise for the purpose of moving an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield for that purpose?

Mr. KIMMEL. I do.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the consideration of this if it is to be amended to include other matters.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan objects unless the previous question is called.

Mr. COX. He cannot object conditionally.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows that, but the gentleman makes his objection absolute, and for the information of the gentleman from Maryland the Chair thought proper to state the fact in manner as he did.

Mr. CONGER. If I can withhold my objection I will do so until after the reading of the amendment for information.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

Mr. KENNA. Let the amendment be read, and then let us have a right to object to the consideration of the whole subject.

Mr. WRIGHT. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided also, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to consider the question of an elevator for the House of Representatives, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CONGER. There is no objection to that.

Mr. WRIGHT. I hope the gentleman will accept that.

Mr. KIMMEL. I do.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 21.

Mr. REAGAN. The amendment is a resolution which goes properly to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I suggest they should be considered separately.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is not germane, and would be out of place.

Mr. KENNA. That is the point the gentleman from Texas makes. I do not antagonize the resolution or any part of it, but I think the point of the gentleman from Texas is well taken. I suggest by unanimous consent the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and adopted be acted on separately.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania merely provides for an inquiry into the expediency of having an elevator in this portion of the Capitol. If there be no objection the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be withdrawn.

Mr. WRIGHT. I withdraw it with the understanding that I will be permitted hereafter to offer it as a distinct proposition.

There was no objection.

The resolution as reported by the committee was adopted.

Mr. KIMMEL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I now offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to consider the question of an elevator for the House of Representatives and report by bill or otherwise.

The resolution was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask unanimous consent to introduce at this time a bill for reference to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SAMFORD. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama object to the introduction of the bill of the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. SAMFORD. I do not know what it is. In this part of the Hall we do not hear what is going on.

Mr. SPARKS. I demand the regular order.

OFFICIAL CONTRIBUTIONS FOR POLITICAL PURPOSES.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the morning hour begins at twenty-five minutes before one o'clock. The unfinished business of the morning hour is the bill (H. R. No. 2266) to prohibit Federal officers, claimants, and contractors from making contributions for political purposes. The pending question is the demand of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOSTETLER] for the previous question on agreeing to the substitute recommended by the committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. In the debate yesterday on this bill I arose and addressed the Chair desiring to make some remarks. As an hour was granted to the other side, extended to nearly two hours, I should be glad to have the opportunity of making some remarks in reply.

Mr. HOSTETLER. Mr. Speaker, I should be very glad to extend to the gentleman from Ohio the courtesy which he asks. We have, however, twice made propositions to the gentlemen on the other side to make a special order for the consideration of this bill or to have it referred to the Committee of the Whole for consideration and for amendment. As yet that proposition has been refused, and I cannot consent to a discussion of this bill until some arrangement can be had by which we can come to a vote on this question. Whenever such an arrangement is made, I will agree to give to the gentlemen on the other side the fullest time necessary for the discussion and perfecting of this bill; but if such arrangement cannot be made, I shall have to insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. That is right.

Mr. HAYES. The friends of this bill have had nearly two hours to discuss it; why should not we on this side, those who oppose the bill, have at least one hour?

Mr. HOSTETLER. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois I have this to say: that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] yesterday rose for the purpose of seeing whether an arrangement could not be made with the gentlemen on the other side with reference to this bill. It was thereupon denounced as an infamous bill and an insult to the other side, and it was stated that on that account no courtesy should be extended or arrangement entered into with regard to it. The gentleman from Maryland went on and gave an explanation designed to show that it was not the kind of bill intimated by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. And failed to do it.

Mr. HOSTETLER. Failed to do it! Is the gentleman so blind that he cannot see?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana to offer that discussion shall be permitted if a time shall be fixed for voting on the bill.

Mr. HOSTETLER. Whenever a time is fixed for the consideration of this bill in Committee of the Whole, or a day appointed when the bill can be considered in the House, and from day to day until disposed of, and a time fixed when the vote shall be taken, then the gentlemen on the other side can have all the time they want.

Mr. CONGER. I will say in reply to that, having spoken for this side of the House before, and I believe to their satisfaction, that we have offered to fix a day in January next when we would consider the subject.

Mr. HOSTETLER. I demand the previous question.

Mr. HOUK. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question.

Mr. HOSTETLER. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the demand for the previous question.

The question being taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, there were ayes 80, noes none.

Mr. CONGER. A quorum has not voted.

Mr. HOSTETLER. Was the gentleman from Michigan who makes the point that a quorum has not voted present when the vote was taken?

The SPEAKER. There is no record of the vote.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order. The gentleman from Indiana is interfering with the business.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted the Chair will order tellers; and appoints the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. McGOWAN, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOSTETLER.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 84, noes none.

Mr. CONGER. A quorum has not voted.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted there are but two motions in order under the rules; a motion to adjourn and a motion for a call of the House.

Mr. BREWER. I move that we adjourn. There is evidently not a quorum here. We cannot do any business.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn, and there were—ayes 27, noes 70.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, (forty-five members voting therefor.)

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 19, nays 161, not voting 106; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. HENRY. My colleague, Mr. TALBOTT, is paired with Mr. BALLOU, of Rhode Island.

Mr. SMITH, of Georgia. I am paired with Mr. WILBER, of New York.

Mr. MANNING. Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee, is paired with Mr. LORING, of Massachusetts. My colleague, Mr. MONEY, is absent by leave of the House, and is paired with Mr. STARIN, of New York.

Mr. SLEMONS. My colleague, Mr. DUNN, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. MULDROW. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. DWIGHT.

Mr. KENNA. My colleague, Mr. WILSON, is still absent on account of sickness in his family, and is paired with Mr. REED, of Maine.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, is paired with Mr. GIBSON, of Louisiana.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. My colleague, Mr. KITCHIN, is paired with Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts.

Mr. CALDWELL. My colleague, Mr. CARLISLE, is paired with Mr. BAILEY, of New York.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. LADD, of Maine, is paired with his colleague, Mr. LINDSEY.

Mr. PHISTER. My colleague, Mr. THOMAS TURNER, is absent by leave of the House, and is paired with Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. My colleague, Mr. KNOTT, is absent by reason of sickness, and is paired with Mr. FRYE, of Maine. If present, both of my colleagues would vote "no."

Mr. AIKEN. My colleague, Mr. RICHARDSON, is paired with Mr. CAMP, of New York.

Mr. SAWYER. My colleague, Mr. DAVIS, is paired with Mr. McCOID, of Iowa.

Mr. HUNTON. My colleagues, Mr. CABELL and Mr. TUCKER, are paired respectively with Mr. FISHER, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. LAPHAM, of New York.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My colleague, Mr. SINGLETON, is paired with Mr. MILES, of Connecticut.

Mr. EVINS. My colleague, Mr. O'CONNOR, is detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. My colleague, Mr. CHALMERS, is absent by leave of the House, and is paired with Mr. VAN VOORHIS, of New York.

Mr. KING. My colleague, Mr. GIBSON, is paired with Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut.

Mr. WAIT. My colleague, Mr. MILES, is paired with Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois.

Mr. COVERT. My colleague, Mr. FERNANDO WOOD, is paired with Mr. ROBESON, of New Jersey, and my colleague, Mr. MULLER, is paired with Mr. HEILMAN, of Indiana.

Mr. FISHER. My colleague, Mr. DICK, is paired with Mr. LAY, of Missouri.

Mr. HUMPHREY. My colleague, Mr. POUND, is paired with Mr. DUNN, of Arkansas.

Mr. ROSS. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. BRIGHAM.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon seconding the demand for the previous question on the pending bill.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were ayes 66, noes none.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOSTETLER and Mr. HUMPHREY were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 57, noes none.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is made that no quorum has voted. The only motion now in order is a motion for a call of the House or to adjourn.

Mr. STEPHENS. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. CALKINS. Pending that motion, I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. STEPHENS. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 9, nays 169, not voting 108; as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. SMITH, of Georgia. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. WILBER. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. MULDROW. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. DWIGHT. My colleague, Mr. MONEY, is paired with the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. STONE.

Mr. SAWYER. My colleague, Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri, is paired with the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. MCCOID.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. My colleague, Mr. KITCHIN, is paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. RICE.

Mr. KENNA. My colleague, Mr. WILSON, is necessarily absent on account of sickness in his family, and is paired with the gentleman from Maine, Mr. REED.

Mr. AIKEN. My colleague from South Carolina, Mr. RICHARDSON, is paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. CAMP. My colleague, Mr. O'CONNOR, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. WAIT. My colleague, Mr. MILES, is paired with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SINGLETON, both gentlemen being absent by leave of the House. The gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. MORSE, is paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. BRIGGS. My colleague, Mr. HALL, is paired with the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. SPEER.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. My colleague, Mr. LORING, is paired with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. YOUNG.

Mr. STONE. I am paired on all questions with the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. MONEY. The gentleman from New York, Mr. STARIN, is paired with the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. CLARK.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman from New York, Mr. MULLER, is paired with the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HEILMAN.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS withdrew the motion for a call of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.]

Mr. STEPHENS. I am instructed by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures——

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, does the jury bill come up next?

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business coming over from yesterday is the bill (S. No. 375) in relation to juries and to repeal sections 801, 820, 821, and part of 800 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. STEPHENS. That bill does not take precedence of a privileged report from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia takes the floor under a recent rule to make a report from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Committees of Ways and Means, Banking and Currency, and Coinage, Weights, and Measures shall have leave to report at any time; and on motion of any member a majority of the House may fix a day for the consideration of any public bill reported by either of said committees; and the House may continue the consideration of such bill from day to day until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Under the letter as well as the spirit of this rule the Chair thinks that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures have the right to report at this time. Otherwise the rule would be nugatory, and would fail of execution. The Chair follows the rule of construction laid down in standard authorities as to the construction of statutes, namely, that a statute must be construed as a whole, so as to make it harmonize if possible and give a reasonable and practical construction. In this instance any other construction would make the amended rule inoperative and ineffective, and in accordance with the general law of construction the Chair accepts the latest expression of the House on this point. The gentleman from Georgia is therefore recognized to make a report from that committee.

Mr. COLERICK. I ask the gentleman from Georgia to yield a moment in order that I may make a report from the Committee of Elections.

Mr. STEPHENS. I yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FIELD] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COLERICK] desire to make reports from the Committee of Elections, which, the Chair is advised, will occupy but a few minutes. The gentleman from Georgia, as the Chair understands, yields for this purpose.

ELECTION CONTEST—BISBEE VS. HULL.

Mr. FIELD. I am directed by the Committee of Elections to report the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That thirty days' additional time be granted to contestee in the case of Bisbee vs. Hull to take additional evidence in the case, to begin July 8, 1879, and that fifteen days' additional time thereafter be allowed to the contestant to take evidence in rebuttal, and that each party during the time herein allowed may restore any evidence already taken which may have been lost or mislaid.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to hear a statement of the reason for this extension of time.

Mr. KEIFER. It is agreed to by both parties.

Mr. GARFIELD. That may be; but the House ought to know the reason. We do not grant as of course an extension of time in this way. It is proper that the records of the House should show why the extension is asked for.

Mr. BAKER. It ought to be shown that there has been reasonable diligence before any party should be allowed an extension of time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed that had been shown to the committee.

Mr. BAKER. There ought to be some statement made to the House.

Mr. FIELD. These parties appeared before the committee and the application was heard. It appeared that two packages of papers belonging to the contestant and two belonging to the contestee, all of them containing evidence, had not been received by the Clerk of the House, and were lost or mislaid. Each party desired to restore or retake that evidence. It also appeared that, for reasons given before the committee, and which appeared to be satisfactory to all its members, Mr. Hull, the contestee, ought to have the thirty days' additional time asked for. Hence the committee unanimously instructed me to report this resolution.

Mr. KEIFER. It ought to be stated also that Mr. Bisbee was present before the committee and consented that this arrangement should be made. It is entirely satisfactory to him.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. FIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTESTED-ELECTION PAPERS RECEIVED DURING RECESS.

Mr. COLERICK. I am directed by the Committee of Elections to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives is hereby directed to deliver to the clerk of the Committee of Elections all depositions and papers addressed to, or received by, him in vacation in all contested-election cases, immediately upon the receipt of the same by him; and that the clerk of said committee cause the same to be printed for the use of said committee.

Mr. ACKLEN. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee of Elections whether this authorizes the clerk of the committee to open the sealed packages of papers forwarded here during the recess of Congress?

Mr. SPRINGER. This applies to such evidence as will be forwarded during the vacation, and especially to the case where an extension of time has just been allowed by the House—the case of Bisbee against Hull of Florida. There are several cases where the parties have agreed that the testimony shall not be taken until some future time, and consequently it will not arrive at Washington before the vacation, and it was thought proper by the committee that testimony should be put in under the direction of the clerk of the committee, the clerk to have the right to open the packages only in the presence of the parties, after having given them due notice.

Mr. ACKLEN. I suggest that be included in the resolution. There is no statement in that resolution that the clerk must have the presence of these parties when he opens the papers.

Mr. SPRINGER. The rule of the committee provides that such shall be the case. That rule has been in operation for many years, and never yet has been found to work any disadvantage or cause any dissatisfaction.

Mr. ACKLEN. I do not think there should be objection to the amendment I have suggested.

Mr. FIELD. The rule of the committee is that the party should be notified to attend the opening of the testimony, but it is also the rule that if the party should refuse to attend, or fail to appear at the opening of the papers, then the clerk should have authority to open the papers and print some or all of them as should be deemed best. It is not the rule and is not the intention of the committee, as I understand, that the printing of the papers should depend absolutely upon the presence of the parties. The parties are notified to attend the opening of the papers, but if they refuse to attend or fail to appear, then the clerk has the right to open the papers and cause such as may be deemed necessary to be printed for the use of the committee.

Mr. BAKER. I wish to ask the gentleman a question, and that is whether or not the adoption of the resolution would not make it imperative upon the clerk of the committee to cause to be published all papers and depositions received during the recess of Congress?

Mr. FIELD. I think not.

Mr. BAKER. I wish to say further that if that is to be the effect of the adoption of this resolution, then my experience upon that committee satisfies me it would be a very dangerous practice for this House to adopt. I remember on one occasion in the Forty-fourth Congress there came from a district in Massachusetts a mass of documentary evidence which filled a box three feet in length and twelve or fourteen inches in diameter.

Mr. BLOUNT. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Indiana has served upon the Committee of Elections, and I should like to ask him whether or not for all practical purposes this printing could not be postponed until Congress shall again meet and the Committee of Elections shall see from an examination of the papers what portion it is proper to print and what should not be printed?

Mr. BAKER. I desire to say in reference to that, from the experience I have had on that committee, that within a day or two, or within three days in ordinary cases, unless the testimony is exceptionally voluminous, the record could be printed.

Mr. CALKINS. Will my colleague answer me a question?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CALKINS. I wish to ask the gentleman whether or not from his experience on the Committee of Elections nearly half of the time of Congress is not wasted in getting these election cases ready for trial—whether that was not the experience of the last Congress, and that many of the cases went over from sheer want of time and were not considered at all?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I have this to say in reference to that. My experience and observation on that committee satisfy me there need not be after the first record is printed at the commencement of the session a single hour's delay in procuring the printing of any record, however voluminous it may be. The first record might occasion a delay of two or three days in the action of the committee in procuring it to be printed, but when a single record has been printed during the time the committee will need to examine and decide upon that case, records of other cases can be opened and printed and be in the hands of the members of the committee, so that no delay need occur.

I desire to say that placing in the clerk of the Committee of Elections the discretion of printing vast masses of documentary as well as oral evidence in the form of records is calculated, in my judgment, to involve the House in the expenditure of larger amounts of money than would be productive of any useful or valuable result. In the case of Abbott vs. Frost, to which I particularly referred, there was a mass of evidence which would have cost several hundred dollars to be printed, which we did not wish to have printed at all, consisting of poll-books and tally-lists and other evidence which was of no value at all in the world to have printed; and yet, as I understand this resolution, all that vast mass of matter would be printed by the clerk without taking the judgment of the committee; and I think in every case it should be referred to the committee for its decision.

Mr. MANNING. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] permit me to correct a wrong impression under which he appears to labor? The clerk of the committee has not the absolute power to print whatever he thinks proper to print.

Mr. BAKER. Pardon me; if I understood correctly the reading of the resolution, it will, if passed, vest the clerk with the jurisdiction in this matter and impose the duty upon him.

Mr. MANNING. Not so. The parties interested are to be heard by the clerk. If they disagree as to what shall be printed, then upon that disagreement the committee must act. The committee reserves to itself very properly the jurisdiction of the whole subject.

Mr. BAKER. I would like to hear the resolution read again.

Mr. MANNING. Where the parties interested agree, the papers are printed, and whenever there is disagreement, the question of disagreement is referred to the action of the committee.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire, as a member of the committee, to suggest that the resolution as drawn and read from the Clerk's desk does not contain, in my judgment, exaclty what was designed. I have suggested that the words "under the rules of the committee" be inserted. That I think will meet the objection of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER.]

Mr. COLERICK. I have made the amendment in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER.]

Mr. BAKER. I wish to hear the resolution read as now modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives is hereby directed to deliver to the clerk of the Committee of Elections all depositions and papers addressed to or received by him in vacation in all contested-election cases immediately upon the receipt of the same by him, and that the clerk of said committee cause the same under the rule of said committee to be printed for the use of said committee.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. COLERICK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. COFFROTH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) to repeal certain clauses in the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1879, and for other purposes;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 34) to print 5,000 copies of the final reports of the United States centennial commission upon the international exhibition and centennial celebration of 1876; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 87) relating to a bridge across the Detroit River at or near Detroit, Michigan.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCMAHON] desires to make a report from the Committee on Appropriations. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield for that purpose?

Mr. STEPHENS. I cannot yield.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that it will take but a moment.

Mr. STEPHENS. I will yield for one minute.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR JUDICIAL EXPENSES.

Mr. MCMAHON. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the bill (H. R. No. 2252) making appropriations for certain judicial expenses, with amendments by the Senate, and to move non-concurrence in one amendment and concurrence in two amendments.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

On page 2, at the end of line 18, insert "except as provided for in section 3732 of the Revised Statutes."

On page 3, line 8, strike out the words "of good standing."

On page 3, line 14, strike out "in a district in which such is now the practice."

Mr. MCMAHON. I move to concur in the second and third amendments, and to non-concur in the first, and upon that I demand the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. What is the amendment in which the gentleman proposes to move non-concurrence?

Mr. McMAHON. We move to non-concur in order to perfect the section; not that we do not agree with the Senate, but to make the section more perfect. This is the unanimous report of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then this is not a vote to make the exception in favor of the Army and Navy?

Mr. McMAHON. No, sir. It is with a view to make the exception still larger.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question will be first on the amendments in which concurrence is moved. The gentleman from Ohio moves that the second amendment be concurred in.

Mr. CONGER. Let that portion of the bill where this amendment occurs be read as it will be if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Shall be publicly drawn from a box containing, at the time of each drawing, the names of not less than three hundred persons, possessing the qualifications prescribed in section 800 of the Revised Statutes, which names shall have been placed therein by the clerk of such court and a commissioner, to be appointed by the judge thereof, which commissioner shall be a citizen of good standing residing in the district in which such court is held, and a well-known member of the principal political party opposing that to which the clerk may belong, the clerk and said commissioner each to place one name in said box alternately, without reference to party affiliations.

Mr. CONGER. Is it proposed to strike out the words "of good standing?"

Mr. McMAHON. The words "of good standing" were twice repeated in the same sentence. The amendment of the Senate strikes out the words where they occurred the second time. If the amendment be concurred in the bill will read as it has now been read from the Clerk's desk. The bill will stand as if the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] had prevailed in the shape in which he offered it in the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is right.

The second amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

The third amendment of the Senate was also concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the first amendment of the Senate, in which the Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, at the end of line 18, insert: "except as provided for in section 3732 of the Revised Statutes."

Mr. McMAHON. I wish to repeat that the Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence, not because it does not approve of the amendment made by the Senate, but with a view to extend the exception so as not to embarrass the Government, if it would be embarrassed, in other departments.

Mr. CONGER. To what does that refer?

Mr. McMAHON. It refers to the clothing, &c., of the Army and Navy, the provision for which is already embodied in the statutes, of course.

The amendment of the Senate was non-concurred in.

Mr. McMAHON moved to reconsider the votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. VAN AERNAM, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Jules Beauchery and the heirs of William H. Whitefield, no adverse report having been made.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the cases of Philip A. Wellford, William H. Harrison, and Richard M. Harrison, no adverse report having been made in either case.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. GODSHALK, until Tuesday next, on account of important business;

To Mr. CLAFLIN, for one week from Friday next, on account of important business; and

To Mr. HAYES, from Friday next until the close of the extra session of Congress, on account of sickness in his family.

EXCHANGE OF TRADE-DOLLARS.

Mr. STEPHENS. I now call up the report from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures on the bill (H. R. No. 913) to provide for the exchange of trade-dollars for legal-tender silver dollars.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be exchanged, at the Treasury and at all sub-treasuries of the United States, legal-tender silver dollars for trade-dollars at par; and shall recoin the said trade-dollars into legal-tender dollars, as now provided by law; and shall stop the further coinage of trade-dollars.

Mr. STEPHENS. This is a bill to provide for the exchange of the trade-dollar for the standard silver dollar.

Mr. KEIFER. Before the gentleman proceeds, I desire to have an understanding as to the time that shall be allowed for debate upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] proposes to divide the time.

Mr. KEIFER. He has but one hour to divide if he moves the previous question. I would like to have some understanding as to the time that shall be allowed for debate.

The SPEAKER. There is no limitation as yet.

Mr. KEIFER. No; but the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] at the end of his hour may move the previous question. I would like to have it understood, if he desires to limit debate upon this bill, that we shall have two hours, and that the gentleman shall have the right to move the previous question at the end of the two hours.

The SPEAKER. The suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] is that the debate upon this bill shall continue for two hours, and that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered, and that the two hours shall be equally divided between those who are in favor of the bill and those who are opposed to it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope my colleague will consent that this bill shall not interfere with reports from a committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. It cannot do it; the conference report can interrupt anything, even a motion to adjourn.

Mr. STEPHENS. I have no objection to the discussion of the bill, but I think two hours is long enough, and I suggest that by common consent we shall agree that the previous question shall be considered as ordered in one hour and three-quarters, and then I will conclude in fifteen minutes; I do not wish to speak longer.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia, that two hours shall be allowed for debate, and at the close of two hours the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. STEPHENS. No, I said one hour and three-quarters.

Mr. KEIFER. We desire also to have the right to offer an amendment and have it voted on.

Mr. STEPHENS. Two amendments are to be offered—one by my colleague on the committee [Mr. WARNER] and one by the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the committee, [Mr. FISHER,] and those are all the amendments that can come in in order.

The SPEAKER. The rule does not allow but two amendments.

Mr. STEPHENS. It does not.

Mr. CONGER. I think this bill ought to go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the arrangement as to the limit of the debate has already been reached. The gentleman from Michigan will please state the point of order which will carry this bill to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose the bill is liable to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. In what respect?

Mr. CONGER. It authorizes the purchase of trade-dollars and the payment for them out of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. It authorizes the exchange simply.

Mr. FORT. It is clear profit to the Government and no expense whatever.

Mr. STEPHENS. I desire to make another suggestion. I suggest that every member may submit amendments, and that when the previous question is ordered all of them shall be voted on in the order in which they are offered.

The SPEAKER. In the order in which they properly come in the bill.

Mr. KEIFER. That would be satisfactory, but any gentleman who offers an amendment may want two minutes to explain what the amendment is.

Mr. STEPHENS. I am willing that they shall have that privilege.

The SPEAKER. The understanding now is that two hours shall be allowed for general debate upon the bill, and then the previous question shall prevail on the bill and all amendments, notwithstanding the restriction of the rule, and that the amendments shall be voted upon in the order in which they appropriately come in the bill; and to that understanding the Chair hears no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the order was made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS. I will now yield a moment to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] to make a report from a committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. That is in order at any time, and would interrupt even a motion to adjourn.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 2251) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 11 and 13.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 14, 26, 27, 28, 29, 31, and 34, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment to the amendment numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After line 13, page 5, of the bill insert as a new paragraph the following:

"For two additional watchmen of the Capitol police force, at $900 each, $1,800."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment numbered 8, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 25, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named insert $800.

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment numbered 23, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 30, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the paragraph insert the following:

"Patent Office:

"For seven copyists, five assistant messengers, and one folder and paster, at $480; in all, $10,380."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment to the amendment numbered 33, and agree to the same.

J. D. C. ATKINS,
J. G. BLOUNT,
JOHN H. BAKER,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. B. BECK,
H. G. DAVIS,
WM. WINDOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. ATKINS. I now call for the previous question upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman state for the information of the House what particular changes are made in the bill by the conference report? I presume there will be no objection to the adoption of the report.

Mr. ATKINS. I will briefly state the points of difference. The House conferees have conceded most of the points of difference between the Senate and the House. I may state that most of the points of difference conceded by the House were embraced in what is known as the vetoed legislative appropriation bill. The Committee on Appropriations in preparing this bill did not put into it everything that was included in the vetoed bill. The Senate rather insisted upon embracing a great many things which were in the vetoed bill, and some of those items which were non-concurred in by the House have been conceded by the House conferees in this report, and we have agreed to most of them.

First, we have given two watchmen as an addition to the Capitol police force; we have done this upon the application of the Architect of the Capitol building, the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House. This is deemed necessary for the protection of the Capitol and of the public property within the Capitol building.

The next point, and one of the most important perhaps, is this: the House made an appropriation for stationery for this extra session for members of the House. It was the intention to have embraced in that amendment stationery for Senators, but by accident that was left out. That made no difference, however, for the Senate non-concurred in that amendment, and it is left out by the conference report.

An amendment of the Senate gave $4,000 additional for the foremen and laborers on the public grounds. Last year the sum of $24,000 was appropriated for that purpose in the legislative appropriation bill. In the enrollment of the bill only $20,000 was inserted, and afterward in the sundry civil bill $4,000 was appropriated. In re-enacting this year the legislative appropriation bill of last year this item of $20,000 was inserted in this bill, although it really was intended to give $24,000 for that purpose. This report supplies that deficit.

We added $500 for the contingent expenses of the Court of Claims. The Senate insisted upon $5,000 for the Library of Congress for works of art, in which the House non-concurred. That item, however, the conferees have conceded.

The Senate insisted upon $1,500 additional pay for the postmaster at Tucson, Territory of Arizona, as a depositary for the Government. By the conference report that sum is reduced to $800. The salary of that postmaster is now $1,700 a year; but as there is no depositary for several hundred miles around that point, the conferees on the part of the House thought that we had probably better give that additional sum to him to act as a depositary for the Government.

In regard to the Patent Office, the Senate added fourteen additional copyists, some folders, and one or two laborers. The report of the committee of conference divides the number and gives half the proposed increase.

The Senate conferees receded from their demand for five principal clerks for the Land Office; they already have three. We give to the Secretary of the Interior, upon the very urgent demand of that officer, a stenographer, at $1,800 a year. Additional force is also allowed to the Assistant Attorney-General in the Interior Department. That force was provided in the vetoed bill, but was not embraced in the legislative bill which passed the House a few days ago. The Senate insisting upon it, the House conferees have agreed to it.

In the matter of the Bureau of Education, the Senate insisted upon $15,000 as necessary for the distribution of books and publications by the Bureau of Education to the various educational institutions of the country. Last year $8,000 was given for that purpose, but that was not considered sufficient, and the House conferees have agreed to the amendment of the Senate. These are the material points—I may say they are all the points—of difference, so far as money is concerned.

The House conferees agreed to the amendment of the Senate No. 33. That portion of the bill which the Senate struck out proposed to amend the law for the disbursement of the $75,000 appropriated in the sundry civil act, the last but one, for the laborers of the District of Columbia. That has always been considered by a great many gentlemen as a mere bonus to these laborers.

Our reason for doing this I will state: It seems that the parties representing these laborers disagree among themselves. The very counsel who have appeared before the committee of conference and who appeared before the Committee on Appropriations of this House have always disagreed as to the form in which a law on this subject should be drawn. Having had so much misunderstanding, being unable to arrive at any definite form of enactment by which the meritorious laborers should get their pay, if any is due them, or by which the persons to whom Congress intended to make a donation should receive their money, without the intervention of intermediaries or counsel receiving large fees, the committee on the part of the House agreed to the demand on the part of the Senate and struck out that section of the bill, leaving the law as it stands to-day in the sundry civil appropriation act.

Mr. Speaker, this bill, as agreed to by the committee of conference, embraces appropriations to the amount of $15,780,273.50. This amount is $332,879 in excess of the amount of the appropriation act for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the current year. But this excess embraces items of $130,000 which have been included heretofore in the sundry civil appropriation act, and which may be regarded, so far as this bill is concerned, as extra appropriations. There is also included in this excess $150,000 for the payment of gaugers and storekeepers, necessitated by an increase of distilleries throughout some of the Southern States within the last few months. Deducting these several items, the appropriation as it now stands is only about $30,000 in excess of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the current year. I will now yield to my colleague on the committee of conference, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER.]

Mr. CONGER. Before the gentleman from Tennessee takes his seat I wish to ask a question. There is nothing in any of these amendments that has relation to political legislation?

Mr. ATKINS. Nothing in the world. I assure my friend from Michigan that there is nothing of that kind.

Mr. BAKER rose.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from Indiana require?

Mr. BAKER. Perhaps five minutes.

Mr. ATKINS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I feel that it is due alike to the House and the Committee on Appropriations that I should say something on the subject of the House conferees having yielded to the demands of the Senate in receding from the item of appropriation for stationery, which was adopted in the House by an almost unanimous vote. Objections urged by certain members of the conference committee of the Senate indicated a doubt as to whether or not under the law we were entitled to our stationery allowance for the present session of Congress; the objection taking such form that if it is sound it would, in my judgment, show that in point of law neither members of the Senate nor members of the House are entitled to claim at any session of Congress, extra or regular, any allowance whatever for the purpose of covering their expenditures for paper, ink, envelopes, stamps, and other matters of that character which properly fall under the designation of stationery. I desire to say that the Committee on Appropriations of this body did not recommend the passage of an appropriation for this purpose without considering the question.

Mr. Speaker, the first regular provision of law which I have been able to find on the subject of stationery for members of Congress was passed in 1842; and it is unnecessary to go back to appropriation bills of prior date touching this subject. In the year 1842 there was inserted in an appropriation bill a provision of law, general in its nature, which continued in force during subsequent years, and for that matter is in force still, except as modified. By that provision the Clerk of each House was required to purchase upon public advertisement stationery for the use of Senators and members. Under that law, which continued without modification till 1868, Senators and Members were limited in the amount of stationery that they should take simply by their own judgment and discretion, some drawing more and some drawing less. This provision of law became perhaps the subject of abuse; certainly it became a matter of complaint that it was abused; that some members under this general privilege obtained a very much larger allowance of stationery than others did. To remedy this evil, in February, 1868, a clause was inserted in an appropriation bill limiting the amount of stationery that might be received by a Member of Congress or a Senator to $125.

Mr. BLOUNT. He might take the money as commutation, if he did not draw the stationery.

Mr. BAKER. I am coming to that. Under the law as it stood prior to that time a Member or Senator was allowed only to draw stationery in kind; but inasmuch as members had been allowed to draw not only one hundred and twenty-five dollars' worth of stationery for a session, but frequently many hundreds of dollars in stationery, the amount of the allowance was limited to $125; and it was further provided that the party might receive a money commutation, either in whole or in part, not exceeding the sum of $125.

On the 24th of July, 1868, for the purpose of carrying into effect, so far as this House was concerned, that provision of law thus limiting the right of members, it was made the duty of the Clerk to honor the requisition of a member of Congress for stationery or commutation therefor to the amount of $125 at any session of Congress. The words of the law of 1868, which by their terms were to go into operation March 3, 1868, provided that this stationery or commutation therefor should be applicable to any session of Congress. In this respect the provision differed from the provision with reference to mileage. The law on the subject of mileage provides for mileage for each regular session of Congress, while stationery or commutation therefor is provided for any session of Congress. It was in consequence of this state of the law that the Committee on Appropriations recommended, and the House adopted with hardly a dissenting voice, this allowance of stationery for the extra session.

The difficulty which has been suggested by the committee of conference of the Senate, if I apprehend that difficulty, grows largely out of the fact that in some years where there was no extra session, only the one regular session of Congress during the year, the general appropriation act has appropriated $125 as the allowance of stationery for each Member or Senator for the year. It is obvious, however, on a moment's reflection, that the phraseology of the law naturally fell from the draughtsman in consequence of the fact it was foreseen or anticipated there would only be the regular session—a single one—during the fiscal year, and hence the amount of $125 was appropriated for the year.

As has been stated by the chairman of the committee, I believe there was a yielding on this point, not in consequence of any conviction on the part of the conference committee representing this House that it was in violation of law, but in consequence of the difficulty the members of the conference committee of the Senate professed in reference to what the true state of the law was. It was in consequence of those scruples, and feeling disposed to yield to those scruples, in order that they might have further time to examine the question and mature their own judgment, that we consented to agree to the report as it has been made, leaving the topic open for further consideration by them. If they should finally agree at the other end of the Capitol that the construction of the law is as I believe the law to be, then it could be rectified hereafter.

Several MEMBERS. Why not rectify it now?

Mr. BAKER. Some of my friends here ask why not rectify it now. That is for the House. If the House sees fit to stand by the law as they expressed it when they voted to put it into the bill, a view of the law which, after full examination, I am satisfied is the true one, I should be glad and should be willing to see that done.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to say a single word.

Mr. BAKER. The gentleman from Texas desires to ask me a question.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to know why this point was not raised when the allowance was made for the extra session in 1877?

Mr. BAKER. That matter was considered by the conference committee. It was spoken about, but no gentleman suggested the reason why it was not thought of then. I believe I can say in further answer that it has been the general judgment—I think myself the universal judgment at both ends of the Capitol—that under the law as it now exists we are entitled to stationery at any session of Congress, regular or extra. It is a fact that we did have it at the last extra session.

Mr. ATKINS. I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.]

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I ask indulgence but for a moment. I do not wish any misunderstanding on this question. The result reached was agreed to by the conferees on the part of the Senate and by the conferees on the part of the House. The conferees on the part of the House as well as the conferees on the part of the Senate were not prepared to assert what was the law on this question. The discussion brought about a doubt upon it. In the Committee on Appropriations of the House we reached the conclusion that the members of the House were entitled to $125 each session for stationery. Being bound by the law, in justice to the members of this House we inserted it in the appropriation bill. When it reached the Senate conferees the question was raised and we were not so well assured we were correct in what had been done. It was suggested and concurred in by the conferees, both on the part of the House and on the part of the Senate, that whatever was the law on this subject, we would, during the next session of Congress, when we had opportunity to assure ourselves that members of the House and Senate were entitled to this allowance, then certainly vote it in. But we had not time sufficient now to assure ourselves fully on that subject, and therefore this is a mere postponement of this whole question. I say the House conferees and the Senate conferees were alike agreed upon this subject.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is there any provision in the bill allowing stationery to members of the Senate?

Mr. BLOUNT. None at all.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one word more in reference to the pay of laborers in the District of Columbia. In addition to what my friend from Tennessee has already said I feel bound to say it was urged on the conference committee we should not assent to a proposition to pay again for work done by laborers in the District of Columbia when we had already paid contractors for the same work, and for that reason we agreed to concur in the proposition of the Senate to strike it out of the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish to make one single remark. I do not doubt at all that Senators and Representatives under the law are entitled to stationery for each session of Congress; I do not doubt that at all myself; but the conferees on the part of the Senate objected to it and I did not feel willing, for one, to higgle about this bill on that account, and therefore signed the conference report.

Mr. AIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. AIKEN. Was not that action on the part of the Senate brought about by the failure to provide for stationery for the Senate?

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir; that was a mere clerical error. The Committee on Appropriations ordered it to be put in, but the clerk in drawing it up, through some mistake, did not insert it.

Mr. SCALES. Allow me to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SCALES. Was not the reason why the Senate did not agree to it that it considered it a doubtful point whether we were entitled to it or not, and being doubtful they preferred to err, if at all, on the safe side and against themselves?

Mr. ATKINS. That is what they thought.

Mr. SCALES. I think, then, that there can be no doubt as to what the action of this House should be. The report should be sustained and the allowance for stationery stricken out.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. STONE. Can a separate vote be had on amendment No. 7?

The SPEAKER. It cannot, for the reason that a conference report must be accepted or rejected as a whole.

Mr. STONE. Can that matter be reached otherwise than by voting down the entire report?

The SPEAKER. It cannot.

The question being taken on agreeing to the conference report, there were—ayes 85, noes 62.

Mr. ACKLEN. I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 26; not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. ACKLEN. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering tellers there were ayes 16; not one-fifth of a quorum.

So tellers were refused, and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. ACKLEN. I call for tellers on the question of agreeing to the report.

On the question of ordering tellers there were ayes 36; more than one-fifth of a quorum.

So tellers were ordered; and Mr. ACKLEN and Mr. ATKINS were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 85, noes 66.

So the report of the committee of conference was adopted.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 85) fixing the date on which the pay of the committee clerks, pages, and laborers of the House of Representatives who are paid for the session only shall begin for this session.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 1369) to relieve the churches of the District of Columbia, and to clear the titles of the trustees to such property.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 1847) to provide for the appointment of a "Mississippi River commission" for the improvement of said river from the head of the passes near its mouth to its headwaters.

TRADE-DOLLARS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 913) to provide for the exchange of trade-dollars for legal-tender silver dollars.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. STEPHENS. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MORTON] will first occupy the floor. Then, according to the understanding which has been come to, my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] will occupy the floor. He will be followed by some gentleman opposed to the bill on the other side.

A portion of the time will be occupied by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FISHER.] The distribution of time, it is proposed, shall be about ten minutes to each, according to the number of speakers. I will state further that all amendments, according to the understanding, will be offered when the gentlemen who offer them have the floor. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] has an amendment, and other gentlemen have amendments.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks since the honorable gentleman from Ohio introduced a bill for the relief of the owners of silver mines and silver bullion in the United States and Europe, and now the distinguished gentleman from Georgia presents a bill for the relief of the subjects of the Emperor of China.

In February, 1873, when the act was passed authorizing the coinage of the trade-dollar, it was worth a fraction over $1.04 in gold. They were not coined as money or for circulation at home, but for export and as a measure of value in trade as their title indicates. They were, however, made a legal tender for $5 in any one payment; but the people of the Pacific States objected to their circulation, and on the 8th of May, 1876, the distinguished gentleman, now Speaker of the House, introduced a bill repealing the legal-tender quality of these coins.

On the 10th of June, 1876, my distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. COX] reported the measure, and it passed both Houses of Congress without an opposing vote or voice. All of these coins held at home were put in circulation months after they had, by the action of the present Speaker and the gentleman from New York, ceased to be a legal tender for any amount.

While I should favor an exchange of the legal-tender silver for the trade-dollar, which speculators have palmed off upon our own citizens, if that alone could be done, I am opposed to the passage of this bill, which discriminates against our own people and in favor of the owners of silver in China, and for other reasons. The Director of the Mint in his last annual report estimated that less than six millions of trade-dollars, all of which were coined for exportation, were held in the United States and about thirty millions in China, where they circulate as money, and are, I believe, a legal tender at their bullion value. The trade-dollar is worth to-day about ninety cents, which would make the value of the thirty millions held in China $27,000,000. Now, if this bill becomes a law, we shall, so long as the Government can maintain legal-tender silver dollars at par in gold, be paying the holders of trade-dollars in China $30,000,000 in gold for twenty-seven millions' worth of silver, or $3,000,000 more than we can buy the same quantity of silver of our own citizens.

The first silver bill which the honorable gentleman from Ohio presented proposed a discrimination in favor of silver mine and bullion owners in the United States and Europe of nearly 20 per cent., and now the gentleman from Georgia proposes a discrimination of 11 per cent. in favor of Chinese subjects. I shall be glad to know how the gentleman proposes to provide the thirty millions of gold necessary to carry out the provisions of this bill if it becomes law. The gentleman certainly cannot expect to exchange dollars of 412½ grains with the Chinese for trade-dollars of 420 grains.

Since the remonetization of silver in 1878 the Government has coined 33,485,950 of the "dollar of the fathers," which it was claimed would be eagerly sought for; and how many of these dollars does the gentleman suppose were in circulation on the 1st of June? One dollar for every family or party of six in the United States, a total of 7,304,915 in a country with a population of 45,000,000, leaving 26,181,045 stored in the vaults of the Treasury and carried by the Government.

At the end of the next fiscal year, without any new legislation, we shall have 59,485,950 silver dollars, and if the people have no more anxiety to secure them than heretofore, the Government will then be warehousing and carrying about 47,000,000.

If the 36,000,000 of trade-dollars are to be added, the appalling total on the 30th of June, 1880, will be over 95,000,000.

Do the gentlemen who favor this measure wish to donate $3,000,000 to the holders of trade-dollars in China? Do they wish, in view of the sale for gold coin since the demonetization of silver in 1873 of $1,299,000,000 of United States bonds, and the reduction since 1865 of nearly six hundred millions of principal and sixty-seven millions in the annual interest charge, to press the increased coinage of silver and hazard the credit of the Government by adding a sum to the amount of silver coin in the vaults of the Treasury which may force the Government to pay these bonds in depreciated silver or coin of less value than that which the Government demanded and received when the bonds were sold?

Mr. Speaker, I think our only safe way is, instead of increasing the coinage of silver, to stop it altogether and wait the result of the negotiations with European nations, for which we have made an appropriation. Let us secure such joint action with other nations as will restore silver to its old steadiness of value, and thus provide a market throughout the world for our silver product. I am in favor of a bimetallic currency whenever such joint action can be secured and a dollar's worth of silver is coined in a silver dollar. The distinguished gentleman from Georgia and those who act with him, on the contrary, aim to make this country a monometallic country, to drive all our gold to Europe, and to confine the silver market to the United States, thus limiting the demand, lowering the value of our silver product, and compelling us to be monometallists. We cannot maintain a double standard except upon a basis of absolute equality, for the cheaper, poorer money will always drive the best out of circulation.

The German government has within a few weeks withdrawn its silver from the market, the question of the remonetization of silver in Germany and England has been under discussion, and now the bullion value of the standard dollar which was recently at eighty-four cents is about eighty-eight and a half cents.

We can in my opinion only maintain a double standard by joint action with European nations, and any attempt to do it single-handed, or to largely increase the coinage of silver legal-tender dollars will, in my judgment, bring great disaster upon the business interests of the whole country.

I hope the gentleman will be willing to withdraw the bill or to defer its further consideration until joint action with European nations can be secured.

Mr. BUCKNER. Before the gentleman from New York takes his seat I desire to ask him a question. Suppose it to be a fact that a large portion of the silver dollars which have been coined remain in the Treasury of the United States unused by the people, to what cause does the gentleman from New York attribute that fact?

Mr. MORTON. To the fact that the people of the United States do not desire that coinage for circulation.

Mr. BUCKNER. I will ask the gentleman further, is there any more gold in circulation relatively than there is silver?

Mr. MORTON. That is a question I cannot answer.

Mr. BUCKNER. I suggest to the gentleman from New York it is not because the people do not want a silver coinage, but because the channels of circulation are already filled with paper. I submit this proposition: If you want to get silver money in circulation it is necessary to get rid of the one and two dollar bills. And it is the same as regards getting gold into circulation.

Mr. MORTON. The withdrawal of small bills would undoubtedly increase the circulation of silver.

Mr. BUCKNER. It is not that the people do not want it, but that they have something else filling its place.

Mr. WARNER. I offer this amendment which I send to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill these words:

Provided, That trade-dollars recoined under this act shall not be counted as part of the coinage of silver required by the act of February 28, 1878: And provided further, That trade-dollars that have been "chopped" or restamped for circulation in China or other foreign countries shall be excluded from the provisions of this act.

Mr. WARNER. Before explaining the object of the amendment which I have offered I desire to say a few words with reference to the remarks made by my friend from New York, [Mr. MORTON.] I do not share in any degree the apprehensions which many gentlemen on that side of the House seem to entertain of the great danger to this country of having the silver of other countries sent here. I have no fear of the United States being made a "dumping-ground," as has been said, for the silver of the rest of the world. That is a mere scarecrow; there is nothing in it whatever. If our mints were open to the free coinage of silver it would be the absurdest nonsense to suppose that Europe or China and India would send here their millions of silver. What would it come here for?

Suppose, if you please, a hundred millions of silver bullion could be gathered up at once in Europe and sent here; what would it come for? For nothing? To be coined into silver dollars merely? Suppose a hundred millions in silver bullion should come here, or any other sum, and be coined, what would happen? What would be done with it? Will it buy any more commodities, any more wheat, any more cotton, any more of our products of any kind after it has been coined under free coinage than it will as bullion? Not a dollar's worth more; not a pound of anything more. Silver will come here, then, if commodities should fall lower, and on no other conditions. But if silver should come here to be coined and sent into circulation as money, or in any way be used for the purchase of commodities, then commodities certainly would not fall. If silver should come here under such conditions, commodities must necessarily rise. We cannot possibly have at one and the same time cheap money and cheap commodities. If money is cheap, then commodities must be dear, and labor must be dearer, too. Labor and all the products of labor under such conditions, I say, must become dearer. Is there any objection to that? The old mercantile theory, as it is called, dictated laws to keep money in a country and prevent its going out; to get all that could be got and then keep it in the country. Under the mercantile theory they fenced money in, but never out; they sold everything possible for money, and then held on to the money, as if it were the only thing that constituted wealth. But within the last few years we find a new and, if possible, a worse doctrine than the mercantile theory prevailing in this country.

We are told by the new doctors of political economy that the true policy, instead of getting money, is to exclude it, to force it out. Well, that is a strange doctrine, surely, and for one I cannot see any philosophy in it; there is no philosophy in it and no common sense. When the coinage bill was under discussion some weeks ago in this House I think we heard from the gentleman from New York that that bill would give 15 or 18 per cent. profit to the bullion-holders, while at the same time it would cheat the creditor out of from 15 to 18 per cent.; that is to say, in one man's hand it would be a big dollar and in another man's hand it would be a small dollar. It would be a stick too long at one end and too short at the other. It does make heavy strains on logic to support the financial theories of some of our late doctors. They are afraid silver will come in on us like a flood. They are afraid there will be so much silver poured in here that commodities will not be worth anything! Why, we will have cheap money and cheap commodities at the same time! That would be the same thing as having a peck measure hold a bushel!

Should silver come here under free coinage it would come to be exchanged for commodities, and an increase in the quantity of silver must necessarily be attended with an increase in the price of commodities. Would that be a misfortune? If so, to whom? To the farmer, to the manufacturer, to the laborer? Certainly not. Why, there is no more danger of this country's having too much metallic money than there is that too much of the water of the Atlantic will accumulate on the American coast. Silver as well as gold is the money of the world, and if left to regulate itself under the laws of international trade it will be distributed over the world in proportion to the international trade of the different nations. It will go where prices are lowest and not where they are highest, and if silver under free coinage would come here it would be because prices of commodities were lower than elsewhere. Away, I say, with the nonsense of too much metallic money! It has no place in political economy, and ought to have no place in our national economy.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. MORTON] reminds us that the silver now being coined clings to the Treasury and will not go into circulation. He tells us also, and others are constantly telling us, that under Gresham's law the cheaper will drive out the dearer money. Is this an exception, or is silver the dearer money? The plain truth is, the Secretary does not pay out the silver. He does not offer to; at least he does not do it. I have not had a legal-tender silver dollar offered to me in this city. Let the Secretary pay them out. They will circulate. There need be no fear of that. If in quantities they become cumbersome the certificate can be had in their place. I should not be surprised if banks should prefer gold to silver. Very likely, indeed, and right here I apprehend lies the difficulty in paying out silver coins.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while what I have said is true in general of metallic money under free or unrestricted coinage, yet I confess that so long as the United States adheres to the policy of buying a certain amount of metal and making money of that and allowing no more, and by limiting the amount coined raising the value of coined silver—a pernicious practice, an erroneous policy; one which has no foundation in science or common sense, and which is an abandonment of every principle on which metallic money rests, a surrender of every advantage that metallic money possesses over paper money—so long, I say, as the United States stands committed to that policy, then I am opposed surely to admitting into this country from other countries a given quantity—so many pounds or tons of silver in the form of trade-dollars, or in any other form, that are now held in China to be coined into full legal-tender dollars—for the simple reason that it is giving a preference, giving a higher price or putting a greater value on silver in this form held in China than we give to that now being produced from our own mines. Hence, Mr. Speaker, I have offered my amendment excluding from the provisions of this act trade-dollars that have been "chopped," as it is called, or restamped for circulation in China.

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WARNER. With pleasure.

Mr. BAYNE. I would like my friend to answer this question: Why is it that you argue that 412½ grains is the proper quantity of silver to put into a silver dollar?

Mr. WARNER. I shall be pleased to answer my friend.

Mr. BAYNE. Why not make it equivalent in value to a gold dollar?

Mr. WARNER. I will answer my friend. First, because the dollar of 412½ grains is the dollar that has been longest known to our laws. It is the unit that has not been changed from the foundation of the Government; it has always contained the same quantity of pure silver. Now, does my friend ask why we do not increase it in weight so as to give it the same purchasing power that a gold dollar has? I answer because you have changed the value of the gold dollar since 1873. Your gold dollar is a different dollar now from the gold dollar before 1873, or would be now but for the legislation on the statute-book in its favor, and you had no right to alter that dollar. Had you a right? Will you answer that?

Mr. BAYNE. The quantity of bullion has not been changed in the gold dollar nor the fineness of the metal.

Mr. WARNER. Oh, no; neither the size of the dollar, nor its form, nor the stamp, nor the fineness of the metal has been changed, I grant, but that subtle quality which lies behind all of these, the element of value, has been changed. The only thing worth considering in a dollar, its value, has been changed. The change, I know, has come under a disguise more or less impenetrable, but is a change nevertheless. You have decreased the value of silver as compared with gold by lessening the use of silver and increasing the use for gold, and having done that you have no right now to come before Congress and ask that the silver dollar shall be raised in value up to the present level of the gold dollar. That is my first answer; and next I say, that the dollar of 412½ grains has a greater value or purchasing power now than it had five or ten years ago. [Here the hammer fell.] I would like to have a moment more, that I may read an extract from the Financial Chronicle explanatory of the condition of trade-dollars in China.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WARNER. I wish to say that trade-dollars that have been sent to China as soon as they are put into circulation there are restamped with the private marks, in Chinese characters, of the merchant who issues them, and that they soon become divided up into smaller pieces, and made into what is called sycee-money, which is nothing more than small pieces of silver that pass by weight. This fact proves that the trade-dollar never did give us any advantage in trade. Although it has been claimed that by the device of putting 420 grains of silver in a dollar, instead of 412½, we gained an advantage in our trade with China, nevertheless it must be now apparent, since we know that these same dollars are soon "chopped," restamped, and finally divided into bits of bullion, which are taken by weight, that the Chinese understand money as well as we do. The fact is, we never did get any more for one hundred and fourteen trade-dollars than we got or could get for one hundred and sixteen of the old dollars. So a pound of silver in China even is worth just as much and no more than twelve ounces are worth. Here is what the Financiel Chronicle says respecting trade-dollars in China, and I think, as I believe it to be true, that it ought to be conclusive on the question.

Mr. MORTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WARNER. I will.

Mr. MORTON. Can you describe the nature, style, and character of the stamp?

Mr. WARNER. I was just proceeding to do that. The New York Financial Chronicle of May 24 says:

> China merchants tell us that there are very few trade-dollars at the present time; that as soon as any silver currency is introduced into the country each piece is stamped with the initials of the persons issuing it; and this process is repeated, so that soon the coins get broken up and are melted down and become what is called sycee-silver, little bars, or pigs, stamped as before, and then circulated again. Our informants tell us that one sees large baskets full of these broken coins constantly being brought in to be made up into pigs. If these facts are correct, it is clear that the Government has nothing to fear from the exported dollars, and would only have to provide for the six millions now in the country. We think we have the best of reasons for believing this would be the limit of the redemption, even if all now in circulation were brought in.

Even without the amendment which I have offered, I do not believe there would be a million of these trade-dollars that would come back to this country, and for reasons which I have stated. But I desire nevertheless that the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. BARBER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

Mr. BARBER. Has the Secretary of the Treasury made any recommendation on this point?

Mr. WARNER. He has not to me, and it is very possible that he does not want such a measure to pass. I do not know; but I think we should be the judges of that.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FISHER. I move to amend the bill now before the House by inserting after the word "States" in the fifth line the words "for the period of four months from and after the passage of this act." If that amendment shall be adopted the bill will then read as follows:

> That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be exchanged, at the Treasury and at all sub-treasuries of the United States for the period of four months from and after the passage of this act, legal-tender silver dollars for trade-dollars at par; and shall recoin the said trade-dollars into legal-tender dollars, as now provided by law; and shall stop the further coinage of trade-dollars.

Now, what is the object of this bill? It is not denied that if a certain amount of these trade-dollars were not in circulation in the United States no such bill as this would have been introduced into this Congress. The object sought to be accomplished by this bill is simply to relieve our own people. If it shall be passed as now reported, and without amendment, I hold that the very object sought under the bill will be defeated.

In the first place, instead of these coins coming into the sub-treasury of the United States for redemption, the people will say that as they are as good as the standard dollar for circulation they will not present them for recoinage. In the second place, this bill as now proposed will have a tendency to bring in trade-dollars from abroad.

Now, I do not apprehend the difficulty which is foreseen by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MORTON.] However, I will speak upon that point a little further on. I hold that we would never have had any trouble with the trade-dollar if it had not lost its legal-tender quality in 1876. From February, 1873, to July, 1876, the trade-dollar did have a legal-tender quality. During that period sixteen millions of trade-dollars were coined. Since that time twenty millions of trade-dollars have been coined. We know further that of the thirty-six millions of trade-dollars which have been coined in this country over twenty-eight millions have been exported, and only about eight millions have been left in the country.

I wish to call attention to the fact that we will not have these eight millions of trade-dollars to redeem or exchange for legal-tender dollars, because since the trade-dollar has been in circulation it has been used solely in the arts, and manifestly in preference to the dollar of 412½ grains, because it is intrinsically more valuable. Of course a silversmith or a worker in silver will take for his purpose a dollar of 420 grains and not the dollar of 412½ grains. Further, the composition of the dollar of 420 grains is such in its toughness as to make it desirable for those working in silver; and therefore bullion on account of its brittleness has not been used by them. It has been estimated that during the past two years about two millions yearly of these trade-dollars have been consumed in the arts in this country.

Now, I do not believe that if we pass this bill, limiting it as to time as I propose by my amendment, which will give sufficient time only to get in the trade-dollars which are in circulation in the United States—I do not believe that with that limit of time there will be three millions of trade-dollars presented for exchange.

In answer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] who has offered an amendment shutting out the chopped or clipped dollars, I desire to say that that amendment will not answer the purpose. I have here in my hand a trade-dollar from China which bears the mark of the Chinese merchant. That mark can be removed in a moment, and it can be applied a hundred times and not mutilate the coin. We know that in anticipation of the passage of some such bill as this by the Forty-fifth Congress there were two shipments of trade-dollars from China to this country; one of about seven hundred thousand and another of about four hundred thousand, making, in all, eleven hundred thousand trade-dollars now lying in New York to receive the benefit of this bill.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, Let me ask the gentleman a question right there in connection with the marked dollar he has produced here.

Mr. FISHER. Unless it is important I would rather not, as I have only ten minutes' time.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Is this mark upon the Chinese dollar mere paint that can be washed off?

Mr. FISHER. It is; and that is the reason I have offered my amendment.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Does the gentleman understand that the bulk of the trade-dollars in China are marked that way?

Mr. FISHER. I will come to that in a moment. When the gentleman from New York speaks of these thirty million trade-dollars abroad, I want to say to him that they are not in existence. The Commercial Advertiser, of San Francisco, in an article which was copied into the Philadelphia Press of yesterday, giving an account of the interview of the Secretary of the Treasury with our Coinage Committee two or three weeks ago, states that of the twenty-eight million trade-dollars which have gone abroad, more than four-fifths have been converted into sycee-silver and are not now in existence. Still, we know these coins are there, because I have here a report of the Hong-Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation Company, which says:

> Trade-dollars are current by count at Singapore, Penang, Bangkok, and Saigon; they are current by weight at Swatow, Amoy, Foochow, and Canton. In Hong-Kong they are not a legal tender, and the banks will only take them from each other by special arrangement; but the Chinese take them freely in Hong-Kong when they want coin of any description, which is very seldom, as they prefer bank-notes, and only take coin from the banks when they require to export it from the colony. In the south of China, the Straits and Cochin China, the trade-dollar is well known and passes without comment along with the clean Mexican dollars, but in Shanghai and the northern ports it is unknown, and is not likely to be current for a length of time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have sufficient evidence that a certain proportion of these $28,000,000 is liable to come in upon us unless we limit the time, and I offer my amendment with the view of fixing such a limit that we can take from our own people these trade-dollars, while we shut out those which are held abroad, where they have been bought at their commercial value.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MCLANE. Mr. Speaker, I am quite as much in favor of the coinage of the silver dollar as the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] himself. I have no idea that we shall ever dispense with the use of silver. I have no idea that we ought ever to dispense with the use of silver. I do not believe that any country, in the present condition of the world, with the present supply of the precious metals, can dispense with the use of silver. I have no doubt at all that the demonetization of silver in Germany lies at the root of all the present financial difficulty in that country; and I sympathize entirely with the honorable gentleman from Ohio, when he treats this question as one vital to the industrial interests of this country; when he maintains that we should not be dependent upon gold alone; that with the debt of this country, contracted when we had the two metals, we ought to have the two metals to the end, and that the Government should never depend upon one metal alone with which to pay either the principal or the interest of this debt.

But although it is wise and proper to have the two metals, it is equally wise and proper that these two metals should hold a proper relation to each other in value. This consideration has never at any time in the history of this country been overlooked. The gentleman from Ohio when he stated that the silver dollar has never been changed in value omitted altogether to remind the House that the gold dollar has been changed. The equality between the two metals can be preserved just as well by changing the gold dollar as by changing the silver dollar. The gentleman ought to know, and I have no doubt he does know, that from the foundation of this Government down to the year 1834 the silver dollar was overvalued, and that after 1834, when the value of the gold dollar was changed, gold was overvalued. So far is it from being sound in finance to say that the value of these metals has never been changed, the very opposite ought to have been said. It is the duty of the Government to change the values whenever they are not in equality.

Mr. WARNER. The gentleman will allow me to ask a question. Suppose we had changed the ratio between these metals at the beginning of this session——

Mr. MCLANE. I see the drift of the gentleman's question and I will answer it. Of course, Mr. Speaker, it is at times difficult to maintain this equality of value; and a condition of things may arise in which the fluctuation of one or the other metal may be so rapid, so violent, that some embarrassment may be created. Why, sir, the gentleman from Ohio knows very well that for several years following the discovery of gold in California in 1848 we had over $100,000,000 of gold produced annually——

Mr. WARNER. One hundred and fifty million dollars.

Mr. MCLANE. And he knows that for five years succeeding that discovery of gold there was no very great inequality in the value of the two metals because of the overproduction of gold.

Mr. WARNER. Oh, no; I cannot assent to that.

Mr. MCLANE. Why, sir, it is the fact that from 1848 to 1854 or 1855 we had a most extraordinary production of gold——

Mr. WARNER. But no change in the ratio between gold and silver in consequence.

Mr. MCLANE. So I understand, and we will come to that. There was a most extraordinary production of gold in California and in Australia during the period I have just indicated. It is very remarkable, in view of what is now occurring, that this extraordinary production of gold produced very little inequality between the metals. Then in 1855 we discovered the silver mines in Nevada, and there was a great decrease in the production of gold and a great increase in the production of silver; yet still there was very little inequality in the value of the two metals. It is thus shown that, if left to the ordinary course of nature and of trade and of commerce, the two metals do maintain their equality, so that it is rarely ever necessary for governments to interfere; and governments have very rarely interfered to any great extent.

Now, of late years we have been, and we are to-day, in a most anomalous condition. We have more than half the European world dispensing with the use of silver provisionally, temporarily. Italy has suspended specie payments for the last ten years, and it is a silver country. Austria has suspended specie payments. Finally America dispensed with specie payments, and then Germany demonetized silver altogether. Thus we have nearly one hundred millions of people dispensing with the use of silver; and this is the cause of the fall in its value. The cause is not overproduction of either metal. Both metals, I contend, are necessary, and neither is produced in excess. That was the argument of the gentleman from Ohio. I have no idea that we are producing either metal too rapidly. We consume all that is produced. I might venture to say we have not enough of these metals. When we take into consideration the amount of silver that is used in the arts and the quantity that goes to the East, there is none too much silver.

This brings me to notice the argument of my friend from New York, [Mr. MORTON.] If he is in truth a bimetallist, let him have patience. Let things adjust themselves. If we can remain with silver at 412½ grains to the dollar let us so remain, but do not say, as the gentleman from Ohio does, he never will change it, or that he will coin it without limit and even stimulate the coinage thereof.

Mr. WARNER. I would not initiate ourselves any change of the proportion of silver; I am willing at any time, however, whenever we have concurrent action on the part of other nations, to fix a common ratio.

Mr. MCLANE. Do not let him, as a silver man and as a sound financier, say he would give to the laboring-man of this country either silver or gold at less than its proper value. Do not let him go to the country, above all do not let him attempt to represent the democracy of this country and say that the laboring-man shall be paid in coin inferior to the coin that any other man has. [Applause.] He knows and we all know that the laboring-man of the country will be paid in silver, and I am with him in demanding we shall have the silver dollar, but I want the silver dollar to be as good as the gold dollar. There is no difficulty in having it so. Why, in 1834 we legislated for that very purpose.

A MEMBER. Bring down the gold.

Mr. MCLANE. Certainly, bring down the gold; take out a grain of gold or so much as the equalization requires, within certain limits, as we did in 1834.

Mr. WARNER. We will all agree to that, but the concurrence of other countries is necessary to keep the two metals together.

Mr. MCLANE. We always have done it. I am entirely with the advocates of silver if they propose that or any other satisfactory mode of equalizing it. All I ask is the two metals should be equalized, and until we have equalized them—now, Mr. Speaker, I want the attention of the gentleman from Ohio——

Mr. WARNER. Very well.

Mr. MCLANE. Until we have equalized them let him hold his soul in patience.

Mr. WARNER. Oh, I cannot do it. [Laughter and applause.] I must demand the immediate restoration of silver. [Applause.]

Mr. MCLANE. Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that silver has been remonetized, and there is no man on this floor whose constituency is more earnestly interested in this question than mine, not only because it is a commercial but because it is a manufacturing and industrial constituency, but they want the coins of the country to be adjusted and equalized by established correlative values in harmony with their intrinsic values. And I say to this House that there is not only no serious difficulty in so equalizing them, but our legislation is full of instruction. Why, when we enacted this dollar of which the gentleman from Ohio speaks we had in circulation other dollars like this trade-dollar. We had then a dollar worth 416 grains.

When Mr. Hamilton, the founder of our system of finance, said we must have silver as well as gold, he recommended that the gold and silver dollar should be maintained at the same value.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McLANE. Certainly.

Mr. SPARKS. What produced this want of uniformity in the two metals?

Mr. McLANE. I have no doubt it was the temporary disuse of silver.

Mr. SPARKS. It was caused, then, by the demonetization of silver?

Mr. McLANE. Yes, sir; and the disuse thereof in several European countries.

Mr. SPARKS. Then, when our legislation has produced this want of uniformity between the two metals, shall we stand here and say we will refuse all legislation to provide adequate remedy?

Mr. McLANE. No, sir; and though all the difficulty does not come from legislation, by legislation let us remedy it, and not necessarily wait on any other country in the world. [Applause.] Do it ourselves if other countries will not co-operate, as I hope they will, and if I object to the bill of the gentleman from Ohio it is because he has not done it. If he will take hold of this question in a practical way I will go with him and make the two metals of equal value, and then the democracy of the country will have their constitutional money, [applause,] which is coin with its value properly regulated by Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WARNER. I wish to ask the gentleman a question right there.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that that body insisted on its first amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 2252) making an appropriation for certain judicial expenses disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and asked for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as conferees on its part Mr. WALLACE, Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia, and Mr. BOOTH.

TRADE-DOLLARS.

Mr. McLANE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say for myself——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. McLANE. When I told the gentleman from Ohio to hold his soul in patience I was willing to place the same restraint upon myself and wait the course of trade and commerce to indicate the necessary regulation of these values, and to conform our coinage thereto.

Mr. FORT. We desire to hear the gentleman from Maryland. I hope his time will be extended.

Mr. STEPHENS. Oh, no, we cannot.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made, and the gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend from Maryland allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McLANE. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. Did I understand the gentleman correctly as being in favor of reducing the quantity of gold in the gold dollar and equalizing it with silver by such reduction?

Mr. McLANE. Perfectly so. But of course within reasonable and proper limits, as was done in 1834.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR JUDICIAL EXPENSES.

Mr. McMAHON. I move that the House agree to the request of the Senate for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2252) making appropriations for certain judicial expenses.

The motion was agreed to.

TRADE-DOLLARS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] is recognized.

Mr. KEIFER. I understood when I was trying to make an arrangement for the debate on this bill that I was to have twenty minutes and that the time that was desired by members of the committee was only one hour. In view of the time I desired I asked that the whole time be extended to two hours. Now I understand the time is so divided that I can have but ten minutes, and I feel as if under those circumstances I could not enter upon the discussion.

Mr. MONROE. I desire to occupy only a few moments in explaining my position in regard to this bill. I send to the desk an amendment I propose to offer and ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill insert the following:

Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to increase the amount of legal-tender silver dollars to be coined per month under the limitations of existing law.

Mr. MONROE. Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that the amendment which I propose is the opposite of that offered by my colleague from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER.] This amendment is such that if it were adopted by the House I could then vote for the bill; and I think there are a number of other gentlemen in the same situation with myself. There are reasons, Mr. Speaker, why I should greatly desire to vote for a bill to redeem and recoin the trade-dollar. It has always seemed to me to be an anomalous coin, an irregular piece of money, if I may use that expression. It has proved to be a source of irritation to our people so far as they have been constrained to receive it in this country, and they have been so constrained to the extent of five or six millions of dollars and may be constrained to receive more.

We have too many kinds of dollars, in my judgment. I do not think this is a popular or comparatively useful form of the dollar, and I would be very glad to remove it from the number of our silver coins and to substitute the legal-tender silver dollar for it. I think this course would greatly simplify our currency system, would add to its popularity and acceptability among the people, would in some cases prevent losses and would remove some obstacles in the way of a solid and permanent system of specie payments.

But, Mr. Speaker, while I desire to vote for this bill, I cannot do so unless some amendment substantially like that which has just been read at the Clerk's desk shall be attached to it. I wish to provide that the silver dollars which shall be coined in pursuance of this bill which has been reported by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia shall not increase the amount of silver dollars already provided for under the limitations of existing law. I think we are now coining each month as many silver dollars as it is safe for us to do under present circumstances. I am quite willing that the Secretary of the Treasury shall recoin trade-dollars instead of coining bullion as a part of the amount per month which is to be added to our coinage. In that way the trade-dollars will gradually be called in and recoined; and there will be no disturbance of our financial system.

But I am unwilling to add to the total amount of coinage per month so large a quantity as I fear will soon have to be recoined provided we open the doors for the unlimited recoinage of trade-dollars in addition to the amount already provided for. There is more danger of a large quantity of these dollars coming to this country than my colleague from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] seems to suppose, and his amendment does not guard as effectually against such an inflow as he would wish.

I am of opinion that the stamping and chopping of trade-dollars in China is not as universal as my colleague supposes it to be. It is no doubt true that in those parts of China where the old-fashioned Chinese habits still prevail this marking and stamping and chopping, as it is called, has been carried on to a great extent. But I think it is by no means universal in the great commercial ports, and that there trade-dollars pass in large quantities from hand to hand in the transactions of business, unchanged, just as they left our own mints. I fear that in some crisis there will be a large influx of these dollars into this country, and that if we provide for the redemption and recoinage of them as fast as they shall be offered, we shall find that we are swelling by a large amount the aggregate number of silver dollars in the country.

I hope the time will come within a year when I should feel no solicitude on account of that. But the time has not yet come. I do not wish to double or treble the amount of our silver coinage until we can see the result of this general discussion and of these conferences which are going on in Europe. I do hopefully look forward to the result of those discussions. I am an earnest and confirmed bimetallist. I do not believe the world can get along without the use of both the metals. But I am anxious that this country in returning to the full and free use of silver should do it slowly enough and wisely enough not to bring embarrassment and disaster upon ourselves. I would rather defer it until we learn the result of the present transition of opinion which is going on in Europe. Plainly the safest course for us at present is to allow our silver-dollar law, as it is called, to remain upon the statute-book precisely as it is. I have announced that opinion once or twice before in this House, and I still hold it. I am as earnest a friend of the use of silver as any man here, but I cannot help thinking that the truest friendship for the free use of the silver dollar is that which proceeds so carefully that there shall be no danger of some reaction hereafter that shall overthrow all that we have thus far done.

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2251) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

APPOINTMENT OF A COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to announce that Mr. McMAHON, Mr. COBB, and Mr. MONROE have been appointed conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the judicial appropriation bill.

INTERCHANGE OF TRADE-DOLLARS.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I only wanted to say, in reference to this matter, what probably is very well known to every member of the House, that we have three kinds of silver dollars, a silver dollar containing 384 grains, nine-tenths fine, which is a legal tender, and of which we have between forty and fifty millions in circulation; a silver dollar containing 412½ grains of the same kind of silver, which is a legal tender; and we have the singular fact presenting itself of a silver dollar of 420 grains of the same kind of silver which is at a discount.

This bill proposes simply to take up that silver dollar of 420 grains, nine-tenths fine, and replace it with the silver dollar of 412½ grains, the Government thereby making 7½ grains for the trouble of coining it.

I am at a loss from my little experience in this world in financial matters to see where by any possibility any damage can accrue to the Government from this measure.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] who has just taken his seat is very much afraid, if I understood him correctly, that a flood of silver is going to ruin this country. I never heard of a country being ruined in that way, but I have heard of many countries being ruined by not having enough of it. I fail to see how taking a silver dollar containing 420 grains and putting it into a dollar of 412½ grains is increasing the quantity of silver in the country. The gentleman referred to Europe as an illustration of what we ought to do in reference to silver. Sir, that is the worst place in the world for any gentleman to refer to in arguing this matter.

A year ago when they legalized the dollar of 412½ grains they pointed to Europe and told us that Europe had done so and so in reference to this matter and that we ought to follow her lead. Europe is backing on that track, and considering seriously whether she will not take back all her legislation enacted in regard to this matter. They are refusing to sell silver in Germany. That is not all. Gentlemen talk about having too much silver. Wait until we get it. We have not one hundred millions of silver of all kinds in this country to-day. France has to-day five hundred millions of silver at par with gold, and interchangeable with it at 15½ to 1.

I am utterly astonished to find gentlemen who claim to be financiers and to know something about the commerce of the country standing upon this floor and lamenting the evil that is to befall this country when we have too many silver dollars.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Is France increasing this amount of silver circulation?

Mr. PRICE. I am not prepared to say, but I am prepared to say that she is not decreasing it. When we get up in the neighborhood of five hundred millions of silver, or get too much of it, I am willing to take the back track in this legislation; but until then, never.

I ought to have said in answer to my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. CLAFLIN,] that France is coining in our ratio, and that is a fact in our favor and is in favor of this country having more silver dollars.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the debate upon this bill has been limited to ten-minute speeches. Recently I made some remarks in this House relating to the trade-dollars. I do not think of anything just now that I desire to change in what I said at that time. I then said that the trade-dollar was properly authorized and coined for a particular purpose, for exportation, and when exported served that purpose well and was advantageous to the commerce of this country. It was in its inception intended to be a foreign coin, and to be coined only for export to China and Japan, and to serve our convenience and profit in our commerce with other nations; but, sir, in the course of time the trade-dollar was, for some reason unknown to me, adopted as one of the coins of the United States. I have not now time to read these statutes. Gentlemen can refer to them. They are in the acts of February, 1873, in the Revised Statutes, and in the laws of 1876.

By the Revised Statutes in 1874 Congress made the trade-dollar a legal tender, and it thereby became one of the coins of the United States, entitled to honorable and to enforced circulation within the realm, equal with other coin and equal to other money to the extent of the limit; and from that day every citizen became bound to honor it, and from thenceforward the Government could not disown it without dishonoring itself, and we are bound in honor to stand by it and circulate it at par, or redeem it in some dollar that is still a legal tender. We issued and put it in circulation at par when we made it legal tender in 1874, and we are bound to redeem it at par. It makes no difference how many or how few grains of silver it contains.

The question to-day is the question of redemption. That is the question that is presented by this bill, and it matters not whether gentlemen may be in favor of gold alone or of a bimetallic system, or whether they are in favor of paper money, still they are bound in honor to redeem this trade-dollar because it bears the superscription of the United States. It is called a dollar by recent acts of Congress, and was made a legal tender by law, and its depreciation does not relieve us from the obligation of redemption. We must give another dollar for it that is as good as we solemnly said by law the trade-dollar was when we issued it. Had we never made it a legal tender and enforced its circulation in payment of debts between citizen and citizen we might escape our obligation to redeem; but we cannot disown our own legal issue; we cannot escape without dishonor. It depreciated because we demonetized it. So by our own act, and only because of our own act of demonetization and because we discarded it, did it fall below par.

This Government issued paper money and made it legal tender in payment of debts. And that paper money, without any act of demonetization, without fault of the Government, depreciated and fell far below par; and did the fact of such depreciation and fall relieve us from our obligation in honor to redeem that paper money as soon as we could conveniently do so? And for one I rejoice that the day of redemption has come, and our paper dollar is to-day worth one hundred cents in silver or gold. I confess I did not desire to enforce resumption by contraction. I did not wish to decrease the amount of money in circulation. I did not wish to decrease the value of property and increase the value of the dollar. I did not wish to make it harder for the debtor to pay his debt than it was when he contracted his debt. I, however, always desired to return to resumption when it could in justice and fairness be done. I hoped we might reach it by the road of prosperity. It was determined to travel faster than I desired; and while the road was, I think, made unnecessarily rugged and distressful, still we have reached it, and I rejoice that we have accomplished the journey, and I turn a hopeful eye to coming prosperity.

If we were bound in honor to redeem the legal-tender paper dollar we are also bound in honor to redeem the legal-tender trade-dollar. At one time we could have purchased the paper dollar in the market at a great discount. Does my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. MORTON] claim that because the legal-tender paper dollar was below par it would have been honorable for this Government to have purchased it in Wall street at its market value and thus have avoided its redemption? Or, because it was below par, could we have honorably disowned it and refused to redeem it?

Mr. MORTON. Does the gentleman claim that trade-dollars were issued as legal-tender dollars?

Mr. FORT. I claim that the law of the United States provided for the coinage of a trade-dollar, and that in February, 1874, Congress made the trade-dollar a legal tender in payment of debts to the amount of $5. And millions of these dollars were issued while the law making them legal tender was still in force. If I had performed labor for my distinguished friend to the value of $5 he could have legally paid me with five trade-dollars. I would have had the right to have kept those five trade-dollars which he compelled me to take for my labor, and to present them to-day to the Government that issued them and called them dollars and made them legal tender and compelled me thus to take them, and to demand that in honor the Government should still make them legal tender or redeem them in what is to-day legal-tender dollars.

Mr. MORTON. At the time it was made a legal tender it was worth one hundred and four cents in gold.

Mr. FORT. No doubt, and down to 1876 it was a legal tender, which my distinguished friend seems to have forgotten. But in 1876, after the dollar of 412½ grains was demonetized, in pursuance of the same scheme the trade-dollar was also demonetized. Can we, however, in honor, by the simple act of demonetization, relieve ourselves from the moral obligation to make good what we have solemnly declared upon our statute-books is a dollar and with which labor was paid for at its equivalent upon that measure? Have I not a right to-day to go with my five trade-dollars, which I may have earned by hard labor for my distinguished and wealthy friend, and say to the Government that it must still make them legal tender or redeem them? And if the Government would not redeem them, I certainly would have a moral right to say to my friend, "You have paid me money which is not good and current."

But, as has been well stated, there will be no loss to the Government by this redemption and exchange under this bill. We will not lose a penny by being honest and honorable in this matter.. We can redeem every trade-dollar that is in America or in China and not lose a single cent by it. The trade-dollar has nearly two cents more silver in it than the legal-tender dollar has, and it will only cost one cent to recoin it. So the Government can be consistent, honorable, and honest, and still make 1 per cent. by the transaction. Who can complain of this?

But I hold that it makes no difference whether we lose or make; we are bound to redeem what we have placed the Government stamp upon and by law called a legal-tender dollar. These trade-dollars will not come back to this country in any great quantity. It is admitted on all hands that twenty-eight million of them have been exported to China. Many millions more have been carried abroad in the pockets of Chinamen returning to their country, which have not been counted. No doubt thirty-four or thirty-five millions of these trade-dollars have gone to China and Japan, and most of the remaining two or three millions have gone into the melting-pot, and are no longer in existence. They will never appear for redemption.

Further, Mr. Speaker, pass this bill and the trade-dollars will immediately come up to par and be equal to the legal-tender dollar, and then they will not be presented for redemption but will circulate as other silver dollars. The legal-tender paper dollar does not come to the Treasury for redemption in any amount; so, in my opinion, the trade-dollar would not.

Mr. McLANE. Why not make it a legal tender?

Mr. FORT. I am glad the gentleman asked the question, as I would have forgotten to give my reason. Because we would then have two coins of silver, each a dollar and each a measure of value and differing in weight one from the other. No, I would say to my friend from Maryland, let us remain consistent, let us have but one dollar, let us redeem the trade-dollar by the legal-tender dollar, and then we will have one weight for our legal dollar, thus be consistent, not only in our own eyes but in the eyes of other nations. How would it look to provide in a law that 412½ grains of standard silver should be a legal-tender dollar and then a line or two further down on the statute-book provide that 420 grains of standard silver should also be a legal-tender dollar, and each thus be declared to be a true measure of value?

Mr. McLANE. That is exactly what we did when we passed the first coinage act of 1792, I think it was; we made a dollar of 416 grains and a dollar of 412½ grains both legal tender.

Mr. FORT. The gentleman is certainly mistaken. I refer him to history. We never did any such thing, I say to him with all respect. The first and only silver dollar, except the trade-dollar, was 371¼ grains pure silver, which is just equal to 412½ grains of standard silver. From 1792, when Alexander Hamilton was Secretary of the Treasury, we never had a silver dollar of any other weight; and if our fathers did have silver dollars differing in weight, it is no reason why we, their children, should be inconsistent now. In money matters let us have everything as simple and certain as possible, so that when any person has a dollar in his pocket, be it silver, gold, or paper, he may know he has one hundred cents, good for any purpose at any place.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FORT. Is my time out so soon?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. FORT. I certainly did not think I had occupied over about three minutes.

This is my bill, Mr. Speaker, and I have some more than usual interest in it on that account, and had looked up the law and the points relating to it somewhat, and I have not yet come to state the principal reasons why it should pass just as it is, without amendment; but of course I recognize the rule of the House which cuts me off in the midst of my thoughts, and yield to the Speaker's gavel.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I send to the Clerk's desk a motion reduced to writing, which I shall ask to be considered by the House at the proper time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. Mr. Speaker, I have discovered upon an examination of this question that there are difficulties attending the subject which cannot be reached by an amendment of the bill. I therefore propose to submit the motion which has been read by the Clerk. That motion is not prompted by any disrespect for the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, or any want of confidence in that committee, from which my distinguished friend, its chairman, has reported this bill. In order to present my point distinctly, I will ask the Clerk to read a portion of section 3520 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Any owner of silver bullion may deposit the same at any mint, to be formed into bars or into dollars of the weight of 420 grains troy, designated in this title as trade-dollars.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. That provision is from the statute of 1873, which authorized the unlimited coinage of bullion into these trade-dollars. I now ask the Clerk to read section 2 of a joint resolution of July 22, 1876.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the trade-dollar shall not hereafter be a legal tender; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to limit from time to time the coinage thereof to such an amount as he may deem sufficient to meet the export demand for the same.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I call attention to the fact that though Congress in 1873 provided for an unlimited coinage of trade-dollars, it subsequently, by joint resolution of July 22, 1876, gave the Secretary of the Treasury power to limit the coinage of these trade-dollars to the actual demands of commerce.

Now, in connection with those two provisions of law, look at the amounts to which these dollars have been coined within the last few years. In 1876, the year in which this limitation on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized, there were coined 6,132,050 of these trade-dollars; in 1877, 9,162,900, and in 1878, 11,378,010. It will be observed that from the time that the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized by a joint resolution of Congress to limit the coinage of these dollars there has been a rapid increase in the amount of this coinage. Though he was authorized to limit this description of coinage so as merely to meet the demands of commerce, we find that during the last year he authorized the coinage of $11,000,000 of this currency. Yet we are told in this debate, and I believe the fact is reported by the Director of the Mint, that there are only between six and seven millions of these trade-dollars now in this country. Now, if the demands of commerce are absorbing this coinage so rapidly that, although during the last year eleven million trade-dollars were coined, only $6,000,000 of this currency is now left in the country, why is it necessary at this time, at the end of this extra session, to interfere with this coinage?

Mr. FISHER. Will the gentleman allow me a single remark? As I stated, the object of the bill is simply to gather in the few millions of trade-dollars scattered through this country. Can the gentleman indicate any way by which this form of currency can go to China except by the bill as I propose to amend it?

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I am not speaking on that subject. It will be observed that the last clause of the bill reported by the committee proposes to give to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to stop the further coinage of the trade-dollar. Why should we in this way restrict the power of the Secretary of the Treasury, when by the joint resolution of 1876 he was authorized to limit the coinage to the demands of trade? Why now deprive him of that authority?

From the bill there can be inferred only one of two propositions: either it is intended to authorize an unlimited coinage of the standard dollar, or else it is intended to deprive the Secretary of the Treasury of the option which he now has to allow the coinage of the trade-dollar to the extent justified by the demands of commerce. Putting either construction upon the bill, I am opposed to it.

Mr. WARNER. Is the Secretary of the Treasury causing any of the trade-dollars to be coined now?

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I assume that under the joint resolution of July 22, 1876, he is coining sufficient to meet the demands of commerce.

Mr. WARNER. The gentleman will allow me to call his attention to an extract from a recent interview of the Secretary of the Treasury with the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures:

Question. Is there any longer any object in coining that piece at all for private parties?

The SECRETARY. No, sir; and I should refuse to do it now if such an application were made.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. The answer which the Secretary there makes does not change the situation which he occupies under the joint resolution of 1876. By that enactment he is authorized to permit the coinage so far as to meet the demands of commerce. Now, what objection has the committee to our manufacturing these coins to be used in China? I understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] to say that there has been and is a constant, a continual demand for coins of this kind, to be used in China, where they are clipped and marked for the purposes of trade, and are used according to their bullion value.

Mr. WARNER. Is it necessary to coin silver pieces of 420 grains in order that they may be divided and melted up in China? Will not pieces of 412½ grains do just as well?

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I am not now arguing as to the necessity for creating such a coin. I am simply saying that this difficulty which we now meet in connection with our currency cannot properly be obviated in the manner proposed in this bill. And, Mr. Speaker, I now come to the particular point which I have made under my motion. The design of this coin undoubtedly came originally from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and it was a proper function of that committee; but after it had passed into circulation, and became a part of the currency of the country, if it were of any use here, then from that time forth it seems to me this subject no longer belonged legitimately to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, but was a proper subject to be considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency. And I very much regret the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FORT,] who introduced this bill and who was a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, should not have seen that it was sent to that committee.

I admit, sir, this trade-dollar now forms an embarrassment in our currency. I have in my district bank officers who tell me it was in their way, embarrassing their operations and loading their counters; and if there be a hidden meaning in this bill by which there shall be unlimited coinage and exchange of trade-dollars so as to result in the unlimited issue of standard dollars, then I am satisfied no bank officer in my district would ask me to support it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired, and the chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures now yields five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. HASKELL.]

Mr. HASKELL. I have listened to the arguments of the opponents of this bill to find some good reason why the trade-dollar should not be taken out of circulation among our people and the uniform standard dollar issued in lieu of it. There has been a great fear expressed by members of this House of unlimited coinage. I for one acknowledge having a great fear of unlimited coinage as expressed in the bill which was passed in this House some days ago known as the Warner bill because of the bullion-certificate feature which was attached to it and because of a great many dangerous details, as I regard them, of that measure, by which this whole coinage business would be left free in the hands of speculators and bullionists. And I desire to call the attention to-day of gentlemen who are afraid of unlimited coinage, pure and simple, to the fact that, however unlimited it may be by act of Congress, it is limited by mint capacity. I do not believe if you could open the Mint, as provided for by the amendment to the Warner bill of my colleague, to the coinage of silver dollars to the utmost capacity of the Mint that such a plethora of silver dollars would be produced inside of five years as would accomplish the result of driving the gold or the superior dollar out of the market.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is not for the unlimited coinage of silver, nor can it be even under the mint capacity, for there are not enough of trade-dollars in existence in China, India, or the United States to produce any of the direful effects which have been held up before this House to come from the passage of this bill; $30,000,000 is the sum total which would be reached.

A MEMBER. Thirty-six millions!

Mr. HASKELL. Thirty-six millions, then. It is no more than fair, then, that the dollar issued by the Government of the United States and made a legal tender when scattered broadcast among our people should be redeemed when presented by a legal-tender dollar, and especially when that legal-tender dollar is worth less in bullion than the one taken up. There can be no harm in it that I can see. There can be no great influx of bullion in it. There is no possibility of their coming here in large numbers in any one time; but a troublesome, annoying, vexatious coin will be taken out of existence and lawful money of the United States substituted in place of it.

Let me state another fact. It has been wondered why in the last year trade-dollars were not taken up as bullion and coined into standard dollars of 412½ grains by the Secretary of the Treasury. The reason why the trade-dollar was not taken up is that although not a legal tender, having no place where it could be redeemed, yet it was worth a great deal more than the bullion in it. You cannot buy the trade-dollar to-day for its bullion value in the United States. They are worth more than bullion. They have been issued as coin and circulated among the people. The trade-dollar is a convenient disk of silver, and for the purpose of exchange the holders of it would not sell it for the same price they would sell that amount of bullion. Notwithstanding that fact, however, they are still subjected to the annoyance of a dollar that is worth at the bank just what the banker has a mind to offer for it, and it is to relieve that embarrassment I understand this bill has been proposed. It is simply to allow the people to get rid of a troublesome coin, one that is made use of but gives petty annoyance, and put in their hands in lieu of it a legal-tender dollar of the United States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair assigns five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WEAVER.]

Mr. WEAVER. It is really amusing to sit and listen to the conflicting views expressed upon this question of metal money. The distinguished gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCLANE] thinks that the silver dollar of 412½ grains is not of equal value with the gold dollar, and to equalize them he would be willing to cut down the gold dollar. I do not know that I would have any very serious objection to that. But I would like to ask him how he would pay the bonds issued since the passage of the act of 1870? That act in effect provides that the bonds shall be paid in a gold dollar of 25.8 grains, or a silver dollar of 412½ grains. Now, if you reduce the quantity of metal in the gold dollar, the bondholder, who dictates the laws and interprets them after they are passed, will say at once, "You cannot pay me with a dollar that contains less than the stipulated amount of gold." This will leave them the silver dollar of 412½ grains the only legal tender for the bonds. That, I think, would be a capital joke on the bondholder, and I rather like it.

My friend from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] grows eloquent in the closing hours of this session in favor of unlimited coinage of silver, and says the country cannot have too much of it. And yet it is within the memory of every member present, though the gentleman seems to have forgotten it, that a few weeks ago the gentleman from Iowa voted against the passage of the Warner silver bill, knowing that it was the only silver bill that could be passed during this session to authorize unlimited coinage of silver.

Mr. PRICE. I suppose my colleague would not want to misrepresent me; and it would not be very safe for him to do it. [Laughter.] I will correct the gentleman by saying that I have never stated that I am in favor of unlimited coinage.

Mr. WEAVER. At the risk of my personal safety, then, let me put my colleague on record before the people of Iowa as being opposed to unlimited coinage. The gentleman may take that horn of the dilemma if he likes, and that will not be very safe for him in Iowa. [Applause.]

Mr. PRICE. I have stated my views on that question before the people of Iowa.

Mr. WEAVER. Then the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] says he is for the redemption of the trade-dollar with standard dollars; that it is purely a question of redemption. What! Propose to redeem a dollar of 420 grains with one of 412½ grains? Why will not the gentleman be consistent and come out and admit frankly before the House and before the country that it is the fiat that he wants and not more grains of metal? The dollar of 412½ grains has the fiat, and therefore it is worth more to the holder than the dollar of 420 grains.

Mr. HAZELTON. If you have no silver to pay with, would not paper be just as good with the fiat?

Mr. WEAVER. Certainly. But I have no doubt the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] would sit by and see the Government "starved to death" if gold and silver were to give out rather than allow greenbacks to be issued.

Mr. HAZELTON. Then does the gentleman take the position that silver and gold are not necessary at all; that paper money can be made as good by the simple fiat of the Government as metal money?

Mr. WEAVER. I am in favor of gold, silver, and legal-tender paper money, of equal legal-tender qualities, and made so by the fiat of the Government. You, sir, are in favor of gold, silver, and national-bank currency—particularly the national bank part of it. That is a swindle, as every one knows.

Mr. HOUK. What do you want your greenback currency based upon?

Mr. WEAVER. I want it based on the gold, the silver, the wheat, the corn, and everything else in the country, including the public credit.

Mr. HAZELTON. Why talk of "fiat," then?

Mr. WEAVER. Does it alarm you?

Mr. BAKER. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WEAVER. One at a time, if you please. Verily, the voice of the greenbacker stirreth up my friends on the right. [Laughter.]

Now, there is great difficulty in regard to cutting down the amount of gold in the dollar. As I remarked, if you reduce the amount of metal in the gold dollar it will be said you cannot pay the bond in gold. And if you add to the amount of silver in the silver dollar, then you take away, for the third time, from the people the right to pay the bonded debt according to the contract. It is high time for this Government to do away with this bartering with creditors, and say, "There is one dollar for all, rich and poor alike; and it shall pay all debts to the rich and the poor, whether he be a bondholder or a bond-payer." We want a dollar of the Government established by law, and not by barter with crafty public creditors. You get "involved in involutions wild" in the discussion of the relative value of gold and silver. I adhere to the old standard of 412½ grains for a silver dollar and 25.8 grains for a gold dollar, and then I would have the royal loyal greenback as my paper dollar. It came to the rescue of the Government when silver and gold, like cowardly traitors, fled away and hid until the battle was over. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOUK. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HOUK. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him how he would discharge the obligations of the Government?

Mr. WEAVER. I will tell the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MILLS. Some weeks ago we passed a bill through this House allowing all persons who hold the fractional silver coins to bring them to the Treasury and exchange them for lawful money. It was sought at that time by some members to embrace the trade-dollar in the proposition. But strangely enough, this House refused to grant that privilege to a dollar that contains 420 grains of silver while it granted the privilege to a dollar that contained 384 grains of silver. Large merchants in the cities who had this non-legal-tender money piled up in their coffers, coming in to them in small transactions, gained the ear of this House, so that if they should bring their money to the Government, the Government would give them a dollar in gold for 384 grains of silver. And now the trade-dollar, containing 420 grains of silver, comes in and you do not give the legal-tender Treasury note of the Government in exchange for it, but you take from the Treasury the only dollar which the Government can pay to the bondholder. You take away from the Government the only capacity that it has to extricate itself from the public burdens that rest upon the people. You take away a kind of dollar which you have given money functions to, and you take in lieu of it a silver dollar of less value. Why do you not give Treasury notes of the Government in exchange for the trade-dollar? Why not give a lawful-money dollar for a dollar of 420 grains coin? Why can you not afford to give it for a dollar worth 420 grains? Why shall we not do that, and then the holder will get a dollar just as good as a legal-tender silver dollar—practically as good—and the Government would at the same time retain in its coffers that dollar with which it can pay its public creditors?

Now, when the time comes to offer amendments, I shall move to strike out the words "silver dollars," where they occur in line 5, and insert "legal-tender notes," and I hope the House will give us a vote upon that amendment by yeas and nays.

I want the people of the United States to see another demonstration of the fact that the party on this side of the House at least are true to the interest of the public and do not want any trifling with this question. The silver question furnishes the key to unlock the doors of the prison house in which the people are confined, and by it a way of escape may be found from the valley of the shadow of death through which they are now wandering. It is well for us to look this question in the face and so legislate that they may be liberated from the embarrassments under which they are now suffering.

Mr. GODSHALK. I do not propose to detain the House with a discussion of this question. I am in favor of the bill pure and simple as reported by the committee. I notice that in the discussion of this question we generally drift off into questions of finance and political questions, but it seems to me that this is a very plain question here to-day. If other gentlemen's constituents are as much annoyed by these trade-dollars as I know my own are, they will be glad to vote for this bill and relieve the people from the circulation of these dollars. There is not now a place anywhere in the neighborhood of great cities but where the channels of trade are choked with this anomalous coin. The brokers sell it over their counters and it goes into the country, into the hands of the small traders, and they must get rid of it as best they can. The very prospect that there is a chance of Congress taking action upon this question has brought every trade-dollar from 5 per cent. up to 2 per cent. of par. I hope Congress will see the way plain to do what is right in this matter, and that is to relieve the people of this incumbrance.

It is a plain question for the people. What do we care about the bagatelle, five millions of silver coin? Suppose Congress would legislate so that that coined money would come back into the country. They will come here and they shall give something in exchange for them in our trade with China. I am in favor of the passage of the bill, and I think that if Congress passes this bill the people will thank them for it, and they can go home to their constituents and it will be something at least in their favor.

Mr. STEPHENS. I now yield for twenty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, this bill, if enacted into a law, will compel the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange legal-tender silver dollars for trade-dollars at par, and to recoin the trade-dollars into legal-tender or standard silver dollars and to stop the further coinage of trade-dollars. I understand the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures to recommend the passage of this bill.

Mr. FISHER. Do not say that the committee recommend this bill without amendments.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand them to report it back without amendment.

Mr. WARNER. The majority of the committee are in favor of amending the bill.

Mr. KEIFER. They have reported it without amendment, and I think my statement is correct.

I think the whole measure unwise, and if opportunity is afforded me I will move as a substitute for the bill the following:

That the silver coins of the United States known as the trade-dollars shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

The substitute proposed would restore the trade-dollar to the status it held in this country at the time it was first issued under the act of February 12, 1873, and which it held until totally demonetized by the act of July 22, 1876. This latter act was passed chiefly through the efforts of democrats in the Forty-fourth Congress and when this House was overwhelmingly democratic.

But for the demonetizing act of July 22, 1876, no trouble would ever have arisen in this country about the trade-dollar. But for that act no man in this country, rich or poor, would have suffered inconvenience or loss on account of the trade-dollars, and no banks or brokers would have attempted to speculate in them.

The trade-dollar, as is well known, was coined for the Asiatic or Chinese trade, and this Government did not issue them on its own account, but only coined them under the act of 1873, for private parties (on their paying the actual expense of coinage) from bullion deposited at the United States mints for that purpose.

These trade-dollars never were intended for circulation in the United States, but in various ways a portion of those coined came into general circulation. The Secretary of the Treasury possesses, under existing laws, the right and power to restrict the coinage of trade-dollars to the necessities of the actual export demand, and under this power he wholly suspended their coinage in April, 1878. The total coinage of trade-dollars since the passage of the act of 1873, which first authorized them, has been $35,959,360. Returns of customs collectors show that 25,703,950 of these dollars had been exported prior to November 1, 1878, in the Chinese trade alone, and after making a reasonable estimate of the number which have found their way out of this country through Chinese returning to their own country, and of the number smelted for manufacturing and other purposes, and as bullion at the mints, ($106,000 have been melted at the mints,) and making due allowance for those returned in various ways, there can hardly be found in this country five million of the trade-dollars.

Without making any allowance for those used for manufacturing purposes, the Director of the Mint, in his report dated November 1, 1878, estimates the number of trade-dollars then in the United States at five and a quarter millions, and these were held principally by California banks. On the 13th of June, 1879, the trade-dollar, notwithstanding it has no legal-tender character, had a commercial value in New York City of ninety-nine cents, and the standard silver dollar then had with its legal-tender character a commercial value of ninety-nine and seven-eighths cents. On that day the bullion in a trade-dollar could have been purchased for ninety-one cents. In view of these and other facts I would not withdraw the trade-dollar from circulation abroad at so great a cost to our Government. We can purchase the amount of bullion (and there is plenty of it, the product of our mines) in a trade-dollar for ninety-one cents, if desirable to have a more rapid coinage of standard silver dollars. The silver in the trade-dollar has already been utilized, and it would now be unwise to offer a premium for the return to this country of over thirty millions of the trade-dollars already absorbed in foreign commerce and not needed at home, and to take up and recoin at a loss to the United States of not less than nine cents on each of the five millions still in this country.

I appeal to those who favor a free coinage of silver dollars and to those who are interested in mineral districts not to favor this measure, as it will only tend to depreciate our own silver bullion and to widen the breach, at our present ratio, between the gold and the silver standard. It will also be ruinous, for a time at least, to our silver-mining interests in this country. There is plenty of bullion without melting the trade-dollar to occupy our mints indefinitely to their fullest capacity. There is no legal or moral obligation resting on this Government to take up these trade-dollars at above their value as bullion. The Chinese government has no mint and is not likely to have, and the trade-dollar is constantly increasing in favor there, hence I would not take away from the Secretary of the Treasury the right in his discretion to coin, under the original act, trade-dollars expressly to meet an export demand. Silver is the money standard of China and most of the oriental nations, and it will be largely to the interest of this country, as far as possible, from its inexhaustible silver mines to supply them with their coin or money.

Dr. Linderman, the late Director of the Mint, in his last report, speaking of the trade-dollar, very wisely says:

It will be to our advantage to furnish these coins, so far as we can without detriment to our own money system; and the trade-dollar having attained such a favorable position in China, it would not appear to be advisable to repeal the law authorizing its coinage.

No more trade-dollars will in any event be coined, unless it is to the interest of bullion-holders to have it done. They will not, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, deposit at the United States mints bullion to be coined into trade-dollars, unless it will be more profitable than to sell it to the Government for coinage or to other parties. Why should this means of utilizing our silver productions be withdrawn, especially while silver bullion is so much depreciated in the markets of the world? No harm can come to anybody from the continued coinage of the trade-dollar under the restrictions stated already, provided my proposed substitute is adopted. As has already been stated, the trade-dollar never was intended to become one of the coins of our country to go into ordinary use; and notwithstanding the fact that it contains 6¾ grains more pure or 7½ grains more standard silver than the now legal-tender silver dollar, I would not give it a full legal-tender character. To do the latter would destroy the original purposes of the act of 1873.

The limited legal-tender character of that act should, however, never have been taken away, and should now be restored so as to protect all persons, laborers, and others from inconvenience and loss on account of those now in or which may come into their hands. Brokers or large dealers in trade-dollars can protect themselves by disposing of what they now have on hand for the continuing Asiatic export trade. Persons holding a few trade-dollars who have received them for wages or otherwise can use them in small sums, if they are only given a legal-tender quality for $5, as I propose. If employers should use them to pay their employés, the latter could buy without discount any of the necessaries of life with them. To make them a legal tender for $5 will not injure the Government to any extent, but it will prevent loss to that class of persons who cannot always protect themselves. The bill of the committee is against the interests of the Government and in the interest of the banks and brokers who have hoarded the trade-dollar.

The bullion in all the trade-dollars could be purchased by the Government for $32,725,017 at the present advanced price of silver bullion, but under this bill the Government would be required to pay $3,234,343 more than they are worth as bullion, thus opening a means of speculation at the expense of the Government and offering an inducement to parties to gather up at home and abroad and send to the mints all the trade-dollars hitherto minted. This bill is in the interest of those who have already hoarded in large sums the trade-dollars, purchased at eighty-five and ninety cents apiece. It provides a means of robbing the United States Treasury to the extent of millions of dollars in the interest of speculators, and affords no sort of relief to persons who hold trade-dollars in small quantities and who have received them for wages, produce, &c. It must be noted that the passage of this bill will give no relief to holders of small sums of trade-dollars. Such holders can only sell at a discount to speculators, to be sent off to the Treasury or sub-treasuries of the United States for exchange. To give such dollars a legal-tender quality only in sums not exceeding $5 will necessarily force those now in our country abroad, and will cause them not to circulate at home generally.

Let us coin our standard silver dollars to the extent of the capacity of our mints, if necessary; but out of fresh bullion, the product of our mines and the fruits of the toil and enterprise of our miners.

I am not speaking against the silver dollar or the silver standard, but I speak in favor of a silver dollar for our own home circulation which may never be dishonored, but held up abreast, for all purposes, of the gold or now paper dollar of this Government, and also in favor of finding an easy market and good price for a great and inexhaustible product of our country.

We have coined, prior to June 1, 1879, under existing law, 33,485,950 legal-tender silver dollars, which are now ready for or in circulation. Whoever prefers silver dollars can get them in any sums desired. The per capita of silver dollars in this country is much greater than at any other time in its history.

The democratic party were the pioneers in the work of destroying the "monetary power" of silver in the United States.

From the organization of the United States Mint (1793) to June 30, 1873, the total silver coinage was as follows:

Dollars	$8,045,838 00
Half dollars	99,845,235 50
Quarter dollars	22,001,218 50
Dimes	9,060,795 50
Half dimes	4,906,946 90
Three cents	1,281,850 20
Total silver coinage prior to 1873	145,141,884 60

On February 21, 1853, a Congress, democratic in both branches by large majorities, by legal enactment took away the thitherto full legal-tender character of all subsidiary silver coin, except in payment of debts for sums under $5. Upon the principle of this democratic law above $137,000,000 of our silver coinage were demonetized.

It is claimed that what remained at home and were not melted up for various uses of the $8,045,838 silver dollars coined prior to June 30, 1873, were by a republican Congress demonetized by the act of February 12, 1873. If true, this would be a comparatively small matter. A very large share of the responsibility of that act also belongs to prominent democrats in both the Senate and the House.

Until June 22, 1874, (the date of the taking effect of the Revised Statutes of the United States,) all silver dollars coined by authority of the United States were a legal tender, equal with gold coin. Section 3586 of said statutes demonetized all United States silver coinage, and made it a legal tender for only $5.

The act of February 12, 1873, provided only for limiting the legal-tender character to $5 of the silver coins issued under its provisions, including the trade-dollar.

Now that members of all political parties are in favor of a coinage of legal-tender silver dollars, and some of each of the two principal political parties are in favor of a free coinage of silver on the same terms and on an equal footing with gold, let us do nothing to bring discredit on a policy which tends to make coinage of silver dollars desirable in our country.

Above all, let us not, under the pretense of legislating in the interest of more silver dollars, make a law to give banks, bankers, brokers, and speculators millions of dollars at the expense of the United States Treasury, and without giving relief to the only persons in this country who have suffered from a circulation of silver (trade) dollars.

By the adoption of my proposed substitute for this bill full relief will come to this last class of persons, and the Government and other parties will suffer no loss.

No money or representative of money or obligation of any character which this Government is or has been in any degree responsible for passing into common circulation among the people should be allowed to be made the instrument of injury or loss to any citizen. The remedy proposed, so far as the trade-dollar is concerned, is easy, simple, and efficient.

I now send to the Clerk's desk my amendment, and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

That the silver coins of the United States known as the trade-dollars shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for an amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

Mr. MILLS. I offer my amendment, which is to strike out, in line 5, the words "silver dollars" and insert in lieu thereof "Treasury notes."

Mr. STEPHENS. According to understanding had to-day, after one hour and three-quarters the previous question was to be considered as ordered, and then I was to have fifteen minutes to conclude the debate. The previous question, according to that understanding, is now considered to be ordered.

Mr. DEERING. Are amendments in order?

Mr. STEPHENS. I was going to say that I trust that all the amendments which are to be offered will be submitted now, and that they would be printed, and then we can adjourn until to-morrow, when I will conclude the debate in fifteen minutes.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Georgia if he intends to allow a vote upon these different amendments?

Mr. STEPHENS. Upon every one of them.

Mr. DEERING. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "par" in line 6 of the bill insert:
Provided, The weight of said trade-dollars has not been reduced below the standard weight and limit of tolerance provided by law for the single piece.

Mr. BAKER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question.

Mr. STEPHENS. I will hear it.

Mr. BAKER. Is it the intention of the gentleman to press this bill, with its amendments, to a vote to-night before adjournment?

Mr. STEPHENS. It is not. I have stated that my object is to have all the amendments offered to-night, and then, according to the arrangement made this morning, the previous question is to be considered as operating, and I will conclude the debate in fifteen minutes to-morrow.

Mr. BREWER. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:
But the Secretary shall not redeem such trade-dollars as have been clipped so as to decrease their bullion value, or which shall have been restamped by any individual or foreign country.

Mr. STEPHENS. I now move that the House adjourn.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion until I can submit a privileged report.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CONVERSE.) The regular order being called for, the question is upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. STEPHENS. I withdraw that motion at the request of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON.]

METRIC SYSTEM IN COINAGE.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred a resolution of the House providing for the printing of 10,000 copies of House Report No. 14 of the first session of the Forty-sixth Congress, have directed me to report the same back with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution will be read, and then the Clerk will read the amendment recommended by the Committee on Printing.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That 10,000 extra copies of House Report No. 14, first session Forty-sixth Congress, be printed for the use of the House.

The amendment reported from the committee was to strike out the words "for the use of the House" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "at the Government Printing Office; 2,500 copies for the use of the Senate, and 7,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives."

Mr. BAKER. What document is that?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] will explain.

Mr. CONGER. That report should go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. There is no appropriation of money in it.

Mr. STEPHENS. It is an ordinary report.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Yes, it is the ordinary form of report.

Mr. CONGER. It requires the expenditure of money.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Will the gentleman listen to an explanation from the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. CONGER. I will hear the statement.

Mr. STEPHENS. The report which this resolution provides for printing is a report of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures on the metric system in coinage. The last House ordered a large number of extra copies of this report to be printed; I forget how many.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The order was for 10,000 copies.

Mr. STEPHENS. That order passed the House, but did not pass the Senate on account of the lateness of the session. I suppose I would be within bounds if I said that there have been a thousand letters asking for copies of that report.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The amendment reported from the committee is simply in regard to the distribution of the report. It is the same resolution which passed the last House, but failed in the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. I dislike so much to have the metric system forced upon the honest people of the United States, with all its unnamable terms, changing the entire names even of the usual weights and measures of the country, that I feel like opposing it whenever I have an opportunity.

Mr. STEPHENS. Let the country have an opportunity to see the report. This resolution does not adopt the report; it simply provides for printing it.

Mr. CONGER. No man knows what it means.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. This is a privileged report; I have a right to make it.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman says he has a right to make this report.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Certainly, it is a privileged report.

Mr. CONGER. Then I make the point of order that it should go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. It does not order the expenditure of a dollar of money.

Mr. CONGER. It requires the expenditure of money.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I say that the gentleman cannot make that motion; he has not the floor to do it.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is not well taken; the resolution appropriates no money.

Mr. CONGER. Does the Chair decide that this resolution does not involve any expenditure of money?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair decides that it does not make any appropriation, and that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. BREWER. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. FORT. Let this report be first acted upon.

The motion of Mr. BREWER was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of Francis A. Page, for compensation for services as messenger on the soldiers' roll of the House of Representatives, Forty-fifth Congress—to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. ELLIS: Papers relating to the claim of J. W. Arthur & Co., of New Orleans, Louisiana, for compensation for cotton taken from them by a United States Treasury agent at New Orleans, on the 24th of June, 1865, as tax, in kind, on cotton—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. EWING: The petition of C. F. Rainey and A. R. Potts, for compensation for services rendered in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms, House of Representatives, Forty-sixth Congress—to the Committee of Accounts.

By Mr. WILLIS: Communications from R. A. Robinson & Co. and Arthur Peter & Co., wholesale druggists, of Louisville, Kentucky, giving reasons why the law should not be changed imposing a duty on quinine—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 19, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore called the Senate to order and said: The Chair is informed by the journal clerk that owing to the length of the session yesterday and its prolongation during the night, the Journal has not been made up; that is, it has not been finished; and the Chair suggests that the reading of it be dispensed with until it be finished.

Mr. CONKLING. I object, Mr. President; and I insist upon the observance of the first rule of the Senate, which requires the Chair to cause the Journal to be read, first of all, after calling the Senate to order.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I take it——

Mr. CONKLING. I object to all debate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I take it, that part of the Journal being made up, it need not all be made up. The part made up can be read, and by that time probably the other part will be ready.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the Journal cannot be dispensed with except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WITHERS. Certainly not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal can be read as far it is made up; but what is not made up cannot be read. The Clerk will read the Journal as far as it is made up.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yes, as far is it is made up. That is the suggestion I made.

Mr. CONKLING. I object to anything being done until the Journal is read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will be read as far it is made up.

Mr. CONKLING. There will not be anything done until the rest of it is read.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read in part.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Petitions and memorials are now in order.

Mr. CONKLING. Has the Journal been read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All that is written up has been read.

Mr. CONKLING. I submit to the Chair that the rule requires that the Journal of the preceding day's proceedings shall be read. I demand the reading of the whole of those proceedings, and object to anything being done until the Journal is read. I ask for the reading of the first rule, that the Senate may know what it is.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

1. The presiding officer having taken the chair, and a quorum (which shall consist of a majority of the Senators duly chosen and sworn) being present, the Journal of the preceding day shall then be read, and any mistake made in the entries may be corrected. The reading of the Journal shall not be suspended unless by unanimous consent; and when any motion shall be made to amend or correct the same, it shall be deemed a privileged question, and proceeded with until disposed of by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the opinion of the Chair that the Senate cannot be prevented from transacting business by a failure to write up all the Journal, and that the rule does not require an impossibility. As far as the Journal has been written up it has been read. The rest of it, in the opinion of the Chair, must be read hereafter. Therefore the Chair overrules the point of order made by the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. From that decision of the Chair I appeal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. From that decision the Senator from New York appeals.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to make an inquiry.

Mr. CONKLING. Have I the floor on my appeal?

Mr. HOUSTON. I propose——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from New York desires to speak upon the appeal, he has the floor for that purpose.

Mr. CONKLING. I am on my feet, and I wish to say a word.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no objection to the Senator standing on his feet nor to his saying a word.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to say that this is in parliamentary law and by the rules of the Senate, not a matter of order merely, but a matter of privilege. Before the Senate proceeds to do any business whatever, it is the right of every member to hear read the minutes of the preceding day's proceedings, and to make any motion to correct the record of proceedings, which motion is by the rule as well as by parliamentary law a matter of the highest privilege.

I submit that the idea that because the journal clerk has not been able to complete the Journal, owing either to his own indisposition or to the length of the session, the Chair can of its own motion or decision dispense with the rule asserting, as the rule does, a right of high privilege, is as dangerous as anything can be.

Therefore I have appealed from the decision of the Chair, and I ask for the yeas and nays upon the appeal; because without reference to the particular proceeding in which we are now engaged, fighting for the right to debate, as a matter of general precedent in the Senate, I conceive it to be very important. That is all I want to say.

Mr. HEREFORD. I move to lay the appeal of the Senator from New York on the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair before the vote is taken on laying the appeal on the table.

Mr. HEREFORD. I withdraw my motion for the present, so as to allow the Senator from Alabama to proceed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand the decision of the Chair to be that the Senate shall not be delayed for the purpose of enabling the journal clerk to prepare the rest of the Journal, but that when it is prepared it will be read to the Senate, and the Senate will then have the same power over it that it would have if it were to be read to-day. Then certainly there can be no harm in the course proposed.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, only a word. No rule of any legislative assembly, whether it be the Senate of the United States or any other, ever requires or admits impossibilities. The general rule in all parliamentary bodies is, I agree, that the journal of the previous day shall first be read; but if the previous day comes up to the moment of the succeeding day, then never can it be read; and therefore no impossibility is to be expected.

I understand perfectly well the motive of my honorable friend from New York. I do not say it is a part and parcel of the last twelve hours; I need not say that; I need only say that the honorable Presiding Officer of this body has adopted the only rule that common sense, which lies at the bottom of all rules, permits to be adopted.

Mr. CONKLING. Put that on record by your vote.

Mr. EATON. I will put it on record by my vote. So far as possible the Journal of yesterday shall be read. Suppose a fire had occurred, suppose this Journal had been destroyed, is the business of the session of the Congress of the United States to be stopped because of such an accident? Sir, the mere statement of it in itself is the argument. What cannot be done, what is an impossibility under a rule, excuses always the performance of the rule. Therefore I submit that the decision of the Chair is eminently right and proper.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I submit to the Senator from Connecticut that all the rules of common sense were violated last night by holding an all-night session and doing nothing, and those rules having been violated it is too late for him to bring in the rules of common sense to bear upon common honesty. I insist upon the reading of the Journal and the whole of it. The next time when you hold an all-night session to do nothing you will have your Journal made up, or else you will not have it read until it is made up.

Mr. EATON. I do not know how the honorable Senator from Michigan knows anything about it; he was not here. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend a moment. The Chair gives notice to the galleries that if applause or dissent is manifested in the galleries the rule to clear them will be enforced.

Mr. EATON. While other Senators were here, my honorable friends from New York, from West Virginia, from Ohio, and I may venture to say while I was here, attending to the duties of our office, that honorable gentleman was comfortably snoozing in his bed. Yet he undertakes to tell us what was done here at the night session! Sir, that is a good deal like the logic of my honorable friend from New York. It is an impossibility that what the one insists on can be done, and it is impossible that the other could know anything about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER. I will inform my honorable friend that I was paired with the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] whose wife was ill. In my generosity and good nature I did pair with him, and was only here until midnight, but I had certainly a good reason for being paired and being absent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. HEREFORD. I move to lay the appeal of the Senator from New York on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 33, nays 4; as follows:

YEAS—33.

Bailey,	Garland,	Kernan,	Vance,
Bayard,	Gordon,	Lamar,	Voorhees,
Beck,	Groome,	Maxey,	Walker,
Call,	Harris,	Morgan,	Wallace,
Cockrell,	Hereford,	Pendleton,	Whyte,
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Randolph,	Withers.
Davis of Illinois,	Houston,	Ransom,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Eaton,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,

NAYS—4.

Booth,	Burnside,	Morrill,	Windom.

ABSENT—39.

Allison,	Conkling,	Ingalls,	Platt,
Anthony,	Dawes,	Johnston,	Plumb,
Bell,	Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Rollins,
Blaine,	Farley,	Kellogg,	Saunders,
Bruce,	Ferry,	Kirkwood,	Sharon,
Butler,	Grover,	Logan,	Teller,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hamlin,	McDonald,	Thurman,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hampton,	McMillan,	Vest,
Carpenter,	Hill of Colorado,	McPherson,	Williams.
Chandler,	Hoar,	Paddock,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No quorum has voted. The Secretary will call the roll of Senators.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bailey,	Davis of Illinois,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Kernan,	Thurman,
Beck,	Dawes,	Kirkwood,	Vance,
Bell,	Eaton,	Lamar,	Voorhees,
Booth,	Garland,	Logan,	Walker,
Bruce,	Gordon,	Maxey,	Wallace,
Burnside,	Groome,	Morgan,	Whyte,
Call,	Harris,	Morrill,	Windom,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Pendleton,	Withers.
Chandler,	Hill of Georgia,	Ransom,
Cockrell,	Houston,	Rollins,
Coke,	Ingalls,	Saulsbury,
Conkling,	Jonas,	Saunders,

Mr. BURNSIDE. My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] has been called home by the death of a friend. Otherwise he would be here to answer to his name.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call discloses the presence of forty-eight Senators. There is a quorum present, and the question recurs on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia to lay the appeal of the Senator from New York upon the table, on which the yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GORDON, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I beg to recall my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. MCDONALD, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.]

Mr. WALLACE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania,] whom I do not notice in the Chamber; and I decline to vote for the present.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BAILEY, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I beg to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. PADDOCK.]

Mr. BURNSIDE. My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 4; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bayard,	Groome,	Lamar,	Vance,
Beck,	Harris,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Call,	Hereford,	Morgan,	Walker,
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,	Whyte,
Davis of Illinois,	Houston,	Ransom,	Withers.
Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Garland,	Kernan,	Slater,

NAYS—4.

Allison,	Booth,	Burnside,	Morrill.

ABSENT—46.

Carpenter,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Williams,
Chandler,	Hill of Colorado,	Paddock,	Windom.
Cockrell,	Hoar,	Platt,
Conkling,	Ingalls,	Plumb,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No quorum has voted.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I ask to have Rules 16 and 17 read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read Rules 16 and 17.

The Secretary read as follows:

16. When the yeas and nays shall be called for by one-fifth of the Senators present, each Senator, when his name is called, shall, unless for special reasons he be excused by the Senate, declare openly and without debate his assent or dissent to the question; and in taking the yeas and nays upon any question, the names of the Senators shall be called alphabetically.

17. When a Senator, being present and declining to vote when his name is called, shall be required to assign his reasons therefor, and shall so assign them, the presiding officer shall thereupon submit the question to the Senate: "Shall the Senator, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting?" which shall be decided without debate. And these proceedings shall be had after the roll shall have been called and before the result of the vote is announced; and any further proceedings by the Senate in reference thereto shall be after such announcement.

Mr. BAYARD. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that Senators on the other side being present have declined to vote. I ask the enforcement of Rule 17, which has just been read, so that the Senators being present and declining to vote when their names have been called shall be required to assign reasons therefor, and that the Presiding Officer shall submit the question to the Senate, shall the Senator for the reasons assigned by him be excused from voting; which shall be decided without debate. I ask the enforcement of that rule.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a question of order and I will state my point. The rules of the Senate, like the parliamentary law, declare that when the absence of a quorum is disclosed no business shall be in order except a motion or a proceeding for a call of the Senate or a motion to adjourn. The Senator from Delaware now addresses to the Chair a motion which, whatever can be done with it, can be treated only by the House,—by the Senate. "The House" or "the Senate" means a quorum; and in the absence of that quorum I submit the point that nothing is in order but a motion to adjourn or a motion for a call of the House.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask that the name of the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] be called under Rule 17, and that after assigning his reasons for declining to vote the question whether he shall be excused from voting be decided by the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Is my point of order debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware has submitted a motion. The Chair ruled on the same motion last night.

Mr. MORRILL. Before the President of the Senate decides the question, I desire to suggest to the Chair that the motion of the Senator from Delaware cannot be in order after the vote has been declared.

Mr. CONKLING. But what has become of my point of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was just about to decide the point raised by the Senator from Delaware. The Chair decided the same question last night. It is the opinion of the Chair that the motion of the Senator from Delaware to require the Senator named to state his reasons for not voting is in order.

Mr. CONKLING. Then the Chair overrules the point of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does.

Mr. CONKLING. From that decision I respectfully appeal, and on that appeal ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WHYTE. The appeal is debatable, I think.

Mr. CONKLING. There is no doubt of it.

Mr. WHYTE. The point of order, as I understand it, made by the Senator from New York is that the vote has been declared.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, that is the point made by the Senator from Vermont. The point made by the Senator from New York is that no quorum having voted no business is in order by Rule 3.

Mr. WHYTE. The ascertainment of a quorum is not to be made only by a call of the roll. The Chair has time out of mind decided that a quorum was present and proceeded to parliamentary business, both in this House and in the other House, without a call of the roll. The Chair can upon view or by a count tell whether a quorum of the Senate is present; and if the Chair ascertains that a quorum of the Senate is present, then other business can be proceeded with besides a motion to adjourn.

The Chair will remember a few years ago in the other House after an adjournment was had or a recess taken to a day certain, when that day certain arrived the Speaker of the House decided that a quorum was present without any count at all, and the House proceeded to discharge itself of a resolution which was pending before the House. The Chair now can ascertain that a quorum is present without any call of the roll, because there has been a call of the roll and a quorum has answered within the last few minutes. Simply because gentlemen in the discharge of what they think is their duty withhold their votes, is the Chair to say there is no quorum present when with his eyes the quorum is visible? Is it possible that the Chair is to be told that no quorum is present because Senators reserve their votes, and that a majority of those present in the Senate, altogether constituting a quorum, is not able to compel the minority either to vote or to give their reasons for not voting under the rules of the Senate? Is it possible that these rules are to apply in behalf of the minority when the Senator from New York rises and stops the business of the day by making a point that the rule requires that the Journal shall be read, when another rule requires that he shall vote, so that in his own case he sets the rule aside as a rope of sand not binding him to any duty and demands that we of the majority here shall obey the rule which says that the Journal shall be read?

I ask the Chair whether there can be such absurd rules as those governing this body? Whether it is possible that a Senator can rise here and stop the proceedings of the Senate and claim that under a rule we cannot proceed, and in the next minute stops our proceedings, although a rule of the Senate requires him to aid us in the prosecution of the public business either by voting or by giving a reason why he cannot vote?

Mr. President, it is against the rules of parliamentary law everywhere. No man in Parliament can sit still without voting when his name is called, or without announcing his reasons why he cannot vote. To do otherwise is a violation of the rules. In the House of Representatives no man is permitted to sit silent unless excused by the House; and so in the Senate, the rule is the same here. It is true that this body has never required any stringent rules of punishment for recreancy to duty, because that rarely, if ever, happens; but I have never known an instance before in my experience, or in my reading of the past history of the Senate, when a quorum was present and a minority of that quorum steadily refused to cast a vote and stopped the wheels of legislation. I have never known an instance in which when a minority was fighting the measures put upon the South during the years after the war, when their votes were demanded to make a quorum, certainly never in my experience did any Senator of the minority decline to vote.

Mr. President, I make the point that under Rule 17 the names of the Senators present in the eye of the Chair should be called by the Clerk upon the vote which we have just had, they having declined to vote. Their reasons should be required why they have declined to vote. The rule is express. You cannot stop during the roll-call to make this inquiry; but the proceedings in ascertaining the reasons of Senators refusing to vote shall take place after the roll shall have been called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland will suspend a moment. The Chair upon looking more carefully at the rule finds that the motion made by the Senator from Delaware came too late. It ought to have been made before the vote was announced. The rule requires the motion to be made before the vote is announced. The Chair is therefore obliged, on the point made by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] to sustain the point of order and rule that such a motion must be made before the vote is announced. Therefore the motion is not in order at this time. Rule 17 says:

And these proceedings shall be had after the roll shall have been called and before the result of the vote is announced.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Chair be kind enough to read the two remaining lines of the rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

And any further proceedings by the Senate in reference thereto shall be after such announcement.

Mr. CONKLING. I asked the Chair to read the clause for the purpose of emphasizing the words "by the Senate."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In respect to the fact whether the point made that no quorum voted applies, the Chair has no doubt in the world of the power of the Chair to count the Senate at any time. The Chair is satisfied there is a quorum present, but the Chair rules the motion of the Senator from Delaware out of order now because it came too late.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to remark that I had not observed the point of the seventeenth rule that the proceedings to call a Senator's name when he may be obliged to assign his reasons for not voting must be before the result of the vote is announced. As I did not make my motion until after the vote was announced, I apprehend it is not within the rule. I will state to the Senate, (I may as well do it now) that I shall raise this question at the proper period should the proceedings we have had for the last twenty hours be continued.

Mr. WHYTE. I desire to inquire of the Chair what is the condition of the proceeding at the present moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The last vote was on the motion to lay the appeal of the Senator from New York on the table.

Mr. WHYTE. Does not the appeal fall with the decision of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No quorum voting, all the Chair can do is to order a call of the list of Senators. The Secretary will call the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bailey,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Rollins,
Bayard,	Dawes,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Eaton,	Kernan,	Saunders,
Bell,	Ferry,	Kirkwood,	Slater,
Booth,	Garland,	Lamar,	Thurman,
Burnside,	Gordon,	Logan,	Vance,
Call,	Groome,	McDonald,	Vest,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harris,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Chandler,	Hereford,	Morgan,	Walker,
Cockrell,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,	Wallace,
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,	Whyte,
Conkling,	Houston,	Randolph,	Windom,
Davis of Illinois,	Ingalls,	Ransom,	Withers.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. PADDOCK] is sick to-day in bed, and unable to be here. On political questions he is paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY,] but he is unable to be here. Therefore I give this reason now why he does not answer to his name.

Mr. BURNSIDE. My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is called home by the death of a friend, and therefore is not able to answer to his name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The roll-call develops the presence of fifty-two Senators. A quorum is present, and the question recurs on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia to lay the appeal of the Senator from New York from the decision of the Chair upon the table, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAILEY, (when his name was called.) On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. PADDOCK.]

Mr. GORDON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BURNSIDE. My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is absent, and is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.]

The Secretary read the names of those voting, as follows:

YEAS—32.

Bayard,	Groome,	Lamar,	Slater,
Beck,	Harris,	McDonald,	Vance,
Call,	Hereford,	Maxey,	Vest,
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Davis of Illinois,	Houston,	Pendleton,	Walker,
Davis of West Va.,	Jonas,	Randolph,	Wallace,
Eaton,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,	Whyte,
Garland,	Kernan,	Saulsbury,	Withers.

NAYS—3.

Burnside,	Kirkwood,	Morrill.

Mr. BAYARD. Before the result is announced, I desire under Rule 17 to draw the attention of the Chair to the fact that there are Senators in the Chamber present and not voting. The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] is not now in his seat, and I name to the Chair the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] as one being present and not answering to his name. I ask under Rule 17 that he be required to assign his reasons therefor. [Mr. CONKLING entered the Chamber.] I observe now that the Senator from New York, whom I should have named before, is also here. If it would be proper to name one Senator after the other, I should name the Senator from New York also as having been in his seat and declined to vote, and ask under Rule 17 that he be required to assign his reasons therefor. I will name the Senator from Michigan first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair directs the Secretary to call the name of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] in order that he may comply with the requirements of the first clause of Rule 17, which provides that "When a Senator, being present and declining to vote when his name is called, he shall be required to assign his reasons therefor and shall so assign them." The Secretary will call the name of the Senator from Michigan.

The SECRETARY. Mr. CHANDLER.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I look upon this as an attempt in an unconstitutional manner to overturn, violently overturn, a standing rule of this body that cannot be overturned except in the regular way, and I will not vote to make a quorum to do an unconstitutional and wrong act. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair takes occasion to warn the galleries that if upon another occasion there is the slightest evidence of disorder or applause or dissent, the Chair will order the Sergeant-at-Arms to clear the galleries.

Under Rule 17, it becomes the duty of the Chair to put the question to the Senate, shall the Senator from Michigan, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting?

Mr. LOGAN. I call the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On which question the yeas and nays are demanded. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators who favor excusing the Senator from Michigan, for the reason assigned by him, will, when your names are called, answer "yea;" those of a contrary opinion "nay." The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GORDON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BAILEY, (after having voted in the negative.) I ask to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. PADDOCK.]

The result was announced—yeas 0, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—0.

NAYS—33.

Bayard,	Groome,	McDonald,	Vest,
Beck,	Harris,	Maxey,	Voorhees,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No quorum has voted. The Chair has counted the Senate. There is a quorum present, but no quorum voting.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, as I understand the construction of Rule No. 2 by the Presiding Officer, whenever it is disclosed on a vote that there is no quorum, he may have the roll called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has usually taken the fact of there being no quorum voting as evidence that there was no quorum present; but the Chair has not decided that it is not possible to ascertain otherwise whether there is a quorum. The Chair does not think the fact that a quorum has not voted is conclusive evidence that a quorum is not present. On the contrary, in the opinion of the Chair, he has a right to count the Senate. He has counted the Senate and found that a quorum is in attendance; but a quorum has not voted.

Mr. HOUSTON. I had not heard that point decided, and I was about to make that very point.

Mr. President, in counting the Senators present without a motion, or by a call of the roll, I submit to the Chair whether it is proper to receive the response or to count a Senator who is paired off?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I rise to an inquiry simply. I understand the Chair to say that, in the judgment of the Chair, there is a quorum present, though there has not been a quorum voting. I ask the Chair now whether the vote which says that the Senator from Michigan shall not be excused is not a vote as much as if there had been a quorum of the entire body voting?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is a question on which the Chair has reflected very considerably and had consultation with some of the most experienced Senators some time ago. The conclusion at which they arrived and the conclusion at which the Chair arrived was, that less than a quorum voting could not pass a bill or adopt any measure, unless it was one of those things that can be done by less than a quorum, as to adjourn, or to have a call of the Senate, or the like. If Senators will reflect a moment, they will see how that would operate. Suppose all the seventy-six Senators were here, and one of them voted to pass a bill and the other seventy-five did not vote at all, it would hardly be contended that that bill had passed by one vote. The rules may be defective, but the Chair cannot help that. In the opinion of the Chair it requires a majority of a quorum, a quorum voting, to adopt any measure except one of those which may by the rules be adopted by less than a quorum.

Mr. HOUSTON. The point which I wish to address to the Chair is this: the rule requires that Senators who shall be in their places shall vote when their names are called. There seems to be a quorum here; yet when a vote is taken——

Mr. CARPENTER. I rise to a point of order. What question is there before the Senate?

Mr. HOUSTON. I am stating a point of order. The gentleman must not rise so quick.

Mr. CARPENTER. The Senator did not announce to the Chair that he rose to a point of order that I heard. If he did so, I did not hear him.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am presenting one now. I am calling the Chair's attention to a point of order; and it is this, whether, after the fact is developed that there is no quorum on a vote in the calling of the roll, it is permissible for Senators who have paired off to answer and be counted present? It is true they may be in the Senate, but it is not true that they are here for business purposes. The whole purpose and object of the rule that requires members to be called is that they shall be here to attend to and discharge business, and if a Senator has obligated himself not to vote, then he is not here for business purposes.

Mr. CARPENTER. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin will state his question of order.

Mr. CARPENTER. The point is that the Senator from Alabama is not stating a point of order, but arguing something, I do not know what; I do not know what question is in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman may not understand it; I do.

Mr. CARPENTER. The point of order I make is that the Senator from Alabama is out of order in not stating a point of order, but arguing something.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I make the point that the Senator from Wisconsin is out of order in endeavoring to take the Senator from Alabama off the floor when he is stating a point of order.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Chair what is the business before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not aware of any question before the Senate. The question before the Senate was, shall the Senator from Michigan be excused? On that no quorum voted, although a quorum is obviously in the Chamber.

Mr. CONKLING. Did not vote, if I understand the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum did not vote. The Chair does not perceive now what can be done until somebody moves something. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is a motion to adjourn now in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not submit the motion, merely because on my motion it would not carry. I inquire, however, whether it is in order?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I rise to a privileged question, and I will state it. I came into this Senate some nine years ago, and I found sitting in this Senate several gentlemen who are now occupying seats in the Senate. I am entitled to a wholesome example in the observance of parliamentary rules from some of these gentlemen. I see my friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] who was an experienced Senator when I came to this body. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] was a Senator in this body when I came here. I have been entitled to their example in the observance of parliamentary rules of order; and I rise here, sir, to complain that those gentlemen, and others of greater experience than myself, have not set me that example in the observance of parliamentary rules to which I am entitled as a Senator.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order, and I will state the point if the Chair will permit me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. CARPENTER. The point of order is this: the Senator from Delaware is out of order. He has a right to make a personal explanation, but he has no right to make an explanation for me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware said he rose to a privileged question. The Chair cannot tell what the question will be until it is stated.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I simply stated a question of privilege for the purpose of calling the attention of these gentlemen to what they may deem an example worthy of commendation. I hope that in the future they may conduct themselves properly.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I move a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky moves that there be a call of the Senate.

Mr. EATON. Will the Senator for one moment withdraw that motion?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. EATON. What business is before the Senate, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no business before the Senate.

Mr. EATON. Then I move to take up the unfinished business of yesterday, the Army bill.

Mr. BECK. I first moved a call of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will state his question of order.

Mr. CONKLING. My point of order is that the last roll-call disclosed no quorum voting, and, that disclosure being made, the rule denotes the two motions which are in order, and a motion such as that proposed by the Senator from Connecticut, not being one of those motions, is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has already stated that, in the opinion of the Chair, the fact that no quorum voted is not conclusive evidence that there is not a quorum present. The Chair is obliged, if he would observe the rules strictly at the commencement of each day's session, to count the Senate and see that there is a quorum, and that was the practice of Vice-President King. He never would call the Senate to order until there was a quorum actually present by count. The Chair has no doubt that he has a right to count the Senate and see that there is a quorum. He has counted them, and thinks there is a quorum here present now.

Mr. EATON. Then, Mr. President, by every principle of parliamentary law which governs all representative assemblies, I say that I am in order in calling for the unfinished business of yesterday. If gentlemen choose to violate the rules of the Senate and not vote——

Mr. CONKLING. They do not.

Mr. EATON. If they do, I say. I understand my friend from New York to say they do not. I understand the Chair to say they do, because there is, as the Chair says, here now a quorum, and, therefore, there being a quorum, I move that the unfinished business of yesterday be taken up.

Mr. CONKLING. What becomes of the Journal and the ruling on that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order made by the Senator from New York, and will put the question on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. CONKLING. From that ruling I respectfully appeal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York appeals from the decision of the Chair overruling his point of order.

Mr. CONKLING. And on that appeal I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I thought I made the first motion for a call of the Senate before the Senator from Connecticut rose, and that motion was clearly in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator did, but the Chair understood him to withdraw it in order that the Senator from Connecticut might make his motion.

Mr. BECK. No, sir; I never have withdrawn it. I made the motion, the last vote having disclosed no quorum and the President having declared that there was a quorum present, which I believe is true. I desire a call of the House now without explanation, so that the country may see, by comparing the last vote and the next one, who are the Senators not voting. That was my object, but I did not care to avow it until the vote was taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair it is not necessary to move to take up the unfinished business. The morning hour has expired, and the unfinished business comes up as a matter of course.

Mr. HOUSTON. I was just about to make that very point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the Army appropriation bill, and it is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONKLING. May I make an inquiry of the Chair? What has become of the appeal taken from the ruling of the Chair, that upon the direction of the Chair alone the reading of the Journal may be dispensed with? The Chair so ruled, and I appealed from that ruling. That question is before the Senate. I beg to inquire what has become of it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That question is before the Senate. If the Senator desires, the Chair will put the motion.

Mr. CONKLING. I insist upon the decision of that question, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That question will be put, then. The question is, Shall the appeal taken by the Senator from New York from the ruling of the President this morning be laid upon the table?

Mr. CONKLING. On which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They have been ordered and taken once, but the call disclosed no quorum. The question now is on laying on the table the appeal taken by the Senator from New York.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 2; as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no quorum voting, but there is a quorum in the Senate present.

Mr. CONKLING. In the opinion of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is; the Chair has counted. In the opinion of the Chair, upon reflection, the Chair was in error in causing this last vote to be taken. That matter belongs to the morning hour. It is very true that if a motion had been made to amend the Journal or to correct the Journal it would be a privileged question that would have to be continued until it was disposed of; but no such motion as that was made.

Mr. CONKLING. We had not an opportunity; we do not know what the Journal is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair called for petitions and memorials. The Senator from New York made the point that they could not be called for until the Journal was read. The Journal was read as far as it was made up. No motion was made to correct or to amend it, and so no privileged question to override the morning hour existed. The Chair ought at one o'clock to have announced the unfinished business, and the Chair does it now. The business before the Senate is the Army appropriation bill, on which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I suppose by this time it must be evident to the majority of the Senate that they cannot coerce the minority of the Senate to do what the minority think they do not want to do or ought not to do. This proceeding can go on just as long as the majority of the Senate choose to have it go on, and it may stop whenever they choose to stop it. The minority of every legislative body are driven at times to stand on their reserved rights, and as to those rights they are the exclusive judges. As was stated last night by the Senator from Ohio, the President pro tempore of the Senate, on a great occasion he found himself compelled to stand on his rights, and refused to vote, so as to break up a quorum of the Senate, and then understood and now understands that there was no power on earth to prevent his doing so. He did it upon his own conscience, upon his own responsibility, answerable to nobody but his own constituents. What was true then is true now; and we have in the minority here the great example of the leader of the democratic party, and now the presiding officer of the Senate.

We do not enjoy this thing any more than the majority do; but we have a few rights, and we propose to stand by them.

Yesterday, it will be recollected, this bill was before the Senate for discussion. The entire day, with the exception of less than half an hour, was occupied, not by debate upon the bill, but by campaign speeches from democratic Senators. They had a perfect right to make those speeches, and they took the entire day in making them; and no allusion was made to the details of this bill, and no discussion of it was had. It was a totally outside discussion of party politics for the country, so declared, so announced, so understood, and so in fact. Then, after six o'clock, it was insisted that we should proceed with the debate of this bill or not debate it at all. We thought it was an outrage, not using the word offensively, but a parliamentary oppression, and we thought we ought not to submit to it. We thought we ought to show the majority of the Senate here that if they proposed to treat us in that way we would show them that they could not do it.

Now, if the democrats of the Senate are willing to adjourn this session to-day and let us all have a sleep and a rest and come in here to-morrow to discuss this bill in the proper and the orderly way, there is no doubt a vote can be had upon it to-morrow. I find myself to-day utterly unable to speak; that is, too ill to attempt it. I was up here all night trying to do my duty in the way of executing parliamentary law, and I think we succeeded pretty well in enforcing all the rules of law applicable to the remarkable state of things that we found existing. If the democrats of the Senate will do that, if they will adjourn this body and let us have a night's rest and come in here to-morrow, cool in blood and refreshed by slumber, and take up this bill, which is confessed on all hands to be an important one and that involves very important considerations, I should like very much to be indulged in three-quarters of an hour or an hour's remarks on the subject, which I promise the Senate will not be a stump-speech, will not be an address to the people of Wisconsin or any other State, but an address to the Senate upon the details and the legal principles involved in the bill under consideration. I am in no condition to do that to-day, and we are none of us in any condition to proceed here in the good nature which, I submit to the Senate, should, without regard to majorities, always prevail.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will the Senator name an hour at which we shall vote?

Mr. CARPENTER. No, I will not name an hour, but there is no doubt a vote can be taken to-morrow, and with the understanding that the vote is to be taken to-morrow, my opinion is it will be taken by six o'clock.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Does the Senator speak for all his associates on that side?

Mr. CARPENTER. I understand there is no dissent here on that proposition, and the belief is that if we have an understanding that we have a vote to-morrow, it will be taken before six o'clock, yet it possibly might run into the night; but there will be no attempt to put off proceedings or delay a vote on the bill beyond the necessities of legitimate and proper debate on the bill and on the amendments, and we will stay with the gentlemen and vote with them till they pass their bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Does the Senator speak for himself only or for that side of the House?

Mr. CARPENTER. I understand it is consented to all around.

Mr. MORRILL. No dissent.

Mr. INGALLS and others. Agreed.

Mr. WITHERS. I have one word to say, sir. I am not at all more fully informed with regard to the powers of a minority now than I was yesterday evening at six o'clock. I was fully cognizant of the fact then, as I am now, that a minority of this legislative body or any other body with similar rules, can obstruct legislation for an indefinite length of time if they see proper to do so. I wish to state, however, that the Senator from Wisconsin has scarcely stated the position occupied by the democratic party in this Chamber with perfect fairness. I am not unadvised of the fact to which he alluded, that an undue proportion of the day yesterday was consumed until six o'clock by Senators on this side of the Chamber; but the opposition to the motion to adjourn was not made, as the Senator indicates, for the purpose of compelling the discussion to go on last night, or to cut them off from debate at all, but the effort was earnestly made to try to secure an assent of the minority to some period at which the question should be disposed of. That is done constantly, and has been done every session of the Senate since I have been a member of it; and the effort to sit out a bill, as it is called, was among my earliest experiences when I took my seat on this floor. Then during an executive session of the Senate a legislative resolution, legislative business was introduced, dictated by a republican caucus, put before this body, and the minority then were notified that an adjournment would be resisted at all hazards and to the last extremity until a vote was had, and the struggle was kept up for a considerable length of time—I forget how long—until a vote was had. Therefore it was no unheard of or outrageous proposition that the majority advocated when they suggested the importance of fixing some time when this vote should be taken. That is all we desired. So far from desiring to prevent the Senator from Wisconsin or any other Senator on that side from exercising his privileges as a Senator and debating the proposition, no such idea was ever entertained by the majority. On the contrary, I disclaim utterly any such purpose.

For the last twenty hours there has been no period of time at which the debate could not have proceeded at the will of any Senator on this floor. We have made an earnest, persistent effort to secure the passage of the appropriation bill for the support of the Army. We have indicated our desire to provide the necessary means for the support of the Army and the support of this Government, and for the last twenty hours we have been resisted by the republican party by a resort to all the appliances known to parliamentary law. Now, it is very certain that the democratic party——

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. WITHERS. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. If I said anything by alluding to democrats that troubles anybody, I regret it; I overstepped my limit. But let me suggest to my friend that if we are to quit now good-naturedly and go home with a quiet pulse and get a good sleep and come here good-naturedly to-morrow, all this discussion about who is in fault about this thing and that thing had better be put off until after we come back.

Mr. WITHERS. I think so.

Mr. CARPENTER. I rose for the purpose of apologizing.

Mr. EATON. You cannot make charges against us without hearing our reply.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then let it be understood that we have committed outrages on both sides, and the question is whether we shall continue to do so or stop.

Mr. WITHERS. I know the Senator from Wisconsin and myself can discuss this matter without any bad feeling arising out of it at all; and in response to his allegation of the right of a minority, I wish to call his attention to the fact that the majority have some rights also, among which has generally been conceded the right of shaping legislation; and while we concede to the minority the right to obstruct it if they think proper to do so, I think it is a singular spectacle presented to the country when the minority get up and declare their purpose of obstructing legislation unless it can be had in their own way and at their own time and in their own manner. That is where the whole question resolves itself at last.

Last night there was no time at which the majority of this body would not have consented to an adjournment on the expression of a desire on the part of Senators on the other side, if we could have had any assurance, not that a vote should be had at a particular hour, but even in the course of the day, before adjournment, whether it was to be at midnight, this morning, or to-day. At any rate, if we could have had any assurance that a vote would be had at all during the session of to-day, there would have been no opposition whatever to a proposition to adjourn; and as that proposition has been made now by the Senator from Wisconsin, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion for one moment, in order that I may suggest to him——

Mr. WITHERS. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. In order that I may suggest to him that I am informed by the journal clerk that the Journal of yesterday's proceedings will be completed in a few moments, and being so nearly completed, I think it is better that we have the Journal read of that day's proceedings before we adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I ask if the Senator from Virginia has taken his seat?

Mr. WITHERS. At the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee I withdraw the motion.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I claim the floor, Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, during the night last night I stated, as I then understood and as I now understand them, the facts of this transaction. I do not wish to repeat that statement, or any part of it. I think attention will fall upon the doings of the Senate yesterday and last night and to-day, which will put it beyond my power and beyond the power of any other member of the Senate to obscure, conceal, distort, or misread the nature of those proceedings. I am willing to trust to that.

I rose, however, to answer an observation made by the Senator from Virginia, which surprised me. He said, if I understood him, that could the majority have received at any time an intimation or assurance that the final vote on the bill could be taken, not at a fixed hour, but at some time, at any time during the day succeeding that on which the majority refused us so manifest a right, that refusal would not have been interposed. I allude to this to remind Senators, and I take every Senator to witness, (among others a democratic Senator now in my eye, who observed the occurrence to which I shall allude, and spoke of it to me afterward,) the truth of this statement: The motion to adjourn at ten minutes after six was made by me. I prefaced that motion by an inoffensive statement of the fact that all of the first day given to the Army bill had been surrendered to the request and disposition of the Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Virginia speaking for that committee, and of the further fact that the second day, which everybody understood was to be allotted to us on this side to offer amendments and to debate, had been consumed by gentlemen on the other side save only twenty-two minutes, as a neighboring Senator tells me it was,—I did not observe the clock—occupied by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.] I called attention to the fact that all of the second day save only that little fraction had been consumed by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] and the eloquent Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] in the delivery of what I trust I shall not offend them by designating as campaign or electioneering speeches; and having called attention to this treatment, unfair, illiberal, inadmissible utterly, as we thought it to be, if followed by a refusal to adjourn, I stated that could we adjourn there need be no doubt, I felt sure from expressions around me there could be no doubt, that on the next day the final vote could and would be taken, unless some other democratic Senator or Senators should again take the floor and again consume the day. The honorable Senator from Alabama farthest from me, [Mr. HOUSTON,] now in my eye, observed the statement, he quoted it to other democratic Senators and called attention to it, and so it was well understood. But we were met with an abrupt refusal, met with a statement that we should not adjourn and that Senators who had been here, some of them in committee for an hour and a half before the time of meeting, who had had nothing to eat since early morning, and then only a scanty meal, should be driven after six o'clock to submit their arguments to the Senate or they should be concluded altogether, not from the privilege, but from the common and constitutional right to do so.

Upon that refusal, Mr. President, we joined issue, and I beg to say that, having served in one House or the other for now twenty years, having witnessed many scenes of excitement and of hot and heedless partisan pursuit, never in either House, never in any deliberative body whose proceedings I have witnessed, has there fallen under my notice an attempt so tyrannous, so despotic, so full of denial of common right, to gag, to throttle, to disdain the rights of a minority, great or small, but especially, a minority numbering well-nigh half of the present Senate, a minority so great that when, acting upon its constitutional rights, it merely sits mute, the so-called majority, which has insisted upon this proceeding, finds itself paralyzed for lack of numbers. A minority so numerous, never within my observation was treated to anything coming near, anywhere near, the injustice and affront of this transaction.

Mr. President, one of the sections of the Army bill so called, as we believe generally, on this side of the Senate, as speaking for myself I declare my belief, violates the Constitution of the country. That is one objection to it. It seeks to abridge and paralyze the constitutional powers and to forbid the execution of the constitutional duty of the National Executive. More than that, we believe it is designed as the entering wedge, the forerunner, the bill to usher in for the next fiscal year a similar provision, the effect of which will be to do everything attempted in the appropriation bill and afterward in a separate bill, both smitten by the executive veto, in this same direction; and we believe that this proposed legislation, taken in connection with the so-called judicial bill, would in the end and in effect accomplish absolutely everything within the power of the two Houses which this needless extra session was brought on to achieve.

So believing, honorable Senators who exult in the fact that they belong to a majority must not forget that we have rights of conscience, that we have duties imposed by our oaths which we are not wont on this side to parade, and that we have rights and obligations which we are bound to defend by all the modes of parliamentary warfare customary for the protection of minorities. Senators must remember that in an exigency of injustice and denial of right never witnessed, in success or in attempt, in this Chamber during my service here before, we were moved as the honorable Presiding Officer of this body, the leader of this senatorial majority was moved on at least one occasion to which he referred, to which the Senator from Wisconsin has adverted, and of which I myself was an auditor and a witness.

I will not say that anything which has fallen from the Senator from Virginia comes with an ill or with a good grace. I will not now recite again the facts of this transaction; but I was unwilling to allow to go without a reminder to the Senator of his statement, if I caught his words aright, that at any time last evening or yesterday after the motion to adjourn was made—at any time and at all times, the majority would willingly have adjourned, willingly have allowed us the food and the sleep essential to our ability to debate this measure, had we only said somewhere, at some time, in some way, that a postponement to the next day would be sufficient and that a vote might be taken then. Explicitly, as the belated RECORD, which like the Journal lags behind, will show when it comes to be printed—explicitly, speaking of course only for myself and having no authority to speak for anybody else, but confirmed and permitted by the silence and assent of all my associates, I told the honorable Senator, his committee, and his associates in majority, that were we only allowed an adjournment for a single night undoubtedly during the next day the vote should be taken, and that they might rely upon it that no Senator on this side of the Chamber wished to consume one moment's time by procrastination or delay.

But, Mr. President, I will not prolong this debate. I am willing to agree entirely to what has been said by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, and for the nonce letting by-gones as to these facts be by-gones, if the majority will move and carry a motion to adjourn, I am willing to consent that we come back to-morrow in such good temper as every man's experience in this proceeding shall insure to him, to go on to the consideration, and the final consideration, of this very important bill.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, I think it necessary that I should state more explicitly my recollection of what passed yesterday evening. I reiterate my assertion that so far as I am apprized, there was no period of time after the question arose at which the arrangement now proposed could not have been carried out, as I understood it. It is true that the Senator from New York did state his convictions that no dilatory procedures merely for the purpose of delaying the passage of the bill would be interposed by his side of the Chamber; but to every effort which I made to secure the acceptance of an understanding that the vote should be had during to-day, as it now is, I got only the expression of an opinion on the part of the Senator from New York that that was practicable. In further confirmation of what I say, I have in my mind's eye not one or two or three but half a dozen republican Senators to whom the declaration was made by me and who left me with the assurance that in their opinion such an arrangement would be practicable, but who failed utterly to secure it.

That is my recollection of what transpired, and whether I am right or the Senator from New York is right in the recollection of the words used I will abide the RECORD, to which he has appealed. I know that I am liable to err, and I presume the Senator from New York will hardly assume that he is so superior to the influences which control human minds as to be incapable altogether of an error of memory with regard to it. Truly, sir, we do to some extent no doubt exult in our novel condition of a majority in this body; and it is true that the Senator from New York particularly writhes under the unaccustomed calling of being changed to a minority in this body.

As to the temper with which we have considered the matter, and with which I hope we shall continue to consider it, so far as I am concerned, I have never had any bad temper in connection with it. I will take that back, Mr. President. For one moment, I will admit, at one time, I did lose my temper, but it was for a very short time; and since then I am sure I have been as calm and as placid as a May morning, and I hope to continue so during the further progress of the debate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will suspend a moment, if it is the pleasure of the Senate, the Chair will direct the remainder of the Journal to be read.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have only a word to say, and then I will let the Journal be read.

Mr. President, it will be recollected by Senators all around me, and I think by the Senator from New York, that last evening twice, certainly once, very distinctly I proposed that if an understanding could be reached to take the vote at any time to-day, this side of the Chamber, so far as I learned, was willing to adjourn. That was twice I believe, certainly once, said, but the Senator from New York said, "No understanding can be had." With this statement I am content that the whole matter shall rest there. I ask that the rest of the Journal be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The remainder of the Journal will now be read.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Did not the Chair rule some moments ago that the subject of the Journal fell with the morning hour, no motion to correct or amend having been made? Such a motion, in the language of the Chair, would survive; but there being no motion, with the expiration of the morning hour the subject of the Journal would pass from the Senate. Am I not right in that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is entirely right; and the Chair will correct an error into which the Chair fell. It was really the duty of the Chair when one o'clock came to lay the unfinished business before the Senate, because no motion had been made to amend the Journal or to correct it in any way, which would have created a privileged question that would have overridden the morning hour and extended it until it was disposed of. The Journal has been now completed, and the Chair asks unanimous consent of the Senate to have it read. If there is no objection the Chair will direct the Journal to be read.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I will not interpose an objection, but I will interpose, if I can, a safeguard. I believe, with great respect to the Chair, that the first rule is a valid rule and an explicit one. I believe that it is not within the power of the Chair to give dispensation of that rule. I believe that if the reading of the Journal was ever in order at the discretion of the Chair, it was in order when, and only when, the first rule says it shall be read, to wit, after the presiding officer takes the chair and calls the Senate to order and before other business is transacted.

By unanimous consent I am willing the Journal shall be read; but I am unwilling that by silence or by the action of the Senate any precedent shall be made tolerating the idea that the presiding officer of the Senate has the right to dispense with the reading of the Journal, whether the Journal is ready or not. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin asks me to read the rule which the Chair was kind enough to have read at my request at the desk before the Senator came in. I will read, at the request of that Senator, the latter part of this rule:

> The reading of the Journal shall not be suspended unless by unanimous consent; and when any motion shall be made to amend or correct the same, it shall be deemed a privileged question, and proceeded with until disposed of by the Senate.

I do not object, Mr. President, but I want it to appear on the Journal that this is done by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I move that the Journal be read, whether unanimous consent is given or not.

Mr. CONKLING. I will raise a point of order if the Senator moves that the Journal be read. If he is content to let the suggestion of the Chair be acquiesced in by unanimous consent, be it so; but a motion I will encounter with a point of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is no need of a motion.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, one word. I cannot permit what has been said by the Senators from Wisconsin and New York to go to the country without a word. In the first place, we have been told that the action of the majority on this floor was an outrage; that the action of the majority on this floor was unworthy of the Senate of the United States. The honorable Senator from New York has said that if at any time—I will not say he, but the other side of the Chamber—could have had the assurance that they should have had their day in court, if I may use an expression that is so familiar to the legal profession, there would have been no difficulty.

Humble as I am as a member of this body, I have the honor to be a member of the Appropriations Committee; and I beg leave to say that I assured Senators upon the other side that if the Senator from Wisconsin would take his papers and proceed for a brief while yesterday an adjournment should be had. In that case I undertook to pledge myself that an adjournment should be had, and that all the time that was necessary should be given to my friends upon the other side. An excuse was made that the honorable Senator from Wisconsin was sick. Ah, Mr. President, he did not act like a sick man here for seven or eight hours last night, or this morning. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARPENTER. I rallied under the impulse.

Mr. EATON. I am glad my friend was well enough to take an active part in the obstructive business of last night. Mr. President, I desire it to go to the country that the majority on this floor were absolutely willing to adjourn, and so said to more than one member upon the other side, and that a simple commencement of the discussion last night by the Senator from Wisconsin was all that was asked.

Mr. CONKLING. But the Senator's side voted down so many motions to adjourn.

Mr. EATON. A motion to adjourn was once carried, as I understand; I was not on the floor, and therefore I speak simply from information; and then the yeas and nays were called by the other side in order to prevent the motion from prevailing.

Mr. WITHERS. They were called by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. EATON. I was not here; I had gone out at the time, and therefore I do not assert it of my own knowledge; but I so understand. I assert of my own knowledge, and I defy contradiction by the Senator from New York or the Senator from Wisconsin, that the majority on this side again and again said that all the time that was asked should be given by an adjournment. All that was asked over and over again last night was that the other side should indicate any hour, no matter when, no matter how late, whether it was after six, eight, ten, or twenty hours' session, and we said "we will give you all that time to discuss this question."

The honorable Senator from New York said that the Constitution is sought to be violated, and therefore they demanded the right to meet this question. I should be glad to meet the honorable Senator from New York either to-day or to-morrow, or any day, on that question. We deny the right of the President of the United States to use the Army of the United States upon the people of the United States without being required by the authority of the States. The Constitution of the United States provides how the troops shall be used, and they are to be used upon the call of the executive of the State when the Legislature thereof is not in session or cannot be convened in time to make the demand.

Mr. CONKLING. That is all, is it not?

Mr. EATON. I have not said it was.

Mr. CONKLING. I am inquiring.

Mr. EATON. I hold that whenever the State of New York desires the protection of the Federal arm the State of New York will ask for it, and then the President of the United States under the Constitution will respond to the demand of New York.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. Suppose the State of New York should call upon the General Government to preserve the peace at the polls in that State at the next election of governor or of any other State officer, could the President do it under this bill?

Mr. EATON. That is a supposition so absurd, so unworthy of consideration for a man of ordinary intelligence, that I decline to answer any question of that character. That the great State of New York, represented on this floor by my distinguished friend, a State that sent five hundred thousand men into the war a few years ago, requires a few epauleted gentlemen of the United States Army to go there and keep the peace, I say is an absurdity. It is unworthy of the Senate of the United States to talk about it.

Mr. CARPENTER. Suppose the troops are needed?

Mr. EATON. I say the State of New York can protect itself; I do not believe the honorable Senator from New York will deny that. I have not heard him yet say that the Army would be needed there, with all their shoulder-hitters, and I do not know what my friend from Georgia [Mr. HILL] did call them—with all those fellows that get about the slums of the city of New York. New York can take care of its own peace and New York will protect its own honor. So far as I am concerned the little State that I have the honor in part to represent does not require the Army of the United States to protect its elections.

Mr. President, I have not risen to discuss this question, but simply to say that the majority upon this side were willing (and my friend from New York knows very well what I mean when I say so) that had any hour, no matter what the hour was, whether it was after a five hours', or a six hours', or a ten hours', or a twenty hours' debate, been named, an adjournment could have been had yesterday, last night. I do not mean at six o'clock, but after six o'clock.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator does not mean any particular hour?

Mr. EATON. No, sir, I do not mean any particular hour. I mean to say, and I do not think it will be denied by Senators upon the other side, that the offer was made again and again to get you to fix some hour to-day, no matter whether it ran up so that there would be a ten hours' or a twenty hours' session, and an adjournment would have been had yesterday at once; but again and again the stalwart whom I have in my eye said, "never, never; no agreement; no arrangement."

Mr. MCMILLAN. "No coercion about it."

Mr. EATON. My friend, the Senator in charge of the bill, moved himself to adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. And withdrew his motion.

Mr. EATON. It was defeated, as I understand.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, no.

Mr. EATON. He did not like the temper which was exhibited by certain Senators as I understand, and therefore withdrew his motion. But I did not rise to discuss this question. I simply rose to let it go forth to the country that the republican Senators upon this floor were the obstructives.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator does not mean that?

Mr. EATON. I mean exactly that, and the Senator from New York understands my meaning. This bill should either have been passed or defeated long before this time, and if my sick friend from Wisconsin, who I rejoice has so suddenly recovered, had only gone on for half an hour last night the whole matter would have been ended long ago.

Mr. WHYTE. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to remind him that at ten o'clock last night I moved to adjourn, and it was announced carried by the presiding officer, when the Senator from New York called for the yeas and nays and himself voted against the adjournment.

Mr. CONKLING. May I be allowed to state how that was? A Senator on my right had appealed from a decision of the Chair, had appealed on a point somewhat personal to him, as it was put by another Senator; and when the motion to adjourn was made the Senate was about to vote on that appeal. The Senator who had taken the appeal, as the RECORD will show, as the record already printed in the public newspapers does show, declared that before an adjournment he wanted a vote and the judgment of the Senate on that appeal. To give that vote certain republican Senators did unite with him and with a body of democratic Senators in refusing at that moment to adjourn. That was that transaction.

Mr. President, as I am on my feet, I will say a single word in reply to my very highly esteemed friend from Connecticut. He says that Senators, not excepting the Senator from New York, are aware that he gave assurances that an adjournment might take place. Let me say that when the Senator from Connecticut gives an assurance to me, I know past doubt that will be made good to the uttermost of his power, count for what it may. I never doubted the faith of the Senator from Connecticut in any suggestion he made, but as that honorable Senator knows and as other Senators who hear me know, I had received previously the assurance of several Senators that an adjournment should take place when the Senator from Wisconsin took the floor. I had communicated that fact to him and he had put away his books, his papers, and his preparation, and everybody on this side understood that by consent an adjournment should take place. I need not state our surprise when at half after six, despite these assurances, despite these circumstances, despite the understanding, for such it was, on which we had relied, we were told that we should have no adjournment and nothing should take place except the arbitrary endeavor by brute force and animal endurance to secure a final vote upon the passage of the bill. It is said that a burnt child fears the fire; and I will say to the honorable Senator from Connecticut that knowing as I do his leadership in his party and in this Chamber, confiding absolutely, as I always do, in his word and his honor, I had great doubt whether when the honorable Senator from Connecticut came to make, if he should make, which he did not, a motion to adjourn, that motion would command a majority of his democratic colleagues. Therefore it was that the Senator from Wisconsin, sick as he was, promised as he had been that an adjournment should take place, was not pushed to begin his argument upon the shadowy promise that if we should fix an hour the next day at some time before he had concluded an adjournment might take place.

Mr. President, I would not agree now to fix an hour to vote on this bill. More than once during this extra session we have been caught (I do not mean now designedly caught, but caught by the circumstances of such an agreement) by the fact that the Senator holding the floor would speak down to the hour, and then we were compelled to offer amendments without the opportunity for one moment to discuss or explain them. It was to avoid that, as explained to the Senator from Connecticut, and to other Senators, that I was unwilling to agree to fix an hour; but there never was a time when we were not willing to have it understood, as I stated, and I have inquired of the very accomplished and accurate Reporter before me, and learned from him that I stated accurately to-day what took place, when before moving to adjourn I took pains to state that we expected to vote, were willing to vote and to conclude the bill on the succeeding day.

Mr. President, I do not believe that all the ingenuity of gentlemen on the other side, or all the words that can darken council, will be able to convince anybody, even those Senators, that when we stood here respectfully and courteously asking that after six o'clock an adjournment might take place, that we might for the first time participate in discussing the bill after Senators on the other side had occupied nearly the whole of the occasion, that while so standing, so asking, being thus refused and thus repulsed, it was true all the time that we might have had an adjournment; and that really but for the unfortunate way we adopted of signifying our disposition so that the democrats did not find out that we were trying to adjourn, an adjournment might have taken place. I think that that idea will turn out to be too much for the credulity of Senators or spectators.

SENATOR BELL'S MILEAGE.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I have a resolution to offer which affects the compensation of a Senator on this floor who may leave here this evening. I desire to have the resolution adopted now, and therefore will send it to the table. It is a resolution for paying mileage to Hon. Mr. BELL, of New Hampshire. The Secretary of the Senate will not be at liberty to pay him mileage without a resolution of the Senate, as the mileage of the session will inure to his successor. I therefore offer a resolution allowing him mileage.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay Hon. CHARLES H. BELL mileage at the rate allowed by law for attendance at this session, the same to be paid out of the "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 18th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 650) to remove the political disabilities of Arthur P. Bagby, of Texas;

An act (S. No. 670) to remove the political disabilities of William N. R. Beall, of Missouri; and

An act (S. No. 669) to remove the political disabilities of James F. Harrison, of Virginia.

The message also announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following joint resolutions:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 6) accepting from Professor Edward Fontane, of Louisiana, certain maps, drawings, and explanations of the same; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 30) for the relief of Dr. C. W. Brink, bearer of dispatches from the United States minister at Mexico in 1869.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I have no purpose of entering into the controversy to which the Senate has listened in regard to who is right or who wrong about the scenes through which we have passed. Senators on this floor on all sides will bear witness that I was no party to them. I desired that every gentleman on this floor should be perfectly accommodated as to his desire to speak so far as his personal wishes were concerned. Therefore I have no remarks to make criminating this side or the other as to the particular matters which have been discussed, and I rise simply to say one thing and I am not content the Senate shall adjourn to-day without entering that sentiment on record. I am one of the youngest members of this body. I have but a limited experience in the legislative business of the Government at best. I do not know whether I shall be here a short or a long period. But a doctrine has been uttered here to-day, and it is not the first time I have heard it, against which I desire simply to enter my protest. It was uttered by as distinguished a Senator as the Senator from Wisconsin, and I assume is indorsed by all the gentlemen on the opposite side of the Chamber, members of the republican party. The doctrine to which I allude is that any Senator and especially a party of Senators have the constitutional right to sit in their seats in this Hall and refuse to vote for the purpose of preventing the progress of legislation. That is the doctrine against which I enter my protest. I say that the Senators on this floor, not meaning to reflect on their motives in the slightest degree, are under as much obligation to perform a duty as they are to perform it correctly, and it is just as unconstitutional to refuse to perform a duty as it is to perform that duty improperly. The Constitution requires that this legislation shall be had, and if Senators have a right to sit in their seats and refuse to vote, intending thereby to prevent the progress of legislation for one hour, they have a right to do it for one day, and if they have a right to do it for one day they have a right to do it for an entire session and they have a right to do it all the time, and they have a right, therefore, by simple non-action, by a simple refusal to discharge the functions which they are charged to perform when they are sent to this body, to revolutionize and destroy the Government.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Very well, I have no objection.

Mr. CARPENTER. While the Constitution requires that legislation shall be proceeded with, it does not require that a bill of this importance shall be passed Wednesday night after six o'clock.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have heard those excuses offered for every revolution that has ever been perpetrated in this country, and they may be found of record as justification for every revolution that was ever perpetrated in any country. Men always plead something in the shape of constitutional right or personal right to justify revolution and the overthrow of government.

Here is a measure that has been debated at the last session of Congress, debated in the other House and debated in this. It has been debated at this session of Congress for weeks, and has actually gone to the President and been vetoed, and is before this session of Congress a second time. Gentlemen say that it is a constitutional right that they have to speak in their own way and in their own time, and if a majority of this body differed with them they have a right to sit in their seats and refuse to vote, and thereby prevent legislative action. That is the point which I say in my judgment is revolutionary, because there is no escape from it.

Mr. CARPENTER. It is the mildest possible form of revolution.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Ah, Mr. President, government may be destroyed just as effectually by non-action as by mal-action; and if one member of the Government is justified under the Constitution in refusing to perform his duty, every member of the Government is justified in refusing to perform his duty, and government becomes an instantaneous failure. It is no mild form of revolution; it is one of the most insidious forms of revolution possible. It is a revolution that you cannot meet by force and suppress by force.

Now, I want to say to the gentlemen on the other side that this idea is not original, though it may be original in this Senate; I do not know, but I understand from elder members of the Senate that for the first time in the history of this Senate the things which we witnessed last night have occurred; that is, gentlemen have sat here and refused to vote. I do not know whether it is true or not, and I do not state whether it is true or not. I am speaking now for myself——

Mr. CARPENTER. Let me correct the Senator.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Please excuse me, friend. I do not know whether it is so or not, and it does not make any difference whether it is so or not; but certainly it is the first time I have witnessed it. It is the first time I have heard of its being enacted on this floor. I have heard of it in the other House; I have heard of it in the other legislative bodies, and sometimes it has been excused and sometimes it has not been, and gentlemen generally excuse it to their own conscience by pleading that some other great end is to be accomplished. I speak for myself, and I want to enter now my protest upon this record against the idea that gentlemen have a right to sit in their seats and refuse to perform their affirmative, positive duty under the Constitution for the purpose of obstructing the legislation of the country one hour.

I said to the gentlemen that this idea was not original. I am not going to reopen the controversy. This is not the first time I have discussed it. It is not the first time I have considered it. A little over two years ago, for a higher and greater purpose than the purpose of allowing one or two members to make speeches, for a higher and greater purpose than allowing a debate to progress one day, and for the purpose, as was alleged, of preventing a gigantic fraud, the doctrine was advanced that gentlemen had the constitutional right, by dilatory motions and sitting in their seats, to prevent the accomplishment of a positive duty. That doctrine was asserted by intelligent gentlemen, and they said they violated no constitution in doing it; and if the doctrine is right they had as much right to sit in their seats and refuse to vote or to make dilatory motions to prevent the completion of the presidential count as the Senator from Wisconsin has or any of the gentlemen on the other side have to prevent the passage of a bill or to delay the passage of a bill. If you have a right to do it for one purpose you have a right to do it for any purpose; and the purpose then was avowed. I carefully considered it; I held it then to be revolutionary. I believed it to be revolutionary. I believed it would be revolutionary although it was to prevent an acknowledged and unmitigated fraud.

I felt it was my duty when I was sent to this body to discharge the functions that belong to me under the Constitution and not to evade them, and I have no more right to evade them than I have to perform them improperly.

I say this now, and I trust the time has come when the people will wake up to the fact, that there is more than one way of revolutionizing this Government. It may be revolutionized by a failure to perform duty as well as by a maladministration of duty. In the kindest feelings to all concerned, and without participating in this discussion, I simply rose for myself to enter my protest here and now against this doctrine.

Mr. THURMAN, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at two o'clock and fifty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 19, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. DAVID WILLS, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PAY OF HOUSE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. HENRY, from the committee of conference on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 85) fixing the date on which the pay of the committee clerks, pages, and laborers of the House of Representatives, who are paid during the session only, shall begin, submitted a report; which was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the House resolution No. 85, entitled "Joint resolution fixing the date on which the pay of the committee clerks, pages, and laborers of the House of Representatives, who are paid during the session only, shall begin for this session," having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 5, and agree to the same;

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1 and 2;

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 3, and agree to the same with the following amendment, viz: In lieu of said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That the officers, clerks to committees, and employés of the Senate, including the Capitol police, who were employed previous to the 4th day of March, 1879, and who continued in said employment to and including the 4th day of April, who have since ceased to be so employed, or who may cease to be so employed prior to December 1, 1879, shall be paid a sum equal to one month's pay at the rate per annum they were paid when their employment ceased; and a sufficient sum for this purpose is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 4, and agree to the same with the following amendment, namely:

After the word "under," in line 8 of said amendment, insert the words "section 2 of."

And the Senate agree to the same.

DANIEL M. HENRY,
E. L. MARTIN,
A. HERR SMITH,
Managers on the part of the House.

WILLIAM A. WALLACE,
H. G. DAVIS,
J. G. BLAINE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman submitting this report state whether it is a unanimous report.

Mr. HENRY. It is.

The question being on agreeing to the report,

Mr. SAMFORD called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The report was adopted.

Mr. HENRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST-ROUTES.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported, with amendments, the bill (S. No. 697) to establish additional post-routes in the State of Florida.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COOK] desire the amendments read?

Mr. COOK. No, sir. The bill contains no legislation except post-routes.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me that I may offer a single amendment.

Mr. COOK. I yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. As the gentleman from Georgia gives the assurance that there is no legislation of any kind whatever in this bill except the establishment of post-routes, the reading of the bill and amendments will be omitted, according to custom, if there be no objection.

There being no objection, the reading was dispensed with.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to amend the amendments of the committee by adding the following:

Minnesota: From Kenyon to Richland.

The amendment of Mr. DUNNELL was agreed to.

The amendments reported by the committee, as amended, were adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that the title be amended so as to read: "An act to establish certain post-routes in the States therein named."

Mr. COOK. That modification should be made.

The title was amended accordingly.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JUDICIAL EXPENSES.

Mr. MCMAHON. From the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill making appropriations for certain judicial expenses I submit the report which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 2252, making appropriations for certain judicial expenses, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 1, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

Strike out the words proposed to be inserted by said Senate amendment and insert after the word "money," in line 16, page 2 of the bill, the following:

"Under any of the provisions of title 26 of the Revised Statutes of the United States authorizing the appointment or payment of general or special deputy marshals for services in connection with elections or on election day."

So that the section as amended shall read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the sums appropriated in this act for the —— persons and public service embraced in its provisions are in full for such persons and public service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880; and no Department or officer of the Government shall, during said fiscal year, make any contract or incur any liability for the future payment of money under any of the provisions of title 26 of the Revised Statutes of the United States authorizing the appointment or payment of general or special deputy marshals for service in connection with elections or on election day until an appropriation sufficient to meet such contract or pay such liability shall have first been made by law."

And the Senate agree to the same.

J. A. McMAHON,
THOMAS R. COBB,
Managers on the part of the House.
WILLIAM A. WALLACE,
H. G. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. McMAHON. I demand the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope before the gentleman does that he will allow some debate.

Mr. McMAHON. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio I will give time for discussion after the previous question has been seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well.

Mr. McMAHON. I now demand the previous question on the adoption of the report.

Mr. CONGER. After the previous question is moved there is no hour for debate on this subject.

Mr. McMAHON. Yes, I am entitled to an hour before the main question has been ordered.

Mr. CONGER. That is, a member reporting a measure from a committee is entitled to one hour in which to close debate; but this is a conference report, and the gentleman I think is not entitled to his hour.

Mr. GARFIELD. The rule applies to conference reports.

Mr. CONGER. Does the Chair decide that the gentleman making this report is entitled to one hour before the main question has been ordered?

The SPEAKER. He is, either before or after.

Mr. CONGER. The rule says reports from committees, and that refers to the report of a bill, but does not include conference reports between the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. The rule will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The right of a member reporting a measure to open and close debate is not affected by an order either for the previous question or that debate shall cease in committee.

The SPEAKER. The practice has been to allow an hour for debate when claimed before or after the main question has been ordered on a report from a committee of conference.

Mr. CONGER. Reports from the committee of conference have a special privilege, and I do not remember when explanation was not allowed before the previous question was called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio demanded the previous question for the purpose of holding the floor.

Mr. McMAHON. That is all.

The SPEAKER. He states his willingness to yield for whatever time may be desired.

Mr. McMAHON. I will yield after I have made an explanation to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. MONROE.]

Mr. MONROE. I desire first to make an explanation myself.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. McMAHON moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. Speaker, the Senate and the House disagreed only in form in their proceedings in open House on the last clause of section 2. Both Houses were looking to the same result. The last clause of section 2, as it passed the House originally, read as follows:

And no Department or officer of the Government shall, during said fiscal year, make any contract or incur any liability for the future payment of money until an appropriation sufficient to meet such contract or pay such liability shall have first been made by law.

When the bill went to the Senate it was amended so as to add to the end of the section the words "except as provided for in section 3732 of the Revised Statutes," which says that certain expenditures in connection with the Army and Navy shall not be covered by the stringent provision of law contained in section 3679 of the Revised Statutes.

It is the law now and has been ever since we anticipated war in March, 1861, at which time section 3731 was passed. In the conference committee the House conferees, upon mature consideration, thought it advisable to change the broad and general language of this second section and to limit its application to the particular matters that might be said to be in controversy between the two political parties; or, which now seems to be the same thing, between the two Houses and the President. So we did not put this inhibition upon the Departments for all purposes, but confined it to the action of an officer under any of the provisions of title 26 of the Revised Statutes of the United States authorizing the appointment or payment of general or special deputy marshals for services in connection with elections or upon election day. Having in section 1 expressly refused to appropriate any money for any use whatever under title 26, we inhibit the incurring of any liability by section 2 for the employment or payment of deputy marshals for elections.

The House will observe that the limitation in section 2 is confined to the coming fiscal year; secondly, that it is confined to appointments or payments during that fiscal year, under the provisions of title 26, of deputy marshals, special or general. I want to deal frankly with the House and let it understand that the appointment or payment of "supervisors" is not prohibited in this section as amended, and the reason for that I will give. The amendment has not been narrowed by leaving out the "supervisors," but, on the contrary, the scope and spirit of it in this particular has been maintained. Supervisors, both chief and general, are paid out of a permanent annual appropriation fund. If supervisors are to be employed next year the money is now appropriated to pay those officers.

Mr. CLYMER. Special supervisors?

Mr. McMAHON. Any supervisors. I know the gentleman has debated that question with me; but in my judgment it does not admit of debate. The statute is explicit. All the fees of supervisors on election days are embraced in the permanent appropriation. I have the statute before me. On page 734 of the Revised Statutes, under the head of "Permanent annual appropriations," at the end of section 3689 we find the following:

Fees of supervisors of elections.

Not chief supervisors, but—

Fees of supervisors of elections.

When the law says "supervisors" it cannot be said it means only "chief supervisors." The election laws recognize "supervisors" and "chief supervisors," and when the permanent appropriation law provides for the payment of the fees of "supervisors" how can the gentleman claim that it means only "chief supervisors?"

And this construction is not only the law but the practice of the Government, as we have ascertained by inquiry there. There is no doubt that all the supervisors, ordinary and chief, are paid, and in my judgment paid properly, as the law now stands, out of the permanent annual appropriation.

Mr. CLYMER. Is not that only for fees, not for compensation?

Mr. McMAHON. The $5 a day are what I call fees, and ordinary supervisors can receive nothing else whatever in any case. You call jurors' per diem their fees. So I call supervisors' per diem "fees."

Mr. CLYMER. The gentleman calls them fees.

Mr. McMAHON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The ordinary supervisors of elections who stay at the polls get only $5 a day and have no salary and no compensation except $5 a day, which is their "fees." The chief supervisor has certain other fees as a commissioner, which are provided for in that portion of our bill which provides for fees of commissioners.

The statute is in this language:

To pay supervisors of elections compensation apart from and in excess of all fees allowed by law for the performance of any duty as circuit court commissioner.

Now, it being the law and the practice to pay all supervisors out of the permanent annual appropriation fund, the second clause in section 2 of the bill as we passed it originally in the House would not have prevented the appointment of supervisors of elections, for the reason that the permanent annual appropriation had already provided for their payment, and this section in its original shape only inhibited the making of any contract or the incurring of liability for any person where those appropriations had not already been made.

We have retained the words "incur any liability." Whether this has added anything to the force of this section or not I do not now propose to argue. If it does not, it is harmless. If it does, it is a valuable addition. The law as it now stands reads as follows:

SEC. 3678. All sums appropriated for the various branches of expenditure in the public service shall be applied solely to the subjects for which they are respectively made, and for no other.

SEC. 3679. No Department of the Government shall expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations.

Now, what is the spirit of the law as now found upon our statute-books? It is that Congress (and particularly the House, which originates all these bills) shall have the absolute control of the amount and uses of all the expenditures of the Government. How has this control and our laws been evaded? By making contracts or incurring liabilities during the fiscal year beyond our appropriations, which the different Departments appeal to Congress to settle up subsequently when they send us estimates for deficiencies, and which we do settle up sometimes when we pass deficiency bills. Yet the spirit of this law is this, that when Congress has appropriated a hundred millions of dollars to run the Government for a certain fiscal year, not one dollar of money should be spent nor one dollar of liability incurred in addition to what Congress had provided for by appropriation. Almost any deficiency is a violation of existing law.

Mr. ACKLEN. Is it not constantly violated?

Mr. McMAHON. It is constantly violated in some of the Departments. I believe some do not.

Now, when a deputy marshal, general or special, is appointed (and the appointment so as to incur a liability for money is all that is inhibited here) he is appointed by a ministerial officer—a marshal; and I think when he is thus appointed under the law a contract is made with him. If we have appropriated no money to pay deputy marshals under title 26, as we have not, I think no marshal would have authority to appoint a special deputy marshal to serve on election day, or a general deputy marshal whose only duty would be to be present on election day and interfere with voters and the elections. But we desire to make this prohibition more explicit; and therefore we have kept in the words "incur any liability;" and I confess I do not see how the liability is incurred except by an authorized officer making on the part of the Government an appointment which is a contract between the officer and the Government itself. And the law at present prohibits such contract in express language; and, for one, I can scarcely express the opinion that the words "incur any liability" add any strength, but only more clearness, to the law as it now stands. The practice may be different, but there are many wrong practices prevailing.

Now this appropriation bill, Mr. Speaker, was originally framed upon this fundamental idea, that the representatives of the people have control of the amount and uses of the money that shall be needed in any one fiscal year for the support of the Government; and when I assert that principle, I mean that we have that authority, not only over how much shall be actually disbursed, but over the extent of the indebtedness that may be incurred. It is of no use to limit the amount that may be expended in a year if the Government is at liberty to incur liabilities beyond that amount indefinitely to be paid at some future day. If our law does not mean that already, we should have one declaring that no money shall be spent, no contract made, no obligation assumed, no liability incurred, that has not been previously appropriated for by Congress. The reason why we modify the pending section in this respect and do not now insist that this general prohibition shall become a law is this: to a certain extent this may be a new departure, in practice if not in law the Departments have acted upon a different construction and have sent in all their estimates under the old practice, and if we adopt what would be to them or some of them a new system for the coming fiscal year by ordering that no Department shall incur a liability of any kind whatsoever without a previous appropriation we might hamper the Government in matters we do not at present desire to reach, especially as most of the appropriations for the coming fiscal year have been made upon the Administration's construction of the existing law. But in addition to this we have desired to confine the prohibitions of this bill to the cases that are within the appropriations provided for in it—upon the theory we have already spoken of—our right to say what uses shall be made of our money and what obligations may be incurred that will create a demand upon the Treasury of the people.

Mr. BAKER. I would like to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. McMAHON. I cannot yield now; I would be glad to do so, but I want to finish what I have to say in this connection.

We have appropriated $600,000 for marshals and their deputies. But in section 1 of this bill we declare expressly that no part of this money is appropriated for any services or purposes to be found under title 26 of the Revised Statutes. It is conceded that we have a right to do this, and that our failure to appropriate for other purposes is no legitimate ground for executive veto. But our right to determine how much money is needed, and in what manner to be spent, is not limited to the mere matter of the disbursement of the money. It is a silly prerogative if it can be evaded by the indefinite multiplication of liabilities beyond the sum allowed by Congress. We do not say in this section that no officer shall appoint special deputy marshals, but that no officer shall make a contract or incur a liability for the Government in the making of such appointments, as we have appropriated no money for the payment of such persons, and do not propose to do so at any time. This is no interference with the supposed prerogative of the President. His peculiar friends claim that without appropriations for the courts the courts must stop, because he is not authorized to run them without the proper appropriations; yet his Treasury is overflowing with money, and much of it unappropriated to other uses. The same rule should hold with regard to special deputy marshals. No money is appropriated for their payment. Upon the principle which would shut up the courts of justice, the special deputies must be dispensed with. The failure to appropriate for them deprives the marshal of the power to appoint.

And the inhibition contained in section 2 as regards deputy marshals is only carrying out in express terms what has been the law and is the construction of it by the Departments in many instances. In other words, no money being appropriated under title 26, no appointment can be made which would involve the Government in a contract or agreement to pay for any purposes under it. I hope that the Administration will see its way clear to the same conclusion in regard to special deputy marshals as it arrives at when we are vigorously threatened with an extra session if we fail to appropriate money for the Federal courts.

To pass now to another point. In making no mention of supervisors of election in the second clause of the second section we have acted in harmony with the previous action of gentlemen on this side of the House.

I hold in my hand the legislative appropriation bill which was vetoed, and which was voted for by the whole body of the majority upon this side of the House. In that bill we included various provisions repealing parts of the election laws. But we allowed that portion of them to stand providing for the appointment of two supervisors of opposite political parties for each polling place to scrutinize the election, but with no other powers.

The House had already intimated its disposition to permit supervisors to remain. The appropriation bill does not recognize them and makes no appropriation for their fees in any shape or form. But the committee of conference was of opinion that the great grievance and wrong to the people consisted in the power of a marshal to appoint, as he can under the law as it now stands, any number of special deputies for election purposes, all of whom may be employed for ten days, or more where registration is required, at an expense to the people of $5 per day.

I desire to call the attention of the House to a point in this connection before I yield to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. MONROE.] There is a difference between deputy marshals; some are general, others are special. The special deputies are those appointed for election purposes only. But the general deputy marshals are instructed by the provisions of title 26 to be present at elections. They receive no compensation, however, specially for that purpose. Their compensation is of a general nature, for their general service as deputy marshals, and is merely such as may be agreed upon by them with the marshal. The marshal has an allowance under section 841 for his proper general deputies not exceeding three-fourths of what each may earn. He must report to the Department what he has earned, stating separately what he has earned in person and what by deputy. What compensation is allowed to the marshal or his general deputies for attendance on election day I am not able to say. There are no fees provided for general deputies for such special service unless they can be covered by the general law of fees. How far, therefore, the law as we propose to pass it will, if at all, interfere with the compensation of general deputies for election services I am at present unable to say. But if the marshal's accounts disclosed anywhere fees or charges for such service by him or his deputies, they could not be allowed; for no money is appropriated under this act for any such service. The unlimited power to appoint general deputies, who can be used under the law at elections, has been and probably will be most grossly abused. It will be our duty in the future to scrutinize the marshal's accounts more closely.

But one thing is clear. It will not be lawful under this and the first section to appoint special deputy marshals for election purposes unless they agree to serve without compensation. No appropriation is made for them and no right is conferred to incur a liability in their behalf. Upon this we stand. And I may be permitted to say here, and I want to say it fearlessly, that in doing this we are not exceeding the prerogatives that belong to us as the representatives of the people. If we surrender this much of our privileges to humor the whims of a President or the insolent demands of a party we do not deserve the trust of our people and should not hope to be returned to the House of Representatives if any of us have further ambition in that direction.

I speak of this matter because upon this one point there can be no controversy. We are united. Whatever may be thought of the employment of supervisors of elections, the course of the dominant party in regard to the employment of special deputy marshals is one of the greatest scandals of the Republic, an outrage upon fair elections, and one of the most indecent ever perpetrated. There is no similar precedent in the history of our Government. And if the law be carried out that special marshals may be employed during elections at $5 a day, thousands of them being employed in a single congressional district if needed to carry it—if this law is permitted to be executed by money which we have appropriated for that purpose, we do not deserve the confidence of our constituents, and I am very sure we will not retain it.

I yield now to my colleague on the committee of conference, [Mr. MONROE.]

Mr. MONROE. I shall not speak many minutes upon this question. After the very thorough debate to which the House has listened upon nearly every aspect of it, I do not propose to enter upon any general discussion. But I thought it incumbent upon me, as the only republican member of the conference committee on the part of the House, to say a word to indicate the position which I occupy and the view which I take of the report of the committee.

My colleague from Ohio and upon the conference committee [Mr. McMAHON] has correctly explained the limitation which is imposed by the report of the committee upon the prohibition contained in the bill in regard to the incurring of liabilities by officers and Departments of the Government.

The bill as it passed the House forbade any Department of the Government or any officer of the same to incur any liability whatever at any time or for any purpose in advance of an appropriation expressly made for the object. That of course is as broad as the whole land, as broad as all the spheres of duty of all the Departments of the Government. No man could say how wide the evil in that case might be or where it would strike.

My colleague has correctly explained that the committee of conference now propose to limit this prohibition upon the officers and Departments of the Government to the simple incurring of liability for the payment of general and special deputy marshals in connection with elections and on election day. That of course is a very great narrowing of the field of the prohibition. And if this bill were to become a law, of course, as one wishing well to my country, I would much prefer that it should pass in the form proposed by the conference committee than in the form in which it passed the House. There is unquestionably a large diminution of the dangers with which all the Departments of the Government were threatened by the limitation now placed upon the section.

The report of the conference committee, or of the majority of that committee, as it now stands, is no doubt a straightforward business-like proceeding; it is entirely a frank and open affair. We are not left in doubt at all as to what it means. There is no vague, general, unlimited threatening of trouble and disaster. We are told expressly what the majority of that committee, and the majority of the House if they adopt the report, propose to accomplish. Of course I rejoice in this frankness. Our friends have now given us exactly the issue which they wish to make under this bill, and have put it in very plain terms. This is just the issue which they wish to urge, and it happens also to be just the issue on which we should defeat them if we can. It is just such a form of bill, diminished indeed in extent and scope yet remaining the same in quality, as we have all along been opposed to, and, in principle and logical consistency, must continue to oppose.

What does it propose to accomplish? This section 2, taken in connection with the closing sentence of section 1, simply repeals—for that is what it virtually accomplishes—it simply repeals for one year all the safeguards thrown around elections and the right of suffrage by title 26 of the Revised Statutes. The difference between the bill, as made by this conference report and the one passed by the House, is that instead of repealing the law in regard to elections for all time, this report virtually repeals it for one year.

The closing portion of section 1 forbids the paying of any money in the way of salaries for any of the officers provided for by title 26, and this section 2, which has been in dispute between the two Houses, further forbids the incurring of any liability for general and special deputy marshals, the very officers provided for by title 26 to make the provisions of that title effective. Therefore the proposition before us, which I have already commended as a very frank, open, and plain proposition, is simply one to take from title 26 all the efficiency there is in it for one year. That is all; we know just what it is. It is a simple proposition to repeal that title for one year, instead of repealing it for all time to come, as was heretofore proposed.

And we now understand exactly what it is we have before us. There is no change of principle in the bill; there is no change in the object aimed at; there is no change in the quality of the issue, although there is a great change in the scope and extent of the evil which was threatened. But the thing meant, the whole issue that we fought over, is still here, and I do not know of any argument that was used on the republican side of the House against the original proposition which does not in logical consistency and in spirit apply to the proposition which is now before the House. I mention this simply that we all may have a thoroughly intelligent view of the situation. This is simply a proposition to repeal for one year those safeguards of the ballot-box which it was originally proposed by gentlemen on the other side to repeal permanently. I do not see how any republican can vote for it.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MONROE. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this bill will repeal for one year all supervisors as well as deputy marshals, and take from them their power to arrest? Is that suspended for one year?

Mr. MONROE. The last part of section 1 forbids the payment of any salaries to supervisors for one year.

Mr. COX. Does it repeal that section?

Mr. MONROE. I say that for one year this report proposes a virtual repeal of the safeguards of the ballot in that respect.

Mr. COX. Does it affect the supervisors as well as the deputy marshals?

Mr. MONROE. Section 1 forbids the payment of any salary to supervisors. Section 2 does not name the supervisors.

Mr. COX. Then it still allows supervisors?

Mr. MONROE. Section 2 simply forbids the incurring of any liability for the employment of general or special deputy marshals.

Mr. COX. Then the supervisors will remain for the one year, and under section 2022 will still have the same power as deputy marshals to make arrests?

Mr. MONROE. They may remain, but no provision is made for giving them any compensation.

Mr. COX. Does this bill suit my friend from Ohio?

Mr. MONROE. It does not.

Mr. COX. Does he propose to vote for the adoption of the conference report?

Mr. MONROE. I shall not vote for it.

Mr. COX. Very likely I shall agree with the gentleman in that respect. I want to see how the bill is going to operate.

Mr. MONROE. My colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] wishes to speak on this question. I yield him the remainder of my time.

Mr. GARFIELD. How much time has the gentleman remaining?

The SPEAKER. Thirteen minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, we do not insist that this House is obliged to vote all the money which some of us may think necessary for any given purpose. If the majority offers to appropriate for a particular purpose a part only of the money needed, we would not be justified in voting against such a bill merely because the amount is insufficient, for it might be your purpose to supply the deficiency hereafter. But it is certainly an objectionable mode of legislation so to cut down the appropriation bills as to make a deficiency inevitable. This bill is open to that objection; it does not appropriate enough, for it wholly omits a part of the usual supplies. But that objection alone would not prevent this side from voting for it.

The feature of this bill which is objectionable to us and to which we do not and cannot agree has been well stated by my colleague, [Mr. MONROE.] The bill goes beyond appropriations, and proposes by law to lay hold of the executive department of this Government and affirmatively prevent its officers from enforcing certain laws of the land. That is the attempt which we resist and shall continue to resist. The objectionable provision is now made definite and unmistakable in this conference report. The language of the clause as it first passed the House was somewhat vague, but here it is plain, and we perfectly understand its import. If any doubt remained my colleague who presented the report [Mr. MCMAHON] removed it by declaring the purpose of the clause. The issue is narrowed down to this: the gentleman tells us that he and his associates are determined that there shall be appointed no marshals, deputy marshals, or assistant marshals to execute the laws of the Union, as embodied in title 26 of the Revised Statutes; that they have devised and agreed on this clause in the conference between the two Houses so as to prevent the enforcement of that part of the existing law. This makes a sharp issue which everybody can understand.

Now, assuming that the gentlemen on the other side do not like these provisions of law relating to elections, (and we understand that to be their unanimous sentiment,) they ought to propose amendments to the law. My colleague who presents this report says that the law has been used for partisan purposes; that marshals, deputy marshals, and assistant marshals have been appointed merely to advocate and advance the political interest of one party at the elections. If that is so, it is a just criticism of the law, and an amendment ought to be offered to correct such an abuse. If my colleague will offer an amendment or allow us to offer an amendment so as to put the appointment of deputy and assistant marshals who are to serve in connection with congressional elections on the same basis as the appointment of supervisors—that is, that they shall be appointed by the courts and shall be chosen in equal numbers from the different political parties—we will aid him, and the abuse of which he complains can be corrected. But that is not in the line of the gentleman's wishes nor that of his party. They do wish not to better the law, but to annul it. They do not want the law executed so long as they have not the power to make the appointments and execute it in their own way.

Recent events have shown them that they cannot repeal these provisions of law. In the present situation of parties and opinions in Congress it is impossible to repeal them. Those who wish to repeal them have not the constitutional majority to do so. They can no more remove them from the statute-book than they can enact a law without a majority of votes. In short, they have not the constitutional majority to repeal these laws. Not being able constitutionally to repeal them, gentlemen on the other side say, "We will prevent their enforcement." And in attempting this they attack the Government in a very vital part. They know that the whole country, without regard to party, needs to have the courts of the United States open to all suitors. They know that justice ought to be administered in every district and circuit court of the United States. They know that United States prisoners are locked up, some under sentence of our courts, others awaiting trial, and that the Constitution provides that all who are held under charges shall have a speedy trial.

The great duty, the imperative obligation to provide for the speedy and prompt administration of justice rests upon members of Congress, republicans and democrats alike. But the majority of this House have segregrated from all the other appropriations of the year this one for the judicial expenses of the Government, and now offer this appropriation of two and a half millions of dollars, and say, not to us alone, but through us to the nation and to all the officers of the nation, that this money of the people which has been paid into the National Treasury for the very purpose of maintaining the courts shall not be used for that purpose, only on condition that the democratic party shall be permitted to couple with it a provision that certain laws of the land which they cannot repeal shall not be enforced; nay, more, that for the coming year these laws shall be nullified. In short, we are told that we must submit to the nullification of the election laws, or the courts of the United States shall be closed, the prisoners awaiting trial shall be discharged or shall be held untried, against the constitutional provision in their behalf; and that no provision shall be made, even to feed our prisoners. It is to be made unlawful to try them, unlawful to keep them, and it is unlawful to discharge them. With those hard conditions you have fettered the appropriations, the use of which reaches to the very vitals of national justice. You say, "Take these appropriations, coupled with the nullification of certain laws, or you shall not have them at all."

Gentlemen, we earnestly desire to go home. We have borne the burden of this long, weary, and profitless session until we are anxious to go to our homes and rest, and give the country rest. But we cannot, even under the persuasive heat of the dog-star and the pressure of this weary and distasteful work, accept the dishonor which this bill offers. It is a moral bribe to us to consent to the nullification of laws which you seek, not to improve but to destroy. We cannot, we will not, consent.

You have retained in this bill a clause which, if it becomes a law, will place the President of the United States between two fires—the fire of this law if he disobeys it, and the fire of heaven if he violates his oath by obeying it.

Mr. MCMAHON. Will my colleague allow me to ask him how the President is at all interfered with?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will answer. The President has taken an oath that he will see to it that the laws be faithfully executed. You do not repeal the election laws, but you make it impossible for him to execute them without violating another. You seek to place him in reach of your impeachment on the one hand, or, on the other, compel him to neglect his duty and violate his oath. We have no legal or moral right to put the Chief Executive in such an attitude. The wisdom of the Old Testament proverb, "in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird," may be fitly applied to this case. I do not see that there is the slightest probability you can catch a bird in this net.

Mr. HOUSE. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio as threatening us with another veto?

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. HOUSE. Do I understand the gentleman as threatening this side of the House with another veto?

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, we have heard of war and rumors of war in another quarter; but this House, this body whose members come directly from the people, the only real sovereigns in this country, has not only not come to blows, but so far as I know have not come to threats.

Mr. HOUSE. The gentleman talks about blows.

Mr. GARFIELD. I say neither blows nor threats. I am certainly indulging in no threats. I only say you offer a bill for the approval of the Executive which, if he approve, puts him in a position where he will be in conflict between the Constitution and the law you make.

Mr. HOUSE. What a very frank answer!

Mr. GARFIELD. It is both frank and just. I appeal to you, gentlemen, whether this kind of legislation meets the approval of your best judgment.

Now, I had some hope that when we were told yesterday by my colleague [Mr. MCMAHON] that the amendment which had come from the Senate was left open, so as to enable the conference committee to soften the asperities of this bill—I had some hope that we should see our way through the entanglements by finding a bill which gentlemen on this side could support, and that we might then adjourn, shake hands and go home. But I am compelled for the present to bid farewell to that pleasing prospect. WE STAY. [Applause from the republican side.]

Mr. MCMAHON. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not concur with the gentleman from Ohio before me [Mr. MCMAHON] in reference to the proper construction to be placed upon the provisions of the Revised Statutes in reference to a permanent appropriation for supervisors of elections. The provision of the statute upon that subject relates to the chief supervisors of elections so far as permanent appropriations are concerned. On page 734 of the Revised Statutes, among the miscellaneous appropriations made permanent, is the following in reference to supervisors of elections:

> Fees of supervisors of elections:
> To pay supervisors of elections compensation apart from and in excess of all fees allowed by law for the performance of any duty as circuit court commissioner.

That relates and can only relate to the fees of the chief supervsior as defined in section 2031 of the Revised Statutes, which provides as follows:

> There shall be allowed and paid to the chief supervisor, for his services as such officer, the following compensation, apart from and in excess of all fees allowed by law for the performance of any duty as circuit court commissioner, &c.

The section in reference to permanent appropriations recites almost the very words of this provision of the statute to which it refers. And then follows a list of the fees which he is to receive as compensation in addition to his compensation as chief supervisor, the fees he is to receive for particular services, such as for filing and caring for every return, report, record, document, &c.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. ATKINS. If the supervisors are not paid out of the permanent fund, will the gentleman cite the law by which they are paid?

Mr. SPRINGER. Unless there have been special appropriations from year to year, all payments to them have been out of funds not appropriated by law, or appropriated for other purposes and diverted to that object.

Mr. ATKINS. Then there is no law to pay them at all.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope not; there never ought to have been.

Mr. ATKINS. There is none except the permanent appropriations.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then follows the other part of the section which relates to the pay of supervisors of elections and special deputy marshals of elections, whose compensation is fixed at the rate of $5 a day. Now "compensation at the rate of $5 a day" does not refer to the fees of supervisors in addition to their compensation as circuit court commissioners and has no relation to them whatever. Therefore I cannot agree with the construction of the gentleman from Ohio on the Appropriations Committee that there is a permanent appropriation for the two supervisors of elections who are appointed, one from each party, to supervise the elections at the polls. But while differing from the gentleman from Ohio in reference to that construction, I shall support the report of this conference committee for the reason that it does, so far as Congress is able to do it by an appropriation bill, meet the requirements of the present situation.

We have, Mr. Speaker, in this bill simply withheld appropriations for a particular purpose. Now, will any person say, will any gentleman on the other side say, that we are compelled to vote appropriations to carry out every law that we may find upon the statute-book? If so, the passage of a general law which involves the expenditure of money also requires Congress at every session held thereafter to appropriate all the money which was originally provided in the first act to carry it out. If that were true, there would be no necessity for the provision of the Constitution which says that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury except in pursuance of appropriations made by law. This provision of the Constitution runs with all existing laws and is over and above them, and it means this, that whatever may be the existing law, no money is to be drawn from the Treasury to carry out that law except in pursuance of appropriations made in the mode provided by law.

Then what becomes of the objections of the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] on the other side of the House, who said that it was unconstitutional to refuse to make this appropriation and that it was a nullification of the existing law to withhold appropriations for a purpose which the majority of this House deems unconstitutional and utterly subversive of the rights and liberties of the people of this country? The gentlemen upon this side of the House believe that the appointment of supervisors and special deputy marshals of elections under existing law is in violation of the Constitution of the United States; and the gentleman from Ohio says that unless we appropriate money for a purpose that we deem against the Constitution and in violation of the Constitution we are nullifying an act of Congress. I never knew before that nullification proceeded from the law-making power and that it was nullification to refuse to vote appropriations under unconstitutional laws that had been passed at previous sessions of Congress. Sir, if that be nullification, we are guilty of it on this side of the House, and gentlemen upon the other side may make the most of it.

We do not make appropriations here upon any conditions that the President shall do this or do that. We make appropriations under our duty, our sworn duty as Representatives. We make them for such purposes as we deem necessary for the good of society, for the protection of the rights and liberties of the people; and we make them no further. If the gentleman's speech is intended to imply that the President will veto this bill, or if he does veto it, he will place himself in the attitude of saying to the majority of Congress, "unless you appropriate money for the purpose for which I demand it, I will not let you have money to run the courts of the country or to carry on the necessary functions of the Government;" he will put himself in the attitude of dictating to the majority of Congress and demanding that we shall do that which we believe to be wrong,

Sir, we will not submit to executive dictation. We have gone as far in the matter of making appropriations as we can go, or will go.

Mr. BAKER. What! never?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Hardly ever.

Mr. SPRINGER. Not hardly ever, but never. We will never appropriate another dollar to pay supervisors and deputy marshals to be present at and control elections. [Applause on the democratic side of the House.]

Mr. CONGER. Never?

Mr. SPRINGER. I answer the gentleman, never.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen desiring to interrupt the member occupying the floor had better rise from their seats. This mode of ejaculation is not in order.

Mr. MCMAHON. I think times have strangely changed, indeed, when upon every offer of an appropriation bill or of legislation intended to furnish money for the support of the Government in either House of Congress some one who seems to be very near to his fraudulency, commonly known by the title of President of the United States, seems to be charged with a special private commission to come upon the floor of the House to tell the Representatives of the people that this gentleman who crept into the Presidency by fraud, and was never elected by the people whose will he intends to thwart, is not going to approve of that which the Representatives of the people desire to have passed. There was a time when even among the gentlemen who represent the party on the other side of the House there were some who regarded such a course of action as indecent and indecorous; but they have progressed in this branch of the public service as in many others. My friend and colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who leads off as the spokesman of the hurler of vetoes, was good enough to tell us that it was unconstitutional to repeal these election laws which were passed as recently as 1872. What a discovery! Our glorious revolutionary fathers and all the fathers of the old whig and democratic parties, even the fathers of the republican party, were therefore guilty of unconstitutional conduct because they never saw fit to pass a law like this pet of radicalism, which all of them would have denounced as corrupting and vicious. It is only modern republicanism which has developed this new constitutional light and brought gentlemen up to this high standard, that we are guilty of unconstitutional conduct if we attempt to repeal their iniquitous laws when we are in a majority in both Houses.

And we are denounced as revolutionists, and then again as nullifiers. What has been the conduct of the gentlemen who talk about our constitutional duties and revile us in this way? Who are they? Gentlemen who a year and a half ago voted in the House for the Bland silver bill, for the free coinage of silver for the benefit of the bullion-holder; and then only a few weeks ago, under the call of the swallow-tailed leader from Michigan, [laughter,] withheld their votes from a more innocent bill, and violated their duties by filibustering for a whole night to prevent a majority of the House from passing a bill. Gentlemen who but yesterday and the day before and for many days have pursued the same improper course in resisting a vote upon the bill of the gentleman from Indiana to prevent office-holders and Government contractors from contributing money to corrupt the people at the polls; a bill innocent on its face, but so dangerous to the republican party that the extraordinary announcement was made that it was the most infamous bill that had ever been offered. Gentlemen who up to this time have resisted in the same way all efforts to repeal the test oath and to enact a uniform and equal law for the drawing of impartial juries in the Federal courts.

Yes, gentlemen, and this is not all. When we offered for your consideration some weeks ago another bill—which may have been extreme in its changes, but was only therefore more beneficial to constituents of gentlemen from the Northwestern States as well as my own—to prevent the removal of causes to the Federal courts from the State courts, we find you again filibustering and refusing to perform your duty for weeks at a time; and as if the whole party had resolved itself into revolutionary practices we find the same thing has taken place under republican lead. I will not say where, for that would be unparliamentary, but it is not more than a thousand miles from where I now speak.

These gentlemen who claim that we are nullifiers and are not obeying the Constitution refuse, upon almost every occasion, to vote and make a quorum, and deny to a majority the right to have a vote upon any bill that does not suit their fancy. Do you call this performing your duty? Are you in a position to read us lectures?

I have here an extract from a speech of my colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD,] made in the closing days of the last Congress, in which he said he was bound in honor not to interpose revolutionary obstacles to the passage of a pending bill, meaning that he had no right to resort to "filibustering." But the gentleman from Michigan, unmindful of the conservative lessons of my colleague, with his wonderful tenacity and his high capacity for leadership, leads the other side of the House into these revolutionary proceedings, notwithstanding that my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] has got the advantage of longer service and otherwise; and it is no disparagement to draw the distinction.

Mr. Speaker, the democratic party is in a majority in both Houses. I want that fact impressed on the mind of the House and of the people, as I said the other day. We represent a majority of the people. We are entitled to rule here. If our laws are bad we are responsible to the people only. Only extraordinary emergencies entitle gentlemen to withhold their votes in a body.

There was an emergency when, under the lead of the gentleman who now occupies the chair, the democratic party was justified, in my judgment and that of the people, in doing so. [Laughter on the republican side of the House.] But to make such contests upon all bills which do not suit gentlemen is only a prostitution of constitutional duty to partisan purposes, and has led to the length of this session.

My colleague expressed great solicitude about the failure of the judicial bill. He betrayed great anxiety about the courts and the prisoners and all that. He threatened us with the dog-star as well as a veto in the same breath. Now, all this solicitude and anxiety can be easily allayed. We have the same feelings as he has. We want the appropriations made for the courts of justice. We have as much, if not more, interest in the speedy administration of justice than gentlemen on that side. We have a million more white voters than they, and must have, therefore, a larger interest in the litigation of the country. We are anxious to have this bill passed; but we propose to show our anxiety in a substantial, honest way. We have voted for every appropriation bill, and we wish to see this one passed. We will vote for it again, as we have done twice. Who is it that does not wish them passed? Men must be judged by their actions, not their words. If this bill does not pass, gentlemen on the other side will be responsible, for I can pledge every vote on this side of the House; and if it does not become a law after it passes both Houses, as it will, it will be the fault of the gentlemen on the other side who have the contract for stiffening that portion of the Executive's membrane commonly called "backbone." The President will sign this bill if you will let him, gentlemen. But one congressional election will be held in this country before the next fiscal year terminates, and that is the election in California.

The Attorney-General asked us, in his estimates, for $20,000 for the employment of special deputy marshals, &c., to control the election. We have declined to furnish him the money, and we decline to permit him to have the power to involve us in an agreement to pay money for such purposes at any future day. We say in this bill that he shall not have this money to spend and he shall not contract for its expenditure. We say this as the representatives of the people who control appropriations and the expenditure of their money. And any interference with our right is an unwarranted assumption of executive power and an attempted interference in our privileges.

I want the gentlemen on the other side to make their record on this question. Let us see if they will vote against this appropriation bill because deputy marshals are not provided for in the election to take place in the State of California. If the people want to judge of our fidelity to the Government they will have an opportunity to do so. They will find the "revolutionists" and "nullifiers," so called, voting in a body to support the Government, and the self-styled loyalists voting in a body to starve the judicial branch of it. They will see that you prefer to carry four Congressmen, or three, or two, or whatever number you can seize upon in California by corrupt means rather than to have the courts open and justice done between the people. Is this your patriotism? Your professions are lip-service only.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MCMAHON. I do not submit to any interruption. You prefer to have no appropriations, to have no courts of justice, no trials, no verdicts, rather than to have a free and fair election in California. We welcome you upon that field of battle before the people of the United States. We invite the conflict; we ask no better issue. We want the people to find out who are the nullifiers, who are those who refuse to perform all their constitutional duties, who are those who say that we shall have no courts unless elections can be controlled, and who prefer that prisoners shall be locked up, (in the dismal language of my distinguished colleague from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,]) that district attorneys shall have no authority to proceed with cases, that marshals shall have no power to carry out the orders of the courts, and that the whole country shall run riot, rather than give up the means of corrupting elections in California. We welcome that contest as one which will forever extinguish your capacity for evil in this country. [Applause on the democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. MONROE. I call for the yeas and nays. We may as well have them ordered now.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 102, nays 81, not voting 103; as follows:

So the report of the committee of conference was adopted.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. HENRY. My colleague, Mr. TALBOTT, is paired with the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. BALLOU.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I decline to vote for this bill because it does not repeal the deputy marshal's election laws.

Mr. BLISS. For the same reason, I decline to vote.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. SMITH, of Georgia. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. WILBER. If he were present, I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. HILL. My colleague, Mr. ATHERTON, is paired with the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. NEWBERRY.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I am paired with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CANNON. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "ay."

Mr. MULDROW. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. DWIGHT. My colleague, Mr. CHALMERS, is paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. VAN VOORHIS.

Mr. ROSS. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. BRIGHAM.

Mr. KENNA. I am paired with the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. YOUNG. If he were present, I should vote "ay;" I presume he would vote "no."

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. My colleague, Mr. KITCHIN, is paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. RICE.

Mr. POEHLER. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. WASHBURN. If he were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. FORNEY. My colleague, Mr. LEWIS, is paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. LORING.

Mr. CALDWELL. My colleague, Mr. CARLISLE, is paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. BAILEY.

Mr. HURD. I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. CLAFLIN. If at liberty to vote, I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman from Maine, Mr. LADD, is paired with his colleague, Mr. LINDSEY. Mr. LADD, if present, would vote "ay."

Mr. MCKENZIE. The gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. POUND, is paired with the gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. DUNN, who, if present, would vote "ay."

Mr. PHISTER. My colleague, Mr. THOMAS TURNER, is absent by leave of the House, and is paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. WHITE. My colleague, Mr. KNOTT, who is absent by reason of sickness, is paired with the gentleman from Maine, Mr. FRYE. My colleagues, if present, would both vote "ay."

Mr. AIKEN. I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. WARD. If he were present, I should vote in the affirmative and he would vote in the negative.

Mr. RICHMOND. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. PRESCOTT. Were he present, I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. LE FEVRE. I am paired with the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. VALENTINE.

Mr. GIBSON. I am paired with the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. HAWLEY. If he were here, I should vote "ay."

Mr. WELLS. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. HISCOCK. If at liberty to vote, I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. My colleague, Mr. CHALMERS, who is paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. VAN VOORHIS, would, if present, vote "ay." My colleague, Mr. MONEY, is paired with the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. STONE, and would, I have no doubt, vote "ay."

Mr. JOHNSTON. My colleague from Virginia, Mr. HARRIS, is paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. CROWLEY.

Mr. ROBINSON. My colleague, Mr. MORSE, is paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. LAPHAM. On all political questions I am paired with the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. TUCKER.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. My colleague, Mr. YOUNG, is paired with the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. KENNA, on all political questions.

Mr. DUNNELL. My colleague, Mr. WASHBURN, is paired with my colleague, Mr. POEHLER.

Mr. BRIGGS. My colleague, Mr. HALL, is paired with the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. SPEER.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. My colleague, Mr. LORING, who is paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. LEWIS, would, if present, vote "no."

Mr. STONE. I am paired with the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. MONEY. If he were present, I should vote "no." The gentleman from New York, Mr. STARIN, is paired with the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. CLARK.

Mr. MCCOOK. My colleague, Mr. EINSTEIN, is paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. O'BRIEN.

Mr. HUMPHREY. My colleague, Mr. POUND, is paired with the gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. DUNN.

Mr. WAIT. My colleague, Mr. MILES, is paired with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SINGLETON, both gentlemen being absent by leave of the House.

Mr. BREWER. My colleague, Mr. NEWBERRY, is paired with the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. ATHERTON.

Mr. BLAKE. My colleague, Mr. ROBESON, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. KETCHAM. I am paired with the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. SMITH.

Mr. FISHER. My colleague, Mr. DICK, is paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. LAY.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman from New York, Mr. MULLER, is paired with the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HEILMAN.

Mr. HUNTON. My colleague, Mr. TUCKER, is paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. LAPHAM; and my colleague, Mr. CABELL, with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. BOYD.

Mr. BUCKNER. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. CHITTENDEN. If he were present, I should vote in the affirmative.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. MCMAHON moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

J. W. POLK.

Mr. SAWYER. I ask by unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to introduce for reference only to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service a resolution of inquiry as to the claim of John W. Polk, late Doorkeeper House of Representatives, for pay of employés advanced by him. At the last session this matter was referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, but the committee failed to complete the work, and this is merely for the purpose of having completed what then was left undone.

Mr. STEPHENS. I cannot yield and must demand the regular order of business.

Mr. SAWYER. This is only for reference to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not object to its introduction for reference.

The resolution was received, and referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

J. RUSSELL BARBEE.

Mr. SHELLEY. I ask by unanimous consent to introduce joint resolution (H. R. No. 105) for the relief of J. Russell Barbee, for passage at this time.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that there shall be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to J. Russell Barbee the sum of $184 for services as special messenger to the Committee on War Claims for the third session of the Forty-fifth Congress.

Mr. SPARKS. I am willing it shall be introduced for reference, but not for action.

Mr. BREWER. I object, if the resolution is to be put upon its passage, although I do not object to its reference. I should like to know whether we are ever to get through with paying the employés of the Forty-fifth Congress. [Laughter.]

The joint resolution was received, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

TRADE-DOLLAR.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the unfinished business coming over from yesterday, being the bill (H. R. No. 913) to provide for the exchange of trade-dollars for legal-tender silver dollars, on which the main question has been ordered.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Does that take precedence over the subject coming from the Committee on Printing which was up just at the adjournment last evening?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's report from the Committee on Printing was allowed to come in by unanimous consent, and not being finished it was cut off by the motion to adjourn. As the main question has been ordered on the trade-dollar bill, it comes up this morning under operation of the previous question and cannot be interfered with.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. When does the unfinished business of last evening come up?

The SPEAKER. The report from the Committee on Printing which was up last evening lost its position by adjournment.

Mr. CONGER. But what about the morning hour, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The reason there is no morning hour at this time is because the main question was ordered and is operating on the bill (H. R. No. 913) to provide for the exchange of trade-dollars for legal-tender silver dollars.

Mr. CONGER. I thought the Chair decided we could not cut off the regular order of business in the morning hour unless under the new rule two-thirds consented thereto.

The SPEAKER. In the decision to which the gentleman refers, as the gentleman will remember, the Chair made a reservation of business coming over on which the main question had been ordered. The Chair has that decision before him and will refer to it. It was called out by a suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan himself. Here it is:

It was clearly the purpose of the House, in the adoption of the amendment to Rule 51, to prevent the cutting off of the morning hour for reports from committees unless by a two-thirds vote the House should assent to such vacation of the morning hour. The words "upon any day for any purpose" are positive and unequivocal terms. The Chair thinks, therefore, that to allow a majority to evade this rule would be contrary to the purpose of the House in the adoption of the amendment cited. Thus to prevent a morning hour for reports from committees at an interlocutory point in the consideration of a bill, or at a point of decision on an interlocutory motion, would violate the said action of the House. Had the main question been ordered, instead of there being a pending demand for the previous question, then the Chair would decide under Rule 132 that the main question must execute itself before entering on the morning hour; but as soon as executed, the morning hour should be at once entered upon, unless, as heretofore, two-thirds should determine to dispense therewith.

The Chair holds, therefore, that the main question having been ordered, it postpones the morning hour until after the execution of the order of the House that the main question shall be put and previous question exhausted, when, of course, the morning hour will begin in regular order.

Mr. CONGER. I thought the previous question only was seconded.

Mr. STEPHENS. The main question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it was agreed to that after certain time allowed for debate the main question should be considered as having been ordered. The Chair will go to the RECORD for that, but in the mean time will have Rule 132 read.

The Clerk read as follows:

132. The previous question shall be in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?"—April 7, 1789. It shall only be admitted when demanded by a majority of the members present—February 24, 1812; and its effects shall be to put an end to all debate, and to bring the House to a direct vote upon a motion to commit, if such motion shall have been made; and if this motion does not prevail, then upon amendments reported by a committee, if any; then—August 5, 1848—upon pending amendments, and then upon the main question.—January 14, 1840.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Just one word. I would like to know my status in this matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no status at present. The Chair recognized the gentleman twice heretofore but the action of the House in both instances cut him off. The Chair will recognize the gentleman again to make reports from the Committee on Printing, which has the right to report at any time, whenever he can do so. The previous question on the trade-dollar bill now prevents.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The question was whether the report should be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman only came in by unanimous consent yesterday and that was vacated by the motion to adjourn. He has to start de novo. The Clerk will read what appears in the RECORD as to the point in controversy on the trade-dollar bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. The understanding now is that two hours shall be allowed for general debate upon the bill, and then the previous question shall prevail on the bill and amendments, notwithstanding the rule, and that the amendments shall be voted upon in the order in which they appropriately come in the bill; and to that understanding the Chair hears no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the order was made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Part of that order, which was clinched, was that the previous question should be prevailing.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is one other question, whether the two hours have been taken up. If they have, then the previous question is ordered. If they have not, then the time has not arrived when the previous question is prevailing. The previous question was not to be considered as pending until after the two hours' debate. If we adjourned before the two hours were up, then the previous question has not been reached yet.

The SPEAKER. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair at the end of the session yesterday. The gentleman from Georgia can answer the question of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the Clerk read just before, what I proposed as the understanding.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEPHENS. I have no objection to the discussion of the bill, but I think two hours is long enough, and I suggest that by common consent we shall agree that the previous question shall be considered as ordered in one hour and three-quarters, and then I will conclude in fifteen minutes; I do not wish to speak longer.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. STEPHENS. That is all I desire to have read at that point. That was my proposition, that the previous question should be considered as ordered in one hour and three-quarters. Now let the Clerk read what I have marked on page 27 of the RECORD, first column.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEPHENS. According to understanding had to-day, after one hour and three-quarters the previous question was to be considered as ordered, and then I was to have fifteen minutes to conclude the debate. The previous question, according to that understanding, is now considered to be ordered.

Mr. STEPHENS. That was said after one hour and three-quarters of the two hours I proposed for debate had been occupied. One hour and three-quarters had been given to other members, some for and some against the bill, and fifteen minutes I reserved to myself. But the previous question was to be ordered after one hour and three-quarters, and that was done yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that at the end of the debate last evening it was announced that the previous question was prevailing.

Mr. STEPHENS. It was.

The SPEAKER. That is the reason why the Chair allowed this to interrupt the morning hour.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman from Georgia being entitled to fifteen minutes this morning.

Mr. STEPHENS. After the ordering of the previous question.

Mr. CLAFLIN. The understanding was that two minutes should be allowed for and two minutes against each amendment.

The SPEAKER. Such debate will come in afterward when the amendments come to be re-read and voted upon. The Chair will recognize that understanding. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman yield to me five minutes?

Mr. STEPHENS. I have promised three minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.] and now yield to him.

Mr. COX. My colleague from New York [Mr. MORTON] made this statement in the remarks which he addressed to the House yesterday:

In February, 1873, when the act was passed authorizing the coinage of the trade-dollar, it was worth a fraction over $1.04 in gold. They were not coined as money or for circulation at home, but for export and as a measure of value in trade as their title indicates. They were, however, made a legal tender for $5 in any one payment; but the people of the Pacific States objected to their circulation, and on the 8th of May, 1876, the distinguished gentleman, now Speaker of the House, introduced a bill repealing the legal-tender quality of these coins.

On the 10th of June, 1876, my distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. COX] reported the measure, and it passed both Houses of Congress without an opposing vote or voice.

I have great respect for my colleague who represents the honorable money of New York. What he says may or may not be correct as to the conclusion of the business which he refers to. Surely he has not studied all that occurred at that time. The repeal of the legal-tender quality of the trade-dollar has not been understood. The business begun then had not the ending suggested. It is, however, the fact that Mr. Speaker RANDALL did introduce a bill for that purpose. It is true also that I did report it back, as chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and that after other vicissitudes it was adopted. The legal-tender quality of the trade-dollar to the amount of $5 was first established by the coinage act of February 12, 1873. What was the reason therefor? Because the trade-dollar was authorized for a special purpose. It was a convenience; not an economical principle. It grew out of the Orient. It was a demand from abroad. It was to be used as a part of our marvelous product. It was silver. It sought, like beef or goods, a market abroad. Its market was in Cathay where its use was almost a romance.

Silver had become disused here in the home arts and in ordinary life. In consequence of our financial distress its value had been depreciated. Not less by its disuse in Europe and its demonetization in this country was it degraded.

It was never intended, Mr. Speaker, that we should have two coins of one denomination as a legal tender, one having 420 and the other 412½ grains. It was intended to prepare the way by the act, for which the Speaker and myself are held accountable, for the old standard dollar of the Constitution and commerce of 412½ grains. The Bland bill accomplished that object, and for this our House voted, amid much reproach. We thus paved the way, by taking away the legal-tender quality of the trade-dollar, for the good old dollar. Confusion became imminent by our having silver dollars of different values but of one and the same denomination. I stated the reasons for the conduct of the committee and House at the time I reported this measure on the 10th June, 1876, as follows:

We have a coin, legalized, of peculiar quality and for a peculiar purpose. In the last section of this bill we propose to discourage the trade-dollar. It answers no wise purpose except for export. There is a reason why our bill should take away from that trade-dollar its legal-tender quality. It is not our standard. Its uses at home are not now as valuable as they were. But for export its demand may continue, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, from time to time, to coin such trade-dollars, so as to fill the export demand. By this all know is meant the demand in our Japanese and Chinese trade.

In a letter which Dr. Linderman, Director of the Mint, wrote to me in June, 1876, he gave his reasons why the trade-dollar should lose its legal-tender quality. I have only time in the three minutes allowed to ask for its insertion.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR OF THE MINT,
June 8, 1876.

SIR:

* * * * * * *

The section relating to the trade-dollar is necessary if its coinage on private account is to be continued, and principally for the reason that under existing laws and the reduced value of silver bullion a seigniorage or gain arises in its coinage, which is realized by the depositor instead of accruing to the Government.

The section, if passed as it now stands, will prevent any person from being compelled to receive this coin at its nominal value, and the provision placing its coinage under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury will enable that officer to restrict the amount of coinage to the actual requirements of the export trade.

In this connection I take the liberty of suggesting that it would be better to coin the trade-dollar exclusively on Government account in the mode proposed and with the powers and functions which a bill now pending in the Senate confers upon a new dollar of the weight of 412.8 grains of standard silver, instead of issuing two silver dollars so near alike in value.

Very respectfully,

H. R. LINDERMAN, Director.

Hon. S. S. COX,
Chairman Committee on Banking and Currency,
House of Representatives.

I quote this in justice to the distinguished Speaker, who introduced the bill, and to the committee who authorized me to report it for passage through the House. This letter is justification enough.

We never intended that silver should be outside of the category of coin. The word "silver" philologically and historically means coin. The word "gold" may mean coin, but silver surely does. It is the historic coin of the ages. It is good coin—is the white metal—either for contracts or commerce. We know who object to it, and their why and wherefore. I believe most humbly in having two metals, not to speak now of paper credits, for our currency. I believe resumption of business, as well as other resumption, demands it.

Why, in going over a stream is it not safer to have two planks to walk upon than one? Should we not prefer two legs instead of one in a walk or race. Bimetallic currency is better than one or none. The bill passed in July, 1876, never proposed to do anything except to prepare the way for the old silver dollar so long known to our laws, commerce, and history.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEPHENS obtained the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] to yield me a moment of his time that I may correct a statement made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MORTON,] and I think I can do it in a minute if he will allow me.

Mr. STEPHENS. If the gentleman has unanimous consent to occupy two minutes before my time commences I have no objection.

No objection was made.

Mr. SPRINGER. The bill to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] referred, and which was introduced by the present Speaker of the House when a member of the Forty-fourth Congress, never became a law and was never heard of after the vote upon it in the House. There was a joint resolution, however, pending in the House during the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, for the purpose of authorizing the coinage of $10,000,000 of subsidiary coins for the redemption of fractional currency. It passed the House. It went to the Senate, and in the Senate the present Secretary of the Treasury, John Sherman, moved the following amendment to it, which was adopted by that body:

SEC. 2. That the trade-dollar shall not hereafter be a legal tender; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to limit, from time to time, the coinage thereof to such an amount as he may deem sufficient to meet the export demand of the same.

It was by this Sherman amendment that a provision demonetizing the trade-dollar got into the joint resolution which finally became a law.

Senators Sargent and BOOTH, from California, explained that the difficulty in reference to this coin was exclusively upon the Pacific coast; that it was an annoyance to the merchants there if a legal tender, and the amendment was adopted by the Senate on their arguments, supplemented by the earnest appeal of Mr. Sherman and the Director of the Mint, Mr. Linderman, whose communication on the subject has been quoted by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

The bill or joint resolution came to the House and we had a square vote upon the Senate amendment, and every gentleman who was a member of the Forty-fourth Congress can examine the RECORD and see how his vote is recorded on that question. I have the RECORD before me. You will remember that on the 28th day of June, 1876, the House took a vote upon concurring in Mr. Sherman's Senate amendment to that section. The yeas were 59 and the nays 108. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and the Speaker of the House and many others whom I see now upon the floor voted against concurring in the Senate amendment. I find my own name recorded in the negative. After this emphatic vote, on motion of the present Speaker of this House, the vote was reconsidered, his purpose, as stated then, being "to move that the House concur with an amendment." The present Speaker then moved to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment which I will not take the time of the House to read. It is printed in the RECORD of June 28, 1876, page 4214, and relates to coinage of subsidiary coins and the purchase of bullion therefor. He yielded to Mr. Landers, of Indiana, who moved as an amendment to the amendment the following:

And it is further provided that the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar of the same weight and fineness in use January 1, 1861, [412½ grains Troy;] and said dollar shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private.

The yeas and nays were taken on the Landers amendment, and it was adopted by a vote of 111 to 55. I call the attention of gentlemen to that record, made in the summer of 1876, during the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, in favor of the unlimited coinage of the old silver dollar and making it a full legal tender. It will be found on page 4214 of the RECORD of that session. The amendment, as amended, was then agreed to—yeas 110, nays 45.

The joint resolution, as thus amended, went back to the Senate, where the House amendments were non-concurred in, and a conference committee was appointed by both Houses; and when the report of that committee came in, there were not a dozen members of this House who knew that it embraced the Sherman section demonetizing the trade-dollar.

Gentlemen will find the report of the committee of conference on page 4550 of the RECORD of July 13, 1876. From a careful reading of the report of the conference committee it could not be discerned that the section demonetizing the trade-dollar was a part of it. It was not discovered until two years afterward that the trade-dollar was demonetized. At that time trade-dollars were as unknown to the people of this country as the Russian "rouble" or the German "mark." We had never seen the coin, but regarded it as a Pacific slope coinage, designed for the Chinese trade. Hence but little importance was then attached to the subject. But upon a square vote in the House the proposition to demonetize the then unknown coin was voted down by two to one.

The report of the committee of conference is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, on the amendments to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the issue of silver coin, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate to said joint resolution, and agree thereto amended as follows:

In line 4 strike out the word "now" and insert "at any time."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the second amendment of the Senate to said joint resolution, and agree to a substitute for said House amendment as follows: Add to the second amendment of the Senate the following:

"SEC. 3. That in addition to the amount of subsidiary silver coin authorized by law to be issued in redemption of the fractional currency it shall be lawful to manufacture at the several mints, and issue through the Treasury and its several offices, such coin to an amount that, including the amount of subsidiary silver coin and of fractional currency outstanding, shall in the aggregate not exceed at any time $50,000,000.

"SEC. 4. That the silver bullion required for the purposes of this act shall be purchased from time to time at market rate by the Secretary of the Treasury, with any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; but no purchase of bullion shall be made under this act when the market rate for the same shall be such as will not admit of the coinage and issue as herein provided without loss to the Treasury; and any gain or seigniorage arising from this coinage shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury, as provided under existing laws relative to the subsidiary coinage: Provided, That the amount of money at any one time invested in such silver bullion, exclusive of such resulting coin, shall not exceed $200,000."

And the House agree to the same.

H. B. PAYNE,
SAM'L J. RANDALL,
Managers on the part of the House.
JOHN SHERMAN,
GEORGE S. BOUTWELL,
LOUIS V. BOGY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The discussion which followed upon the adoption of this conference report in the House was lengthy, covering fourteen pages of the RECORD, not including the speech of Mr. Holman, of Indiana, which was printed in the Appendix. The whole debate related to the coinage of the standard dollar of 412½ grains and other matters than the depriving of the trade-dollar of its legal tender quality—a subject scarcely referred to and not discussed at all. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] then chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, participated in the debate, but he evidently did not know that the concurrence in the conference report embraced a provision demonetizing the trade-dollar. Just before moving the previous question, he said:

I hope the House will vote on the measure pure and simple. It is, a measure for the accommodation of the people between now and December next; that is to pursue the policy begun of issuing silver coin in the place of fractional paper currency for the business of the public, whether North or South, East or West.

The measure was understood to be one of coining and substituting subsidiary coins for fractional currency—nothing more and nothing less.

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, and there were not three members of this House who knew that we were demonetizing the trade-dollar, and we never found it out for nearly two years thereafter.

Mr. SPRINGER. I quite agree with my colleague on the subject. I know I did not know at the time, and did not learn for more than two years thereafter, that we had deprived the trade-dollar of its legal-tender quality. The only occasion upon which that question, during that Congress, was squarely voted upon was the time to which I have referred, and then the RECORD shows that two-thirds of the House were opposed to demonetizing the trade-dollar.

Now I ask that the trade-dollar be put back where it was, or at least that this bill do pass, in order that we shall not have two coins in circulation one of which is a dollar and the other is merely bullion, and between which it would take an expert to tell the difference.

Mr. STEPHENS. I have, Mr. Speaker, but a short time reserved to myself upon this question. I do not think it will take long, however, to set forth its great merits after what has been so well said by several in advocacy of the bill.

I wish in the first place to say in answer to the arguments on either side of the House or elsewhere what this bill does not do, and in the next place what it does do.

In the first place, if my honorable friend from New York [Mr. MORTON] who addressed the House first yesterday will hear me, it is not at all in the interest of the Chinese. It confers no benefit upon the Emperor of the Celestial Empire or his subjects. It confers no benefit on any speculator in bullion. It does no wrong to any mortal man on earth or to any class. It hurts nobody. It may prevent some people dealing in silver and acting as brokers from making profit on their operations. There may be such a class in society who deal in the hard earnings of the poor; it may prevent that class from making gain out of their blood or sweat money which they otherwise would make, but it hurts nobody. It does not hurt the Government.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. MORTON] yesterday intimated that it would cost the Government $3,000,000 more to take up the trade-dollar than to pay for the bullion in this country.

It pays out no money to anybody; it directly benefits the Government. What does this bill say? There are 420 grains of silver in the trade-dollar, and this bill provides that the Government shall exchange it upon presentation for a silver dollar of 412½ grains. By that operation the Government will make 7½ grains upon the dollar. Whom does it hurt; whom does it wrong? I say it wrongs nobody, neither the Government nor any one else.

Now, what does it do? It does two things. It does justice to the people and it vindicates the honor, integrity, and good faith of the Government, which ought to be done. Some gentlemen yesterday spoke of this matter as if the trade-dollar was issued as bullion for China. I was amazed to hear that statement. Issued as bullion! Mr. Clerk, read for me section 3513 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

The silver coins of the United States shall be a trade-dollar, a half dollar ot fifty-cent piece, a quarter dollar or twenty-five-cent piece, a dime or ten-cenr piece——

Mr. STEPHENS. That is enough. That is from the act of 1873. Does that say that the trade-dollar shall be bullion for China? The language of that act is that the trade-dollar shall be one of the silver coins of the United States. And the next clause of that act says that the trade-dollar shall consist of 420 grains of silver. I say that the faith of the country is solemnly pledged by that act, and its stamp is upon every trade-dollar which it has issued. The object of this bill is that the faith of this Government shall be kept. Ought it not to be?

The trade-dollar was declared by law a legal tender for the payment of debts in the sum of $5, just the same as subsidiary silver coins were. There was an obligation on the part of the Government to take them. Since then the trade-dollars have been demonetized. Yet they are afloat in the country, and the honest laborer is receiving them. How the trade-dollar became demonetized the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] have just explained. But the faith of the Government never could be obliterated by that act of demonetization. The statute just read declared, and the faith of the Government is pledged, that the trade-dollar should be one of the coins of the United States.

Now, I am not here to designate anything as a cheat or a fraud. The trade-dollar was demonetized in 1876. I do not know how it was done. But before that time there had been coined and issued several millions of trade-dollars. The faith of the country had been pledged that these millions of trade-dollars should be received in sums of $5 for the payment of debts. All I have to say, all that the friends of this bill say, is that the Government should redeem that pledge, should keep its faith, should take up these trade-dollars and exchange them for other silver dollars of 412½ grains. The Government will make 7½ grains on every dollar by that operation. Whom will it hurt? No one.

Whom will it benefit? It will benefit thehonetst, toiling, laboring millions. There is hardly a class in society that it will not benefit. The merchant, the banker, the shopkeeper, the traders, the laborers; almost every class of the community will be benefited by it. The Government of the United States has issued this coin; it bears upon its face the stamp of the Government. The poor, ignorant laboring-man seeing that stamp of the Government upon it believes that it is a coin of his country, and relying upon that stamp takes it in payment of his debt. When he comes to pay his debts, when he comes to pay his tobacco tax—yes, the poor humble black man who lives as a tenant upon my farm, when he goes to pay his tobacco tax with that trade-dollar which has upon it the stamp of this Government, is refused. Is that not wrong? I do not care who may have this trade-dollar. I am no respecter of persons. Whoever takes it, the honest laborer, the banker, the shopkeeper, the ferryman, whoever takes it should have it redeemed by the Government. That is enough about this bill, except some of the amendments which I wish to refer to.

There are some other things, however, to which I want to refer very briefly. Some gentlemen have argued that if we pass this bill we will have twenty-eight millions of these trade-dollars returned to us from China. By adopting an amendment which is to be offered to the bill, no one need apprehend any such danger. But I am free to say that I wish it would bring back all the millions of trade-dollars that are now in China. It is said there are about twenty-eight millions of them there. I would say to every silver coin afloat with the American eagle on it, "Homeward; we want you."

But how is it going to effect any such result? Do you suppose that a Chinaman will bring over here 420 grains of silver and give it to our Government for 412½ grains? Never—or hardly ever. [Laughter.] The Heathen Chinee is hardly childlike enough for that. He will never do it—or hardly ever. [Renewed laughter.] What! Bring over here from China 420 grains of silver in order to get 412½ grains for it from our Government? No, sir. No, sir. Even the Heathen Chinee will see that that will not pay the expense of the operation.

I wish that could be done. I will tell you that I am not afraid of the silver glut that frightens members so much. I want all the silver that we can get. The trade-dollar is now under discussion I know. But upon the general silver bill, which is now in the other branch of Congress, and which was here before us a short time ago, I will say that I wish we would obtain all the silver bullion in the world possible and coin it into silver dollars.

Then as to the influx of silver from Germany and other countries under our policy. Since we passed the silver bill Germany has changed her policy. The nations of Europe are beginning to see the great error they committed some years ago. I make the prediction here today that in less than six months England, France, Germany, and the Latin states will be striving to rectify the mistake they have committed. There will be a revolution of public sentiment in those countries upon the silver question. That revolution is going on already. Why, sir, as I have said, since we passed the silver bill Germany has changed her policy and refuses to allow any more silver to be sold; so that if we pass this bill we shall not receive that $75,000,000 of silver from Germany which gentlemen anticipated we would be flooded with, and the silver from all the other countries of the world. I have in my hand an editorial of the New York World of a recent date, which I will not read but hand to the reporters to be put in full in these remarks, showing a great revolution going on even in England on this subject. The New York World has, up to a recent date, been opposed to the policy of the silver bill. This is the editorial to which I refer:

THE SILVER QUESTION IN ENGLAND.

When Secretary Evarts advised the appointment of our delegates to the monetary conference of last summer in Paris he cleverly characterized their mission as a "reconnaissance." Such in fact it proved to be, and the result was a report showing that monometallic England held the fort and gave no sign of a wish to parley. A year has not passed and the situation is changed. Many signs show this, but no sign more clearly than a paper written by Mr. Williamson, of the great Liverpool house of Balfour, Williamson & Co., upon the discrediting of silver, in the last number of the Contemporary Review. Mr. Williamson is moved to discourse, not because he has any cherished convictions to maintain, like Cernuschi and the philosophic bimetallists; still less because he thinks the monetization of silver the "burning question" which it has not yet become in England. He writes simply as a man of business who is seeking in a practical way to adjust means to ends. His special end is the revival of British trade, which is undeniably in need of revival. An important and indeed essential means to it, according to him, is the remonetization of silver. Although he admits that overproduction and excessive credits will account for the panic of 1873 and for the depression of the two succeeding years, and although he admits further that competition, particularly that of the United States, has narrowed the market for British products, he insists that neither of these causes will account for the depression of British trade in markets of which Great Britain retains the monopoly. He explains this depression in great part by the demonetization of silver, just as he explains the great extension of commerce which followed the discoveries of gold in California and Australia by the fact of those discoveries. Upon this point Mr. Williamson challenges pretty much the whole of recent economic literature:

"We have in this, our late national experience, a direct contradiction to the theories of some political economists who assert that, after all, international commerce is only barter, and that money has little or nothing to do with its extent or volume. The very small measure of truth underlying this assertion has led many intelligent minds astray. It is because the largely increased supply of money had guaranteed to men and nations the payment of large international balances that the volume of the world's trade, prior to 1874, had augmented with such marvelous rapidity. And now it is in great measure because the world has of late greatly restricted and diminished the capacity of its money reservoir that distress and calamity augment and intensify around us."

The effective metallic capital of the world of late years Mr. Williamson puts at £1,400,000,000, divided not far from equally between gold and silver, or, approximately, into £750,000,000 of gold coins and bullion and £650,000,000 of silver coins and bullion. The lessening of this volume of metallic currency began with the English legislation of 1816 which deprived silver of its legal-tender quality. "For years," he says, "we played upon the currencies of Europe, and often swept away large quantities of silver for transmission to India, where, with an admirable contradiction in our monetary legislation, we have enforced a silver currency. While availing ourselves of the stores of silver belonging to our continental neighbors, we constantly vaunted about the superiority of our gold currency, and stimulated them to follow our short-sighted example." Germany demonetized silver in 1874, and thus put upon France the absolute compulsion under which that nation suspended the free coinage of silver. By this series of acts the metallic currency of the world has been reduced from £1,400,000,000 to £800,000,000 according to Mr. Williamson's estimate, and he expresses his surprise that in the face of this reduction men should be at a loss to account for the greatly reduced interchange of commodities and the greatly reduced prices now paid for property, for goods, and for labor.

Mr. Williamson speaks not for himself alone, be it observed, but for the great commercial community in which he lives. A special committee of inquiry appointed by the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce to consider the silver question has reported the following conclusions:

"First. That the recent shrinkage in value of the world's silver money, measured in gold, is very large, and there is every reason to fear that, with the prospect before us, the depreciation will continue to increase.

"Second. That there has been, besides, much diminution in the value of investments of English capital in the public funds, railways, &c., of silver-using countries.

"Third. That we are now compelled to look upon the silver of the world as in large measure cut off from its previous sphere of usefulness as one of the two agents for the liquidation of international indebtedness.

"Fourth. That the serious diminution of the world's money caused by the disuse of silver may in the future lead to frequent panics through the inadequate supply of gold for the world's wants.

"Fifth. That the uncertainty regarding the course of exchanges in the future largely prevents the further investment of English capital in the public funds of silver-using countries or in railways, industrial enterprises, and commercial credits.

"Sixth. That the friction and harassment now attending business with silver-using countries, as India, China, Java, Austria, Chili, Mexico, and others, naturally lead merchants to curtail their operations in the export of our manufactured goods and to restrict the employment of English capital in such business.

"Seventh. That this is a most serious question for India, which many believe to be so impoverished as not to be able to bear increased taxation.

"Eighth. That the depreciation of silver seriously affects the power of silver-using States to purchase English manufactures and leads to increased taxation, thus further curtailing the trade which has hitherto been carried on in English commodities."

In two additional resolutions the committee assert that the fall in silver is attributable to the suspension of free coinage in France, which in turn was produced by demonetization in Germany; and that the bimetallic system of France and the Latin union before 1875 tended to give stability to all exchanges between England and silver-using countries.

Mr. Williamson's conclusion will be clear enough from our statement of his premises. It is, of course, that silver should be remonetized by an international agreement between England, France, the states of the Latin union, the United States, and India, and he discusses both the practical and the theoretical difficulties in the way of this remonetization. He finds the practical difficulties in the asserted reluctance of the English people to change their currency, and the theoretical in the objections of the monometallic economists. As to the first, Mr. Williamson denies that English opinion is so obstinate as to be really opposed to a change in the currency, if good grounds can be shown for it; and declares that the press, led by the late Mr. Bagehot and the Economist, has misrepresented that opinion. But for the assumption which the press has encouraged that the English people are opposed to a change which they have never even considered, Mr. Williamson insists that the instructions to the delegates from Great Britain to the monetary conference at Paris not to take part in any vote which would call in question the maintenance of a single gold standard would never have been issued. In that case the conference might have been more than a mere reconnaissance. He insists also that a continuance of the present distress in England will rapidly bring recruits to the bimetallists. He reports the saying of one of the British deputies to the Paris conference, that he found in the city "much less opposition to the restoration of silver than he had expected," and cites the report of Mr. Griffen, the statistician of the board of trade, that while the yield both of gold and silver is diminishing, that of gold is diminishing in the more marked degree. This fact has induced Mr. Griffen himself to deprecate the further disuse of silver. The yield of gold and silver from America last year was precisely the same in value—$37,000,000 of each—and the curious fact is noted that the ore of the Nevada mines yields at the rate of fifteen or sixteen ounces of silver to one of gold, or in the ratio established by the Latin union between the two metals.

The more important of the objections to the remonetization of silver with which Mr. Williamson deals are that it is beyond the prerogative of nations to fix a ratio of exchange between the two metals; that the establishment of a ratio, with unlimited legal tender for both metals, may wrong creditors, since debtors will always pay with the cheaper money; that the double standard is an arbitrary and artificial arrangement, and that the volume of currency is a matter of supply and demand, to interfere with which would violate a principle of free trade. To these objections, familiar enough on our side of the water, it is answered that nations have as much right to choose two metals for money as to choose one, and that there is no way of using both without fixing a ratio; that this ratio once fixed by all the great commercial nations would remain constant, since even the ratio adopted by the nations of the Latin union alone has prevented any violent oscillations; that consequently neither metal would be cheaper and neither dearer than the other, and the creditor could not be put at a disadvantage; that all legal-tender or currency laws or limitations are arbitrary and artificial in the same sense as the establishment of a ratio, and that the question is distinctly not one of "supply and demand," but simply one of law.

These are the opinions of an intelligent English man of business. They have a particular interest for Americans, as showing that the silver question is now coming to be considered abroad, as we have steadily urged that it should be considered here, not from the point of view of "inflation" or "expansion" or "contraction," still less from the point of view of senatorships or presidencies, but simply and altogether as a question of business vital to the welfare of the masses of civilized mankind.

Now, Mr. Speaker, five or six years ago there were in the world about $8,000,000,000 of metal money—gold and silver—which have been the money of the world from a period long anterior to Herodotus, long anterior to Grecian history—which were the money of the world even long before the time of the patriarchs. Of these $8,000,000,000 of metal money $4,500,000,000 were silver, the rest gold. What was done by those nations that demonetized silver? At one fell swoop they deposed from its functions more than half of the metal money of the world. Then began monetary revolutions. What has been our business history since the United States adopted the policy? Why, sir, the first year following demonetization there were upward of seven thousand failures in this country with upward of $200,000,000 of liabilities; the next year upward of nine thousand of the sturdiest houses in the country failed with near $200,000,000 of liabilities; the next year there were upward of eight thousand failures with near $200,000,000 liabilities; and the last year ten thousand failures and upward with a still larger amount of liabilities, over $200,000,000.

From 1874 until the close of last year thirty-six thousand houses, considered the stanchest in the country, failed with liabilities amounting to over $800,000,000—almost one-third of the public debt of the United States. What was the cause of this? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] entertained us the other day with an interesting description of a scene that he witnessed on the Ohio River of a hay-stack with a dog fast asleep upon it floating down the river, while the dog was totally unconscious of the flood or his danger. It seems to me that many people of this country are floating down upon this tremendous tide of ruin, and are just as unconscious as that sleeping pointer, setter, terrier, hound, or cur as to what has happened. [Laughter and applause.] I do not know whether the dog in question was a pup or a grown-up dog; but they say, and I believe it is true, that it takes a pup nine days to get its eyes open. Some people, who are going down upon this flood with their eyes closed, may require nine years to get their eyes open; but they will see the truth after a while. A large part of the cause of these disasters was the striking down as currency of more than half of the real money of the world.

But it is said we must await the action of European nations. This is what we were told yesterday. Sir, I predict a change in the policy of European nations in this regard. I venture to predict that by the next meeting of this Congress there will be such a tide in favor of what is known as our silver bill that it will sweep everybody in this country, pretty much as the haystacks were swept down the Ohio River.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEPHENS. I trust I may be allowed a few moments more——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is aware that members desire to hear the gentleman from Georgia, and he will proceed if no gentleman objects. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Speaker, I say as an American that for us to await the action of a European conference upon the change of the relative values of gold and silver is chimerical. Why, sir, we have a debt which will forever prevent it. We have a debt of over $2,200,000,000 which by the terms of the contract is to be paid in coin of the standard value existing at the time the debt was contracted. At that time the gold dollar contained 25.8 grains and the silver dollar 412½ grains. Now, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCLANE] said yesterday that he was in favor of bimetallic money. Nearly everybody on the other side of the House has said the same. Now, if we are to have bimetallic money, that is, if we are to have both silver and gold as money, this standard must be preserved. We cannot change the silver dollar. Suppose we increase it as was proposed by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KIMMEL] to 460 grains. That would increase the public debt about 11 per cent. and virtually add over two hundred million dollars increase on the public debt. I have not made out exact figures. Suppose the silver dollar should be increased to 485 grains, as another gentleman [Mr. GARFIELD] suggested; that would be an increase of the public debt to the extent of 19 per cent., or over $400,000,000, with an annual increase of interest of about $16,000,000. Can this country do anything like that? We must consider it as a fixed, immutable fact that we cannot increase the silver dollar until at least the public debt is discharged. That debt must be discharged, every dollar and every cent of it, in good faith according to the contract. The standard silver dollar when that contract was made was 412½ grains. Therefore I say it would be chimerical for us to join in any European monetary conference to change the present standard of the legal-tender dollar of the United States. Such a proposition is preposterous.

Mr. MCLANE. Do I understand the gentleman from Georgia to say that because the existing debt of the country is to be paid in coin at the standard value when the debt was contracted, therefore this country cannot under any circumstances regulate by its legislation the relative value of gold and silver coin?

Mr. STEPHENS. It cannot without the consent of the parties to the contract.

Mr. MCLANE. I understand the contract with the bondholder to be that the bondholder shall receive his payment in coin of that standard, and that the contract shall be respected; but do I understand the gentleman from Georgia to say if through the fluctuation of either metal it became necessary in order to keep the two coins in harmony that we are deprived of the right to do it by law? Does not the contract with the bondholder remain still good, although we may change the value of our standard coin?

Mr. STEPHENS. It does not, because the contract is "coin according to the then standard."

Mr. MCLANE. To pay according to the then standard?

Mr. STEPHENS. In the coin of the then standard.

Mr. MCLANE. Does that interfere with the right of the nation in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States and in view of its general trade and commerce to alter the relative value of its gold and silver coin when and how it pleases?

Mr. STEPHENS. It does so far as the bondholder is concerned unless he consents.

Mr. MCLANE. So far as the bondholder is concerned?

Mr. STEPHENS. Yes. By our contract we can pay in either silver or gold at the then standard. We of course have the right to pay in silver at 412½ grains to the dollar, and the bondholder is required to take it. Now, then, to proceed——

Mr. MCLANE. I have no issue with the gentleman on that point. I am sorry to interrupt him, but I presume he would not have it go to the country we are through all time prevented from adjusting the relative value of gold and silver, whether it may be to raise the silver or to depress the gold I care not for the moment. And I do not think the gentleman from Georgia means to assert we have deprived ourselves of the constitutional right to regulate the value of gold and silver coin. If he does, I with all due submission differ from him in toto.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Speaker, so long as you have an anterior creditor you cannot do it either in justice to your own people or to your creditor. You cannot diminish the value of gold without injustice to the creditor and you cannot increase the silver without detriment to your own people.

Mr. MCLANE. I have no issue with the gentleman from Georgia.

as to our obligation to the bondholder. Our obligation to the bondholder is complete and perfect. In the answer which I gave to the gentleman from New York yesterday in reference to the increase of the standard value of the silver dollar or the decrease of the standard value of the gold dollar, I had no idea of questioning that; but the general absolute right at all times to regulate the value of the gold and silver coin is the constitutional right of this country which no law of Congress can interfere with, and which was exercised by law in 1834 in decreasing the value of the gold coin for the reason that it had lost its proper relative value to the silver coin, that mode of regulating the value being thought wiser and more expedient at that time than to increase the value of the silver coin—the mode being exclusively in the discretion of the law-making power, which naturally would be exercised with reasonable judgment and perfect good faith.

Mr. STEPHENS. That regulation was right and proper when there was no debt, but it cannot be done in reference to antecedent debts unless you repudiate or the creditor shall consent to the decrease of the more valuable metal, as was done with gold in 1834. I concur in what the gentleman from Maryland said on that point yesterday.

Mr. McLANE. The gentleman from Georgia certainly understands me to exclude the obligation of our debt.

Mr. SPRINGER. You are together.

Mr. STEPHENS. We are right together, then on that basis——

Mr. McLANE. The gentleman from Georgia must not put me in the position of taking any stand here which repudiates our debt.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then we are together entirely, as I understand the gentleman.

Now, then, I shall come to the point. If with the consent of the creditor the gold coin can be reduced while it is up, we have the right to do it because we can pay to the creditor in silver coin. We have the right to do it, according to the contract.

Next as to the question of the great difference between gold coin and silver bullion. That is the bugbear throughout the whole controversy; it is all in reference to the present price of silver bullion. Some gentlemen said our bill (the silver bill that passed the House the other day) was in favor of the bullionists; that it was a speculation of the bullionists. On this view I wish now to make a few remarks. Why is it, Mr. Speaker, that there is a discrepancy between the silver dollar, the trade-dollar, and the gold dollar to-day? That is the great question. My own opinion is if we pass this bill to-day and our silver bill passes the Senate six months will not elapse, ninety days will not elapse, before they will be about as near together as they ever were before. What brought silver down? You degraded it. You deprived it of its money quality, its debt-paying power. You left it purely as a commodity passing for its intrinsic worth. Silver, when it was demonetized, when it was thus degraded, was 2 or 3 per cent. above gold.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Will the gentleman from Georgia answer the question why it is an object for anybody to demonetize silver?

Mr. STEPHENS. I cannot imagine, or at least I can assign no rational motive for it. The fact is that Europe led off in it in the interest perhaps of some of the money-holders; this country followed, and the moment you struck down one-half of the metallic money of the world from the functions it served, you naturally enhanced the other more than double. Government creditors may for this reason have induced it; I do not know——

Mr. CLAFLIN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. STEPHENS. Wait a moment. If you have four hundred houses in a town to rent and you strike off two hundred, the other two hundred will raise more than four times the amount. And when you have a certain amount of money in the world and you strike half of it off you enhance the value of the other half more than four times.

Mr. CLAFLIN. But the gentleman does not give us the reason; he merely gives us the result. Taking his own premises now, I will ask him to state to the House the reason which induced the German government and the Latin union to discontinue the coinage of silver.

Mr. STEPHENS. It would be hard for me or any other rational man on this earth to account for the reasons of legislation or the follies of legislation in Germany or even in this country. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLAFLIN. I think as a rule legislation is based on reason.

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not know what was the reason, but I do know what has been the result. Ruin! ruin! continued ruin! and every year it is getting deeper and deeper. [Applause.] Next year will be worse than this if we do not do something to arrest the downward progress.

Mr. WEAVER. And yet they resist remonetization.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Will the gentleman allow me one moment?

Mr. STEPHENS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAFLIN. While the gentleman was stating the reasons, I wished to know if he had the reasons in his mind rather than the results? Now, as I have stated, governments do not do these things without deep, solid, and sound reasons. The German government must have had a reason for discontinuing the use of silver. The Latin union must have had reasons. But I do not wish to take the gentleman's time or tax his strength.

Mr. STEPHENS. Go on.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I simply wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that these things were not done without reason. It is very well to say they were done in the interest of bondholders; but the whole of the governments of Europe which are in debt do not do these things for the benefit of bondholders. The bondholders may make some efforts and may have some reasons, but the reasons lie deeper than are stated by the gentleman, in my opinion. The reasons lie in the great production of silver on the one hand—I will answer so much—and in the next place in the disuse of it to a certain extent by the government and by the people of India, who are the great consumers of silver. They ceased to take silver from England and from France. I think that must be patent to every gentleman's mind. Another reason——

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not want the gentleman to ask too much at once. I wish to answer the gentleman so far as he has gone, and will then hear him again.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. STEPHENS. I will first answer the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CLAFLIN.] I have stated I do not know what reasons actuated the German government and the Latin union. They may be what the gentleman supposes. But I do know that we should not follow their example when they are already retracing their course. No, sir. I have referred to a paper before me, showing that in England as well as in Germany and in all Europe, whether these men are influenced by correct reasons, or governed and led on by some ignis fatuus I do not know. It is enough for us to know they are changing their course and we should follow them no longer.

Mr. CLAFLIN. And yet in the English Parliament the other day Mr. Goshen, who is the great mouth-piece of financial circles in England, said England was not going to change her position.

Mr. WARNER. And at the same time Mr. Lowe proposes to substitute legal-tender paper in India for silver.

Mr. CLAFLIN. He said the reasons for England's changing her position had passed away, and among the reasons given was the demonetization of silver in the United States.

Mr. STEPHENS. The gentleman to whom my friend from Massachusetts refers may not be a party man and yet he may not be the leader of thought. When England has had ministers who held out for a time they have had to yield to public sentiment, the enlightened sentiment of the country as expressed through the press, the reviews, and otherwise. The intellect of England is now being moved and stirred up and it is all set against the continuance of that policy, as will be seen from this paper referred to. I will now hear my friend from New York, [Mr. MORTON.]

Mr. MORTON. I understood my friend from Georgia to express the opinion that within six months after the passage of this bill the bullion value of the standard silver dollar will rule between 2 and 3 per cent. of that of the gold dollar. Am I right?

Mr. STEPHENS. Yes; and the passage also of the silver bill which is now in the Senate. I said it would rise within 2 and 3 per cent., not of the bullion value but of the real bona fide gold value; up almost to an equality with it.

Mr. MORTON. Then how does the gentleman, in view of the coinage of some thirty-four millions of standard silver dollars within the past sixteen months, explain the fact that the gold value of the silver dollar has fallen from ninety-two or ninety-three cents, which was its value at the time it was authorized, to eighty-four cents, its value thirty days ago?

Mr. STEPHENS. You mean the value of bullion.

Mr. MORTON. The bullion in the silver dollar was worth ninety-two or ninety-three cents when the dollar was authorized. That was its value in gold. Within thirty days its value has been under eighty-four cents. How does the gentleman account for that?

Mr. STEPHENS. Do you mean the value of silver bullion?

Mr. MORTON. I mean the value of the bullion in the dollar of 412½ grains.

Mr. STEPHENS. Not the value of the silver coin?

Mr. MORTON. No; because the Government has so far been able to maintain it at par in gold.

Mr. STEPHENS. You speak only of uncoined silver bullion. Pass the free-coinage bill, and silver bullion would soon rise to a point nearly equal to the coinage value. Silver bullion sold four days ago in London 52½ per cent. higher than it had been for a year.

Mr. MORTON. I grant that.

Mr. STEPHENS. The silver dollar when it was struck from the list of money was 2 or 3 per cent. premium. It and bullion fell when they were degraded by law. It was because you had degraded, had demonetized it that it went down.

Mr. MORTON. I agree with the gentleman. In my judgment the cause of the advance in the price of silver is in consequence of some anticipated arrangements to be made by and with the leading powers of Europe.

Mr. STEPHENS. That exactly shows what has been the fact in Europe of what we have been doing in this country. That is my interpretation of it. Now the gentleman from New York speaks of the fact that we had coined $36,000,000 since the Bland bill passed while we now have only a little over $181,000 in circulation.

Mr. MORTON. The amount is about $34,000,000, and about $7,000,000 of the $34,000,000 are in circulation.

Mr. STEPHENS. And he asks, if there is any great demand for silver coins why do the people not go and get them? They are in the Treasury.

Now, I have stated upon this floor before, and I repeat it now, what we want is not coin for circulation, either gold or silver. We have lived beyond that age in civilization. We want representative paper money instead of coin or that which is equivalent to coin. The people want coin certificates. They want when they receive a paper dollar to know that there is a silver or a gold dollar in the vaults of the Treasury of the Government to meet it dollar for dollar. That is what we want, and hence if we get all the bullion from Europe we can and all from our own mines and put it all into coin the people do not want the coin, they want a true representative of it. They want to know that there is a dollar in coin or its equivalent in the Treasury for every dollar that they have in their pockets in paper money.

Mr. McGOWAN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is now proceeding. The gentleman from Georgia asked permission to proceed with his remarks. That entitles him to one hour if he chooses to occupy it.

Mr. McGOWAN. The gentleman asked for only a few minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS. My time is unlimited except by the hour rule and so long as the House seems to be willing to hear me. I wish to say only a few things more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was permitted to proceed with his remarks without any restriction. That means he is entitled to one hour.

Mr. McGOWAN. I should have objected to that arrangement if I had known that the gentleman was to occupy an hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot help that.

Mr. STEPHENS. How many minutes have I been speaking beyond the fifteen minutes?

The SPEAKER. Twenty minutes.

Mr. FIELD. About six months' trade with China would take away all the trade-dollars we have in circulation.

Mr. STEPHENS. I answer that the people of China would not take in lieu of a dollar of 420 grains one of 412½ grains. What would they do it for? All that the bill secures is that the trade-dollars of 420 grains shall be exchanged for a dollar of 412½ grains. The provisions of the bill are that the trade-dollar shall be taken up and be exchanged for legal-tender silver dollars.

Mr. FIELD. But you will send them to China for the purchase of merchandise if the trade goes on as it has done in the past.

Mr. STEPHENS. No, for we stop their coinage. But if they did, you ought not to complain.

Mr. FIELD. It would only stop coinage and let the Chinese trade take what we have already got in circulation.

Mr. STEPHENS. This bill stops the coinage of the trade-dollar. It provides for taking up all those which are now in the country, and which are producing so much distress among the people, and on account of which they ask relief.

A very few words more only. There is one other subject to which I wish to allude, and that is the opposition that was made to the silver bill which passed the House some time ago, on account of the profit that the bullion-holders would make by bringing in the silver bullion to be converted into coin. It was said that the amount of bullion in a silver dollar of 412½ grains was worth eighty-five cents, and the bullionist would make fifteen cents profit on each dollar. I know that many honest people opposed that bill on that ground. We changed the bill in that particular. But if the Senate should restore it as it was at first reported to the House I should like it better. Suppose the miner should make fifteen cents on every dollar of his bullion, would that hurt anybody?

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEPHENS. Certainly.

Mr. MARSH. If the Government should make fifteen cents on the dollar, would that help anybody?

Mr. STEPHENS. Not much; neither the Government nor anybody else. The Government makes by whatever adds to the prosperity of the country. Suppose that there were one hundred million dollars' worth of silver bullion, and that we had unlimited free coinage, which I am in favor of, but which the bill that we passed the other day does not exactly carry out. Suppose that the owners of that bullion should make fifteen cents on every dollar's worth of it, who would be hurt? That is the question. Would the Government be hurt? No. The Government would convert it into silver coin and issue it or certificates for it. The Government would lose nothing, though the bullionist would make 15 per cent. on that amount. That would add so much to the general wealth of the country. Who would be injured? Nobody. The bullionist would be benefited. Who else would be benefited? Every man who owned a dollar of real property in this country would be benefited by it by a rise in his property.

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him another question?

Mr. STEPHENS. Certainly.

Mr. MARSH. Would not the silver dollar be worth just as much in the hands of the laboring-man if the Government should make the difference between the bullion value and the legal-tender value, instead of the bullionist or the miner making it?

Mr. STEPHENS. Just as much, every bit, and no more. But I would offer an inducement for the coinage of silver bullion. We want the bullion; we want the silver; we want the money. Hence, as I said awhile ago, I would call out, "Ho! every man who has silver bullion, bring it to this country and have it coined." We want to offer an inducement to bring it here. That is the difference, and a very wide one. If we give an inducement of fifteen cents profit on the dollar, then the holders of the silver bullion from all countries will bring it here, not otherwise; and our own miners will have a new impulse given to their energy and industry.

Mr. MARSH. Does the gentleman think it necessary for the Government to give the holders of the bullion 15 per cent. profit in order to induce them to bring their bullion here for coinage?

Mr. STEPHENS. We give them nothing; we do not give them that profit. They make it. Let me illustrate: Some years ago there was a great drought in my section of the State of Georgia. Corn was scarce, and it went up to $1.75 a bushel. A few holders of the corn were making a great profit on it. An enterprising young man in my town got together a sum of money, say, for illustration, $3,000, went up to Indiana or Illinois, or some place out West, and bought corn at I think about sixty cents a bushel. The freight and expense upon that corn was such that, laid down in the village where he lived, it cost him one round dollar a bushel. He offered it for sale at a dollar and twenty-five cents a bushel, and in thirty days made 25 per cent. upon his investment. But every man in the country that was buying corn made fifty cents on the bushel by that operation. Who was injured by it? Nobody but the corn-holders. So in this case. The bullionists might by enterprise make at least 15 per cent. and all be benefited but the gold-holders.

Mr. MORTON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. STEPHENS. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. If we pass this free coinage bill, I will tell the gentleman what he can do. He can borrow $100,000 of his banker, take $85,000 or $90,000 of that amount, whatever may be required to buy silver bullion enough to make one hundred thousand silver legal-tender dollars. Then he could take that bullion across the street, obtain for it a certificate of deposit, return to his banker, and with that certificate of deposit pay the $100,000 that he borrowed and keep $10,000 or $15,000 in his pocket. And he could continue that operation as long as he chose.

Mr. STEPHENS. Just as long as bullion was at eighty-five cents that, sir, would be making the profit I speak of; and whom would he hurt? Why, sir, that young man who went West and bought corn made 25 per cent. in thirty days, and he benefited everybody, who was buying corn in that country, at the rate of fifty cents a bushel. Whom did it hurt? It hurt those men who had been hoarding corn and selling it at $1.75 a bushel, because they had then to come down and sell it for a dollar and twenty-five cents. The enterprising young man made money on his capital, and the public was greatly benefited at the same time. He made in the same way and perhaps did repeat his operation several times while corn remained scarce.

And so it would be with the bullionist. He would make a profit, and that would add to the public as well as his own wealth. That is all I intended to say on that subject. I would have voted for unlimited free coinage, because I want an inducement offered for the production of silver. I want this vast industry of ours which is now being developed, silver mining, to present such an inducement that men will work the mines and bring forward the product for coinage. I do not care how much they make, whether it is 15 per cent. or 20 per cent. or 50 per cent., if the public is being benefited at the same time. All they make will be so much added to the wealth of the country.

Mr. WARNER. With the permission of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] I would like to ask the gentleman from New York——

Mr. McGOWAN. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McGOWAN. My point of order is that time was granted to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] to speak, and not to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia, as the Chair presumed, yielded for a question.

Mr. McGOWAN. No, sir; the gentleman from Georgia was making a speech, and the gentleman from Ohio undertakes in the time of the gentleman from Georgia to make a speech in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MORTON.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York was allowed by the gentleman from Georgia to ask a question, and the gentleman from Ohio was allowed to reply to what the gentleman from New York said. The Chair thinks it was not an unusual mode of debate, the gentleman from Georgia having yielded to both gentlemen.

Mr. WARNER. Under free coinage no such transaction as the gentleman from New York supposes could take place. The borrower could not then buy with eighty-five cents a dollar any more than he can now. He will have to give one hundred cents for what will pay a hundred cents.

Mr. MORTON. I differ with the gentleman entirely.

Mr. MARSH. When the gentleman from New York speaks of the free-coinage bill, what does he mean?

Mr. MORTON. I understood the gentleman from Georgia to be discussing the bill which was before the House a few weeks ago, the free-coinage feature of that bill as originally introduced, not as passed.

Mr. McGOWAN. I raise the point of order whether this is legitimate discussion under the leave granted to the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has answered that question. The floor is under the control of the gentleman from Georgia, and if he yields, the Chair has no right to interfere.

Mr. McGOWAN. Certainly the point of order will lie that gentlemen are not discussing the bill under consideration, and have gone off to another bill.

The SPEAKER. It is impossible for the Chair to draw such a distinction as that in reference to arguments which gentlemen may employ. The gentleman from Georgia will proceed without interruption.

Mr. STEPHENS. I will proceed but a few moments longer.

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman allow me a single question?

Mr. STEPHENS. Yes, sir; with pleasure.

Mr. FORT. Does the gentleman believe that if this bill should pass, any considerable amount of trade-dollars will come in for redemption? Does he not think that the trade-dollars will immediately rise to par, and will float as currency in the same way as a legal-tender note floats?

Mr. STEPHENS. I do think so if we vote down the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FISHER.] That is the next topic to which I wish to refer. I prefer the bill pure and simple.

Mr. FISHER. I did not understand the remark of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. STEPHENS. I said in answer to the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] that the trade-dollar would rise to par if your amendment should not be adopted. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. FISHER. I understood that the object of the bill was to do away with the trade-dollar—to recoin it.

Mr. STEPHENS. It is. I am only stating what I think will be the immediate effect of the bill on the trade-dollar—it will bring it to par at once, or near it. I want the trade-dollars taken up and recoined. Still, if restored to par they will be slow in coming in.

Mr. FORT. One argument against the bill is that it will cost so much to redeem these trade-dollars, and there are very few of them in the country.

Mr. STEPHENS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have a few words to say upon the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FISHER] and that of my other colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER.] To the latter amendment I shall offer no objection, though I would prefer to have the bill pass without it. One part of that amendment, the provision that the Secretary of the Treasury shall not count the legal-tender dollars to be issued under this bill as a part of the $2,000,000 to be coined monthly under existing law, is covered, I think, by the bill itself. The other object of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is to exclude the Chinese "chopped" dollars; but I do not think those will ever come in at any rate. The amendment of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FISHER,] limiting the time within which this redemption shall take place, I am opposed to. The other amendments amount to little or nothing. With these remarks I conclude what I have to say, thanking the House for its indulgence.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FISHER,] which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the words "United States," in the fifth line, the words "for the period of four months from and after the passage of this act," so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be exchanged at the Treasury and at all sub-treasuries of the United States for the period of four months from and after the passage of this act, legal-tender dollars for trade-dollars, at par, &c.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FISHER] is entitled, according to the agreement, to two minutes to discuss his amendment.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, I offered this amendment in order to perfect the bill and carry out what I understand to be its object. It simply proposes to do justice to our own people. The fact exists that we have from five to six millions of these trade-dollars in circulation throughout the United States. This bill was introduced ostensibly for the relief of our people, and to do away with the complaint in regard to this form of currency. Now, the foreigners who hold twenty-eight millions of these trade-dollars, or such portions of this amount as have not been remelted, have received the full value. Yet this bill without amendment proposes that the United States shall receive these dollars and give in exchange legal-tender dollars to these foreigners or to American speculators in the trade-dollar.

My amendment limiting the period of redemption to four months is designed to give sufficient time to all the people of this country to present trade-dollars at the sub-treasuries for redemption and at the same time to preclude the presentation for redemption of such of these coins as are now held in foreign countries.

If this amendment is adopted, we answer the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MORTON] that this is a bill in the interest of the Emperor of China. I am surprised to hear the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] say that he opposes this amendment. It cannot be affirmed that the amendment is not in the interest of the poor men of this country, because it shuts out the trade-dollars held in foreign countries. In the desire of the gentleman to pile up silver in this country without regard to the price paid for it, he is willing to give 10 per cent. more for $30,000,000 of silver than the bullion can be bought for in open market.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARNER. I hope this amendment will not be adopted. The reason will be just as good four months hence for taking up a coin that bears the stamp of the Government—the certificate of the United States that it is a dollar—as now. I say the same reason for exchanging this trade-dollar for a legal-tender dollar will exist then that exists now, and therefore this amendment I think ought not to be adopted. Why, sir, the people on the borders of the Western States will hardly have time, if they knew it, to send their dollars to the Treasury for exchange, and it is mainly in the Western States that the trade-dollar is in circulation.

The question recurred on Mr. FISHER'S amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 89.

Mr. FISHER. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. WARNER. Oh, no.

The House divided; and there were ayes 13, not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment, therefore, was disagreed to.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.]

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 5 strike out the words "silver dollars" and insert "Treasury notes," so, if amended, the bill will read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be exchanged at the Treasury and at all sub-treasuries of the United States legal-tender Treasury notes for trade-dollars, at par.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is entitled to two minutes on his amendment.

Mr. MILLS. I do not desire to discuss it.

The SPEAKER. By the sound the noes appear to have it.

Mr. MILLS. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Silver-tender Treasury notes are not known to the law.

Mr. BAKER. Why does not the gentleman say legal-tender Treasury notes?

Mr. MILLS. It does say so.

Mr. BAKER. No; we understand it to say silver legal-tender Treasury notes.

Mr. MILLS. No; it says legal-tender Treasury notes.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is no such thing as legal-tender Treasury notes, but there are legal-tender United States notes.

Mr. MILLS. The language of my amendment is perfectly right, and I will let it stand as it is.

Mr. BAKER. It says United States legal-tender notes.

Mr. MILLS. It is right as it is.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The vote next recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. DEERING.]

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "par," in line 6 of the bill, insert:

Provided, The weight of said trade-dollars has not been reduced below the standard weight and limit of tolerance provided by law for the single piece.

So that, if amended, the bill will read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be exchanged at the Treasury, and at all sub-treasuries of the United States, legal-tender silver dollars for trade-dollars, at par: Provided, The weight of said trade-dollar has not been reduced below the standard weight and limit of tolerance provided by law for the single piece.

Mr. WARNER. That question is already covered by the law. I see no objection to it, however, if there is any doubt on the subject.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands, although not in the chair at the time, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LOUNSBERY] entered a motion to refer this bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency. If that be correct, it is not cut off by the previous question being seconded, and the question will now be put.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 44, noes 106.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. WARNER. I ask for a vote on my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill these words:

Provided, That trade-dollars recoined under this act shall not be counted as part of the coinage of silver required by the act of February 28, 1878: And provided further, That trade-dollars that have been "chopped" or restamped for circulation in China or other foreign countries shall be excluded from the provisions of this act.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call for a division of the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. What is the law to which my colleague from Ohio refers?

Mr. WARNER. The coinage law of 1878.

Mr. GARFIELD. The one that limits coinage?

Mr. WARNER. The Bland bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does this remove the limitation contained in that bill?

Mr. WARNER. The recoinage of trade-dollars will be in addition to the coinage provided for under the act of 1878. There are five or six million, it is estimated, of these trade-dollars in partial circulation—a sort of quasi circulation—in this country, and I am opposed to any contraction whatever of our metallic circulation.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will there be any contraction if legal-tenders are put in the place of the trade-dollars taken up?

Mr. WARNER. There will be. The law now requires the coinage of at least $2,000,000 per month. That is, the future coinage must be not less than two millions a month independent of the present circulation. These trade-dollars, to the extent they circulate, amounting to five or six millions, are part of the existing circulation. If they were made a part of the two-million coinage, required by law now per month, there would be contraction to the extent trade-dollars were taken up, for they form part of the present circulation.

Mr. GARFIELD. One portion of the gentleman's amendment, it seems to me, is entirely right.

Mr. BROWNE. If the trade-dollar now circulates it simply circulates as bullion, and will it not continue to circulate as bullion?

Mr. WARNER. They do not circulate as bullion, but as dollars.

Mr. GARFIELD. There are two distinct propositions in the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. WARNER,] one of which is to prohibit the receiving at par of stamped and mangled coins that have undergone that treatment in China. That I think is right and ought to be put in this bill, but there is in part a limitation upon the amount of silver coinage per month which in my judgment ought not to be agreed to. I shall therefore demand a division of the amendment. I think it is separable inasmuch as it contains two distinct propositions.

Mr. WARNER. I object to any division of the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think we should not determine the silver question in this incidental way. The trade-dollar was never intended for circulation here, and has no business here; it will be cheating and defrauding the men who get them, especially the laboring-men. We do not want to invite back from China nearly thirty millions of trade-dollars and pay 10 per cent. more for them. I therefore ask for a division of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that there are two provisos in fact which are entirely substantive propositions which can be separated, and a division is in order under the rules. The question will first be upon the first branch of the amendment:

The Clerk read the first branch of the amendment, as follows:

Provided, That the trade-dollars recoined under this act shall not be counted as part of the coinage of silver required by the act of February 28, 1878.

The question was taken upon the first branch of the amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 91, noes 48.

So the first branch of the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the second branch of the amendment; which was read, as follows:

And provided further, That trade-dollars that have been chopped or restamped for circulation in China or other foreign countries shall be excluded from the provisions of this act.

The question was taken; and the second branch of the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next question was upon the amendment offered by Mr. MONROE, to add to the bill the following:

Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to increase the amount of legal-tender silver dollars to be coined per month under the limitations of the existing law.

Mr. MONROE. I desire to say just a word. I suppose that my amendment has been virtually anticipated by the action of the House on the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. WARNER.] I do not know that there is any advantage now in asking a vote upon my proposition. I will only occupy a moment to say that some of us considered the bill of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] doubtful in meaning as regards the question whether the silver to be recoined under it would be in addition to the amount already provided for by law or would be included in that amount. I wished to have that question settled in a satisfactory manner by the House, and for that reason I offered my amendment.

The amendment of my colleague [Mr. WARNER] is directly the opposite of mine, and I understand that the House by adopting it has decided that the amount of silver recoined under this bill, should it become a law, shall be so much in addition to the amount provided for by what is known as the silver-dollar law of a former Congress. If I have any clear opinion on the question of our currency, it is that we should not disturb the settlement of the silver question which we have on our statute-book. I wish to leave it there without change until we can ascertain the result of the movement now going on in Europe for the remonetization of silver. Hence I shall be compelled to vote against this bill on its final passage, because of the adoption of the amendment of my colleague. I now withdraw my amendment.

The next amendment was the one offered by Mr. BREWER, to add to the bill the following:

But the Secretary shall not redeem such trade-dollars as have been clipped so as to decrease their bullion value, or which shall have been restamped by any individual or foreign country.

Mr. BREWER. I only wish to say that this amendment in substance has been adopted by the House already, and I do not desire to press it to a vote. I therefore withdraw it.

The last amendment pending was the following, offered as a substitute by Mr. KEIFER for the entire bill:

That the silver coins of the United States known as the trade-dollars shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for an amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

Mr. KEIFER. I have proposed this substitute for the purpose of bringing us back to the point from which we started. The trade-dollar was originally legal tender for $5. A democratic House and a republican Senate in 1876 demonetized the trade-dollar. We are now asked to enact a bill which provides that that trade-dollar, which only three years ago was supposed to be of a character that ought to pass for nothing in this country, must now be bought in at more than it is worth. The proposition is now that the trade-dollar is too good to circulate in this country, that it has too much bullion in it, and therefore the United States must pay nine cents on each dollar more than it is worth as bullion, and take it up at a cost of over $3,000,000, if all the trade-dollars issued by this Government shall be presented for redemption.

Already they are gathering up on the Asiatic coast and shipping these trade-dollars to New York City in order to speculate in view of the legislation proposed here to-day. I am opposed to such a policy as utterly unwise. Now, if you will simply make these trade-dollars legal tender in sums of $5, they will circulate everywhere. If we had not passed the act of 1876 demonetizing the trade-dollar we would not have heard on the political rostrum all this talk about the trade-dollars. Let us go back to where we were before the act of 1876 was passed, and the trade-dollar will then circulate everywhere throughout the country.

Mr. FORT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. FORT. Does the gentleman think that making the trade-dollar a legal tender will bring it up to par?

Mr. KEIFER. Undoubtedly it will, as the subsidiary silver coins which the gentleman uses every day are at par.

Mr. FORT. Then why should there not be the same inducement to send the trade-dollars back here from China and put them in circulation at par?

Mr. KEIFER. Because by this bill it is proposed to buy them up as bullion and pay nine cents on each dollar more than they are worth as bullion.

Mr. FORT. Your amendment would make them legal tender without recoinage.

Mr. KEIFER. Only for $5, and therefore they will not become current to any great amount.

Mr. WARNER. I have no objection to making the trade-dollar a legal tender for $5 pending its exchange for the standard legal-tender dollar. On the other hand, I would favor that. [Laughter.] I think that would be right. But to make the trade-dollar a legal-tender dollar, to be continued permanently as one of the coins of the country, is something to which I must object. Two dollars of the same metal and the same nominal value—one of 412½ grains and one of 420 grains, one in the ratio of sixteen to one of gold and the other of sixteen and one-half to one—would certainly be an anomaly which we ought not to desire to perpetuate. The legal-tender quality, I understand, was taken away from the trade-dollar at the request of the Director of the Mint and the Secretary of the Treasury. I think it was a mistake. But the way to correct the error now is not to perpetuate these dollars, but to recoin them into legal-tender dollars. When we make them exchangeable for legal-tender dollars we equalize the market value of the two kinds of coins, and trade-dollars will circulate by the side of the legal-tender dollar until they go to the mints.

The question was then taken upon the substitute offered by Mr. KEIFER, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. HAZELTON. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment at this time.

Mr. WARNER. Let it be read.

Mr. HAZELTON. I desire to strike out the word "par," in the sixth line, and to insert in lieu thereof the words "their bullion value." In that case the legal-tender dollar would be exchanged for the trade-dollar at its bullion value and no more.

Mr. WARNER. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent, and objection is made.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HAYES. Let the bill be read as amended.

The bill, as amended, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be exchanged, at the Treasury and at all sub-treasuries of the United States, legal-tender silver dollars for trade-dollars at par: Provided, The weight of said trade-dollars has not been reduced below the standard weight and limit of tolerance provided by law for the single piece; and shall recoin the said trade-dollars into legal-tender dollars, as now provided by law; and shall stop the further coinage of trade-dollars: Pro- vided, That trade-dollars recoined under this act shall not be counted as part of the coinage of silver required by the act of February 28, 1878: And provided further, That trade-dollars that have been "chopped" or restamped for circulation in China or other foreign countries shall be excluded from the provisions of this act.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. STEPHENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed joint resolutions and bills of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 72) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to place vessels and hulks at the disposal of commissioners of quarantine or other proper persons at the ports of the United States;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 94) directing a monument to be erected to mark the birth-place of George Washington;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 95) to pay Patrick Doran for services as messenger, House of Representatives;

An act (H. R. No. 435) to correct an error in "an act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1879;

An act (H. R. No. 1363) providing compensation to E. E. Rice for property transferred by him to the Government of the United States for the use of the diplomatic and consular representatives at Hakodadi, in Japan;

An act (H. R. No. 1478) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to negotiate for the purchase at private sale, or, if necessary, procure by condemnation, a site for a post-office in the city of Baltimore, State of Maryland;

An act (H. R. No. 1734) to authorize the Secretary of War to use certain moneys appropriated by act of Congress approved March 3, 1879, "for the protection of the high sand-banks on the Chippewa River," in the completion and protection of improvements in and near the mouth of said Chippewa River;

An act (H. R. No. 1841) to remove the political disabilities of James H. North, of Culpeper County, Virginia;

An act (H. R. No. 1842) to remove the political disabilities of J. C. Pemberton, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; and

An act (H. R. No. 2263) supplemental to "an act to establish post-routes."

Mr. DAVIDSON. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 20, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the Journal of Wednesday's proceedings, which was read in part yesterday.

The remainder of the Journal of Wednesday's proceedings was read, and the Journal was approved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings will now be read.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM NEW HAMPSHIRE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the newly elected Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Blair] is in the Chamber.

Mr. ROLLINS. I present the credentials of Hon. Henry W. Blair, elected by the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire a Senator from that State. I ask that the credentials be read, and that the oath prescribed by law be administered to him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The credentials will be read.

The Secretary read the credentials, as follows:

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,
Executive Department.

To all persons to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Know ye that Henry W. Blair, of Plymouth, New Hampshire, was by the concurrent votes of the two houses of the Legislature of this State, on the 17th day of June, 1879, duly elected in conformity to the provisions of the Constitution and laws of the United States and the State of New Hampshire, a Senator to represent the State of New Hampshire in the Senate of the United States for the unexpired portion of the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, in the year of our Lord 1879; and on the 18th day of said June, at twelve o'clock meridian, the members of the said two houses being convened in joint assembly and the journal of each house being then read, and the said Henry W. Blair having been found to have received a majority of the votes in each house was declared duly elected Senator as aforesaid.

Witness his excellency, Natt Head, governor of New Hampshire, and our seal hereunto affixed, at Concord, this 18th day of June, in the year of our Lord, 1879, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and third.

[SEAL.] NATT HEAD,
Governor.

By his excellency the governor:

A. B. THOMPSON,
Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator-elect will please come forward and be sworn.

Mr. BLAIR advanced to the desk, escorted by Mr. ROLLINS, and the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

ARREST OF CHEROKEE INDIANS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 4th instant, certain papers and correspondence containing all the facts relating to the subject of the arrest of J. M. Bell and other Cherokee Indians.

Mr. GARLAND. In the absence of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] who offered the resolution that brought these papers to the Senate, I move that they be printed and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

MEMORIAL.

Mr. KERNAN presented the memorial of Warnick & Brown and others, tobacco manufacturers of New York, remonstrating against the passage of any act modifying the laws preventing the sale of leaf-tobacco for consumption without the payment of tax; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will state that the Committee on Appropriations have further considered the resolution of final adjournment sent over by the House, and they are of opinion that the business of the Senate has not progressed to such an extent that we can name a date, but we hope at an early day that we shall be able to fix a certain day for adjournment, and to report the resolution for the action of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2002) making additional appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1879, and June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

SURVEYS OF THE ROCKY MOUNTAIN REGION.

Mr. WHYTE, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 5,000 copies of volume 2 of the geological series of the reports of the geographical and geological survey of the Rocky Mountain region, entitled, The Geology of the Henry Mountains, with the necessary illustrations and charts; 3,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,000 for the use of the Senate, 500 for the use of the Department of the Interior, and 500 for the use of the survey; the illustrations and charts to be made by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

Mr. WHYTE. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back a Senate concurrent resolution on the same subject. Inasmuch as the resolution which has just passed covers the same printing and in a larger degree, I report the resolution unfavorably and move its indefinite postponement.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE, also, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the following concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. HEREFORD on the 22d of May, reported it without amendment, and the resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 2,000 copies of volume 4 of the geological series of the reports of the geographical and geological survey of the Rocky Mountain region, entitled, Geology of the Black Hills of Dakota, with the necessary illustrations and charts; 1,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 for the use of the Senate, and 500 for the use of the Department of the Interior; the illustrations and charts to be made by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

EUROPEAN WORKING CLASSES.

Mr. WHYTE, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed 15,000 copies of the consular reports, with the letters of the Secretary of State transmitting the same, showing the rates of wages, hours of labor, prices of food, and general condition of the working classes in the several countries of Europe; 8,000 copies for the use of the House, 4,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 3,000 copies for the use of the Department of State; that of the said 15,000 copies 5,000 shall be bound in cloth and 10,000 shall be bound in paper.

EVANS'S COMPILATION OF IMPORTS.

Mr. WHYTE, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the following resolution, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed the usual number of the compilation of the imports of the United States and the rates of duties thereon prepared by Charles H. Evans for the use of Congress.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report back without amendment the joint resolution (H. R. No. 32) authorizing the completion of the foundation of the Washington Monument. I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. CONKLING. I do not wish to object to it, but I would like to know before we appropriate more money for the Washington Monument something about it. If the Senator has no objection, suppose he let the joint resolution lie over until to-morrow morning, so that we may see what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the joint resolution at this time.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not interpose any objection, but if the Senator from Florida has no special preference to have it considered to-day I should like to read it before voting upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from New York will allow me to say that the object is to finish the foundation of the monument. It takes part of the appropriation fund of the monument to finish the foundation. It does not appropriate any additional money.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to say to the Senator that I do not wish to object, but yet if the committee has no special preference about it I should be glad to read it before we act upon it. But I do not interpose any particular objection.

Mr. DAWES. While this is not in name an additional appropriation, it is in reality. It is taking part of the appropriation to be applied to the completion of the monument and diverting it to putting a new bottom under the monument; and it will require just so much more for the completion of the monument. I am not here to oppose it now; I was not in the committee——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution not being under consideration, debate is out of order.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. VANCE. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report favorably and ask for its present consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2327) to authorize the renewal of a loan therein named by the joint stock company of the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington. It is merely to authorize the Young Men's Christian Association to refund their present debt or to make a mortgage upon their real estate in this city at a lower rate of interest than in its present form, the proceeds to be used exclusively in payment of the existing loan.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

Mr. GARLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 675, to provide office rooms for the National Board of Health——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not a matter for a motion yet; we are not through with the routine business of the morning hour. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. GARLAND. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate, then, to take the bill up.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 675) to provide office rooms for the National Board of Health, and for the publication of its reports and papers, and for other purposes.

Mr. GARLAND. I am authorized by the select committee to investigate and report the best means of preventing the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases to offer an amendment to the bill in the nature of a substitute. We had better have the original bill reported first, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not if the amendment is in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. GARLAND. The substitute has been printed and laid upon the desks of Senators for some days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That the National Board of Health is hereby authorized and empowered to procure suitable and sufficient offices in the city of Washington for the transaction of its business, at a rental not to exceed the sum of $1,800 per annum. And said board is also authorized to pay the sum of $225 for the rent of building No. 1405 G street northwest, in the city of Washington, used by the National Board of Health for offices, from the 3d day of April, 1879, to the 3d day of June, 1879.

SEC. 2. That the necessary printing of the National Board of Health be done at the Government Printing Office, upon the requisition of the secretary of the board, in the same manner and subject to the same provisions as other public printing for the several Departments of the Government: Provided, That the cost of said printing shall not exceed the sum of $10,000 per annum.

SEC. 3. That the National Board of Health is hereby authorized and empowered to have printed and bound 10,000 copies of the Report of the Board of Medical Experts created by former act of Congress, which report shall include the report of Drs. Bemiss and Cochran and Engineer Hardee upon the yellow-fever epidemic of 1878; 6,000 copies of the same to be furnished the House of Representatives, 2,000 copies to the Senate, and the residue to the National Board of Health: Provided, That the cost of publication and binding said report shall not exceed the sum of $7,500. And the said board is hereby authorized to pay Drs. Bemiss and Cochran and Engineer Hardee $10 per day, for the preparation of their said report, for the period of two months: Provided, That the same shall be completed and submitted to the board within that time.

SEC. 4. That the National Board of Health is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Frank J. Taylor, for services as stenographer to the Board of Medical Experts in reporting evidence of medical men and others touching the causes, introduction, and spread of epidemic diseases within the United States, and for preparing the same for publication, the sum of $540, said sum being the amount allowed him by the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

SEC. 5. That the chief clerk of the National Board of Health shall act as disbursing agent for the board, and shall give bond, conformably to section 176 of the Revised Statutes, for the faithful performance of that duty, and for such service he shall receive $300 per annum, in addition to his salary as chief clerk.

SEC. 6. That section 3 of the act approved June 1, 1879, entitled "An act to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases within the United States," be amended as follows: At the end thereof insert: "And the Board of Health shall have power, when they may deem it necessary, as a means of preventing the importation of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States, or into one State from another, to erect quarantine buildings and to acquire titles to real estate for that purpose, or to rent houses, if there be any suitable, at such points and places as are named in such section."

SEC. 7. That all the money hereinbefore authorized to be expended by the National Board of Health shall be paid out of the appropriation of $500,000 made in the act of Congress entitled "An act to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States," approved June 2, 1879.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee which has just been read.

Mr. MORRILL. I should like to hear some explanation of this substitute.

KANSAS SENATORIAL INVESTIGATION.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator from Arkansas will give way, I send to the desk a resolution which I am instructed to report from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I ask its adoption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection, this being morning business, the Chair will receive the resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to which has been referred memorials in relation to the election of Hon. J. J. INGALLS a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Kansas, be, and said committee is hereby, authorized and instructed to investigate the statements and charges contained in said memorials; and for that purpose said committee is empowered to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, employ a stenographer, clerk, and sergeant-at-arms, and do all such acts as are necessary and proper in the premises. And said committee may appoint a sub-committee of its members to take testimony in Kansas or elsewhere in the case, which shall report the testimony taken to the committee in December next; and such sub-committee shall have the same authority to administer oaths and do other necessary acts as are herein conferred upon the full committee; and the said committee, and the sub-committee which it may appoint, may sit during the recess of the Senate for the purpose of making the investigation hereby authorized.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill moved by the Senator from Arkansas having been taken up by unanimous consent, it cannot be displaced now.

NATIONAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 675) to provide office rooms for the National Board of Health and for the publication of its reports and papers, and for other purposes.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to call the attention of the Senator having charge of the bill to some of its provisions which I have not heretofore had an opportunity of seeing. I was not aware that such an amendment was pending. It seems that we made most liberal appropriations for this Board of Health at an earlier day of the session, and now it is proposed that this board shall have a perpetual office here in the city, permanently rented, and we are to pay back rent for whatever buildings they have used heretofore. In addition to that they are not to pay their expenses for printing out of the sums that have been already appropriated, but it is proposed to publish certain books in addition for distribution at a cost of $7,500, and the bill authorizes the Government Printing Office to do all their printing at an expense of not exceeding $10,000. Beyond that, there seems to be a most marvelous provision here authorizing the Board of Health to purchase lands and buildings for their use without any limitation as to the expense. It strikes me that the bill ought to go over until we can have an opportunity to examine it more particularly than we can in the morning hour. Certainly this bill would seem to place it in the power of this board of medical gentlemen to involve the country in a very large sum of expenditure.

Mr. GARLAND. Does the Senator from Vermont suppose we are making additional appropriations in this bill? I will state to him that every expenditure provided for in this bill must be paid out of the appropriations already existing. There is no new appropriation. If the Senator will direct his attention to section 9, on page 4, he will see that there is an express provision that the appropriation already made shall cover all these expenditures, if that is the point the Senator is making.

Mr. MORRILL. That is one point. But we make appropriations for the Public Printing Office, for instance, to furnish them with a certain amount of stock, with a certain amount to be paid for labor, and here is an additional burden upon that department.

Mr. GARLAND. I think not, because under section 2, if the Senator from Vermont will notice, he will see that this is done like all the public printing, with a proviso that it shall not exceed the sum of $10,000. It is like all other public printing, and I think that office is the proper place for the printing to be done. It was the opinion of the committee that the proper place to have it done is the Public Printing Office; and the $10,000, and every other sum of expenditure that is to be incurred, is to come out of the appropriations already made.

Mr. MORRILL. The section which struck my ear in the reading of it as one of extraordinary latitude was section 6, which authorizes the commission "to erect quarantine buildings and acquire title to real estate for that purpose, or to rent houses, if there be any suitable, at such points and places as are named in such section."

Mr. GARLAND. I will explain that as the committee understand it. Under the bill that has already passed there was no express power given to the board to establish quarantine at the different places or ports. The Treasury Department has decided that it cannot pay any accounts of this character for the want of the express authority which is given in the bill. Quarantine buildings must necessarily at times be wanted at different places for hospital and other purposes. The Secretary of the Treasury having declined to pay the accounts for these buildings, and no authority existing, it was thought by the committee that it was proper to give the board the express authority, holding that they could not without the authority of law in express language either rent or purchase real estate. As a matter of course, the Senator from Vermont will observe that while they incur the rent or make the purchase, as the case may be, it is for the use and benefit of the United States; in other words, it is United States property. If there is any obscurity in the language in that respect we are willing to accept an amendment.

If the Senator from Vermont thinks that a restriction as to the maximum of expenditures can be placed in that section, the committee has no objection to it; but he will see at once that it is very difficult to do that, for a building of one size or of one cost at one point will not do for a building or the cost of a building at another point. That matter was duly considered by the committee, and it was thought best to leave that to the discretion of these gentlemen, as many things must necessarily be left to their discretion.

Mr. MORRILL. I will merely say that on a hasty examination of the bill I am not prepared to suggest an amendment; but if the Senator will allow the bill to go over until to-morrow morning, I think it can be arranged.

Mr. GARLAND. With the express understanding that the bill is to come up regularly to-morrow morning, I shall agree to that suggestion.

Mr. MORRILL. I shall not object, certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the bill is postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. KERNAN and others. Until to-morrow.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. SLATER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 707) for the relief of William W. Ross; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. BAILEY, it was Ordered, That Asa Faulkner and others be permitted to withdraw their papers, in a case asking compensation for a cotton-mill, from the files of the Senate.

INTERNATIONAL SILVER CONFERENCE OF 1878.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to the Senate copy of the proceedings and accompanying papers of the international silver conference held in Paris in 1878.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 85) fixing the date on which the pay of the committee clerks, pages, and laborers of the House of Representatives who are paid during the session only shall begin for this session.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2252) making appropriation for certain judicial expenses.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 697) to establish additional post-roads in the State of Florida, with amendments in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 913) to provide for the exchange of the trade-dollars for legal-tender silver dollars; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 2251) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1369) to relieve the churches of the District of Columbia and to clear the title of the trustees to such property.

POST-ROADS IN FLORIDA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 697) to establish additional post-roads in the State of Florida; and they were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

PUBLIC GROUNDS AT PLATTSBURGH.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 243. This is a bill in regard to granting the right of way to the State of New York over a small tract of a military reservation along Lake Champlain. It passed the Senate at the last session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 243) to authorize the Secretary of War to release certain lands of the United States to the people of the State of New York.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It empowers the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to release to the people of the State of New York, their successors and assigns, a right of way, not exceeding six rods in width, upon and across the land owned and possessed by the United States, in the town of Plattsburgh, Clinton County, New York, for railroad purposes, and also a lot or piece of land in the northeast corner of that land, owned by the United States, for depot and other railroad purposes, not to exceed, however, two acres, together with the right to occupy the shore of Lake Champlain opposite the premises for the purpose of discharging, receiving, and storing ore and other freights, subject to such restrictions as the Secretary of War may think necessary to protect the interests of the United States.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, at the end of section 2 to add the following:

And to grant, sell, and convey the small tract and parcel of said reservation, situate north of said Hamilton street extended, for such price and sum as may be fair and reasonable.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be authorized and empowered, in his discretion, to lay out and continue Hamilton street, in the said town of Plattsburgh, across the said lands of the United States, to the lot or piece of land which the Secretary of War may release to the people of the State of New York by the first section of this act, and to dedicate the same to the public use as a public highway; and to grant, sell, and convey, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KANSAS SENATORIAL INVESTIGATION.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask for the adoption of the resolution which I reported just now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the resolution reported by him from the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Is there objection?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The resolution had better go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

APPROPRIATION FOR JUDICIAL EXPENSES.

Mr. WALLACE. I rise to a privileged question. I present a report from a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2252) making appropriations for certain judicial expenses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 2252, making appropriations for certain judicial expenses, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 1, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

Strike out the words proposed to be inserted by said Senate amendment and insert after the word "money," in line 16, page 2 of the bill, the following:

"Under any of the provisions of title 26 of the Revised Statutes of the United States authorizing the appointment or payment of general or special deputy marshals for services in connection with elections or on election day."

So that the section, amended, shall read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the sums appropriated in this act for the persons and public service embraced in its provisions are in full for such persons and public service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880; and no Department or officer of the Government shall, during said fiscal year, make any contract or incur any liability for the future payment of money under any of the provisions of title 26 of the Revised Statutes of the United States authorizing the appointment or payment of general or special deputy marshals for services in connection with elections or on election day until an appropriation sufficient to meet such contract or pay such liability shall have first been made by law."

And the Senate agree to the same.

WILLIAM A. WALLACE,
H. G. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
J. A. McMAHON,
THOMAS R. COBB,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I wish to reserve all points of order in the case of that report from a committee of conference. I do not understand how far the managers have confined themselves to the differences between the two Houses and how far they have gone beyond. I want to see the report in print, and in the mean time, objecting as I do to its present consideration, I reserve all points of order in reference to it.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not know that a single objection can prevent the consideration of a conference report.

Mr. CONKLING. On the same day that it is made?

Mr. WALLACE. On the same day that it is made. I understand it to be a privileged report, one that can be considered at once, excluding all other business. If I am in error in this regard, I shall be glad to be corrected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is not subject to debate. The forty-ninth rule settles this question:

> The presentation of reports of committees of conference shall always be in order, except while the Journal is being read or a question of order or a motion to adjourn is pending, or while the Senate is dividing; and when received, the question of proceeding to the consideration of the report shall immediately be put, and shall be determined without debate.

This report was presented at a time when it could be received under this rule; and then the rule is that when received the question of proceeding to the consideration of the report shall immediately be put and shall be determined without debate. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report made by the committee of conference?

Mr. CONKLING. When I ask a question of the Chair, the morning hour having expired the unfinished business is in order but for this. If the motion shall prevail to proceed to the consideration of this report, does the Chair hold that it supersedes the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would seem so from this rule:

> When received, the question of proceeding to the consideration of the report shall immediately be put, and shall be determined without debate.

Senators, as many as are in favor of proceeding to the consideration of this report of the conference committee will say "ay," of a contrary opinion "no," [putting the question.] The Chair cannot decide, and will divide the Senate.

The question being again put, there were, on a division—ayes 28, noes 18.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, before the roll is called I beg to make one suggestion to the Chair. On the motion of the present Presiding Officer, the Senate adjourned yesterday with the understanding that the Army bill was to proceed to-day and proceed to a vote. Now the Chair will observe that a Senator on the other side of the Chamber interposes this report, and if this motion prevails we are to proceed to consider it, thus consuming the time by agreement allotted to another subject; so that if this side of the Chamber shall not feel themselves bound by the agreement thus about to be displaced, the Senator from Pennsylvania and his associates, and not we, will be responsible for the second misunderstanding in this regard. I think the Senator had better withhold his report and let us observe, while he observes, the understanding.

Mr. WALLACE. If the report shall be taken up, I will at once yield to the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] in order that he may proceed.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the object of having it taken up now? It is a privileged report; the Senator can call it up at any time.

Mr. WALLACE. In order that when we get through with the Army bill, this shall be the first business in order.

Mr. CONKLING. So it will be under the rule as it is a privileged matter. The Senator gains nothing by this.

Mr. WALLACE. If it will not trouble the Senator to let it be taken up as moved now, then we will lay it aside informally and proceed with the Army bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Then we shall be under the difficulty that the rule requires that if taken up it shall be proceeded with, whereas if the Senator will simply allow his report to lie he can call it up as soon as the Army bill is disposed of. I wish now in good nature to caution the Senator, if he and his associates disturb this understanding, they must not impute to us any dereliction if we find ourselves in another difficulty.

Mr. WALLACE. I rose in order with the consideration of a privileged question, which was about being proceeded with without debate under the rule. I do not think a privileged question of this character, affecting another appropriation bill, passed upon by the other House finally, could have been included in any consideration that entered into the agreement of yesterday.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator one question?

Mr. WALLACE. Very well.

Mr. CONKLING. Does he think that if this report is taken up and if we proceed to debate it and occupy the day or a part of the day with it, he can ask us on this side to observe the understanding by which the Army bill was to be debated to-day and voted upon?

Mr. WALLACE. I have expressly said that immediately on its being taken up I will agree to lay it aside informally and yield the floor to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CONKLING. We do not want it taken up to-day.

Mr. WALLACE. That will not interfere with the progress of the Army bill.

Mr. EATON. Let me ask my friend from Pennsylvania what earthly difference is made. I wonder my friend from New York does not consent at once that this be taken up, for it will not take one minute to do that; but if he thinks it would be in violation of the agreement, why not let it go over and take it up at some time hereafter?

Mr. CONKLING. We want to know what this report is. If a statement made to me about it is true, the report is out of order, and I propose to raise that question before it is taken up at all; and therefore we do not want to waive anything about it.

Mr. WALLACE. If the Senator from New York makes that point on proceeding to the consideration of the report, then we yield if he is not to debate it on the merits.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us go on with the understanding.

Mr. WALLACE. If it be an objection to the report itself that is to be presented, of course it must be considered upon the subject of proceeding to the consideration of the report, and there is something therefore in the objection of the Senator from New York, and I yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What does the Senator say?

Mr. WALLACE. I yield for the present, and ask that the report be printed.

Mr. CONKLING. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania, then, does not ask for the present consideration of the report?

Mr. WALLACE. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, it is not a matter of discretion.

Mr. CONKLING. If I may suggest, let the Senator withdraw his report, withhold it; let it lie on the table and be printed, and he can call it up hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent that can be done.

Mr. CONKLING and others. No objection.

Mr. WALLACE. I do that simply because it is to the matter of the form of the report that the Senator from New York objects.

Mr. CONKLING. To the substance of it.

Mr. WALLACE. The substance will be considered after it is taken up. As to the matter of form, that is preliminary, and therefore I yield.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator misunderstood my answer to the question. I say the preliminary objection which is reported to me is on the form to be sure, but also on the substance. That preliminary objection is——

Mr. WALLACE. Very well.

Mr. CONKLING. It may not exist at all when we come to read the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the report be taken up, it is perfectly competent to make it the special order for to-morrow. There is no special order for to-morrow, and the Army bill being out of the way, it will come up to-morrow as the special order.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask that it be made the special order after the Army bill is disposed of.

Mr. CONKLING. The simple way is to let it lie and have it printed, and then it is a privileged question, and the Senator can call it up at four o'clock to-day if we get through the Army bill by that hour.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask that the report lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be taken.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2019) for the relief of Daniel M. Cook;

A bill (H. R. No. 2329) authorizing the Conway National Bank of Conway, Massachusetts, to change its location and name; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 106) providing for the payment of John E. Kelly as messenger to the Committee of Ways and Means.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 85) fixing the date on which the pay of the committee clerks, pages, and laborers of the House of Representatives, who are paid during the session only, shall begin for this session, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2175) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before proceeding with the business, the Chair wishes to announce that the rule prohibiting applause or dissent in the galleries or on the floor of the Senate has been too frequently violated; and that if it is violated again those guilty of the offense will be arrested or the galleries will be cleared. There must be, and there shall be, perfect order.

The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the Army appropriation bill, on which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, it has been so long since I got the floor to speak upon this bill, since which so many exciting scenes have passed, and the President having announced that there must be no applause, it might be supposed that I was prepared to make and intended to make a tremendous and terrible speech. I have no such purpose. I have made as many stump-speeches as any man of my years and capacity in this country, but I always make them from the stump. My purpose to-day is to discuss some of the provisions of the bill before the Senate, and nothing else. There will be nothing in my remarks to provoke applause in the Senate or the galleries. I shall not endeavor to blame any one, or excite any one, or provoke any one, but shall ask the attention of the Senate to the bill under consideration on account of the magnitude of interests which it involves.

This bill makes appropriations for the Army, and is the only bill contemplated for that purpose, for the year commencing on the 1st of July next. The fifth section of the bill is as follows:

SEC. 5. That no money appropriated in this act is appropriated or shall be paid for the subsistence, equipment, transportation, or compensation of any portion of the Army of the United States to be used as a police force to keep the peace at the polls at any election held within any State.

It is to this section, and this alone, that I intend to speak for a very few minutes. It is proper in construing one section of a statute to examine all its sections, for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the law-makers. It is also quite common for courts construing a statute to refer to other statutes enacted at the same session. Therefore, all the appropriation acts passed by this session may well be compared together, to ascertain the meaning of this section 5, if this bill shall pass.

An appropriation bill which has just passed the two Houses of Congress provides—I quote from memory—that no Department or officer of the Government shall incur any obligation or enter into any contract binding on the Government unless a previous appropriation to cover it has been made, except as provided for in section 3732 of the Revised Statutes. I will read that section:

SEC. 3732. No contract or purchase on behalf of the United States shall be made, unless the same is authorized by law or is under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment, except in the War and Navy Departments, for clothing, subsistence, forage, fuel, quarters, or transportation, which, however, shall not exceed the necessities of the current year.

There would be no difficulty in ascertaining the meaning of this section if there were no other section of the Revised Statutes seemingly in conflict with it; but section 3679, a prior section, provides as follows:

No Department of the Government shall expend, in any one fiscal year, any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations.

In construing section 3732, the section which I have just read, 3679 must be compared with it. I do not assert it with perfect confidence, yet I am inclined to think this, that section 3732, construed together with section 3679, would be held to authorize contracts for clothing, subsistence, transportation, &c., which were in excess of the appropriations made by law therefor, that is, a deficiency in the appropriations might be supplied in the particulars mentioned in this section; and I think that section 3732 does not go beyond that. So, if I am right in that, the appropriation bill which has just passed both Houses provides that no Department or officer of the Government shall enter into any contract, or involve the Government in any liability, except for deficiencies in appropriations made. If this be so, it must follow that, inasmuch as Congress has made no appropriation whatever for a particular subject and has expressly declared that the appropriations contained in this bill shall not be used for that purpose, section 3732 would not help the case at all, and under the previous section of the Revised Statutes, which I have read, and under the broad provision of the appropriatien bill already passed, that no Department or officer of the Government could make any contract, or incur any liability, or do anything whatever with a view to preserving the peace at the polls at any election in a State.

If this be so, this section is subject to very serious objection. The appropriation bill which was passed, and which the President vetoed, although it declared that the President should not use the troops to preserve the peace at the polls, yet it expressly saved out of the provisions of that act the case under the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution, so that the President could employ the troops at the polls if called upon by a State. Under this section and under this bill, I maintain he could not do it if a State should call upon him for that purpose. Suppose the State of Delaware, or the State of Rhode Island, or the State of Nevada, or the State of Connecticut, or any other State, should call upon the President informing him that an organization had been formed to prevent the general election in that State, and thus suspend the functions of the State government, on the election day fixed for November next, and should call upon him to forward troops to be there to preserve the peace in that State on that day. I take it no one would doubt that that would be a case fairly arising under the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution, and that it would be the duty of the President to send the troops there for that purpose, and yet this section says:

That no money appropriated in this act is appropriated, or shall be paid, for the subsistence, equipment, transportation, or compensation of any portion of the Army of the United States to be used as a police force to keep the peace at the polls at any election held within any State.

It may be said in reply, that the words "as a police force" redeem the section from this criticism. I do not think so. I think the operative and controlling words in the sentence are "to keep the peace." Suppose the bill had read that he should not use the Army as "clever fellows" to keep the peace, he should not use them as "white men" to keep the peace, or any other qualification you choose to employ. The controlling provision of this section is, and we all know it is intended to be, that the peace shall not be preserved at the polls by military force. There is no escape from this conclusion on the act itself. The words "police" and "police force" have, in the law, various significations. I will ask the Clerk to read the definition of the word "police" in Bouvier's Law Dictionary.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

POLICE. That species of superintendence by magistrates which has principally for its object the maintenance of public tranquillity among the citizens. The officers who are appointed for this purpose are also called the police.

2. The word police has three significations, namely: 1. The first relates to the measures which are adopted to keep order, the laws and ordinances on cleanliness, health, the markets, &c. 2. The second has for its object to procure to the authorities the means of detecting even the smallest attempts to commit crime, in order that the guilty may be arrested before their plans are carried into execution, and delivered over to the justice of the country. 3. The third comprehends the laws, ordinances and other measures which require the citizens to exercise their rights in a particular form.

3. Police has also been divided into administrative police, which has for its object to maintain constantly public order in every part of the general administration; and into judiciary police, which is intended principally to prevent crimes by punishing the criminals. Its object is to punish crimes which the administrative police has not been able to prevent.

Mr. CARPENTER. Of course the familiar and most common use of the word "police" relates to the government of a municipality. We understand police and policemen as about the same thing, the policeman being the officer of a municipality which is engaged in preserving the peace; but the word "police," used in its broad sense, found in an act of Congress relating to the regular Army of the United States, means something more than it would in an ordinance passed by the common council of a city regulating the conduct of policemen in that city. It would be taken here in its broadest signification.

Now, what is the Army in time of peace in this Republic? This is a government of law; this is a government where the military must always be in strict subordination to the civil power. The Army of this country in time of peace is the police force of the nation; it is the administrative police of this great Republic, nothing more, and nothing less. It goes in its capacity as administrative police, when properly ordered, to preserve the peace of a State, to restore tranquillity there when disturbed by domestic violence, riot or insurrection; it is the police of the nation; and yet this section provides that no money is appropriated, and none shall be paid to any portion of the Army to be used as a police force to keep the peace at the polls on election day.

It was said in some of the speeches that I have listened to that what is intended here is to prevent stationing a soldier here and a soldier there to act like ordinary civil policemen in a city to see that the peace is preserved; but that in case of a riot or tumult or revolution or any great commotion you may use the Army; but the soldiers must be marched in close order, in military array, and cannot be stationed separately like ordinary policemen to preserve the peace. And it is said by some that the President might employ the troops in this way on election day notwithstanding this fifth section.

Now to this there are several answers. The question is how will the President be compelled to construe this section? In the first place, as nobody ever proposed to use the soldiers as ordinary policemen, and they never were so used, that is not an evil that needs correction. Nor does any man in his senses entertain the slightest apprehension that soldiers would ever be so employed.

The President and every officer under him must in construing this section give effect to the intention of its makers, if that intention can properly be ascertained. Now, everybody knows, as matter of fact, what is in the mind and what is the intention of the democratic Senators by whose votes this bill will be passed. At the close of the last session it was openly declared from the democratic side of this Chamber that the power of the President to employ the Army to preserve peace at the polls must be given up or no appropriations would be made to carry on the Government. This compelled the extra session. Again in the appropriation bill which has passed and when provision should have been made for the execution of the election laws passed by Congress—laws passed to secure a peaceable election, and an honest canvass of votes cast,—no appropriation has been made for the purpose.

In the Army appropriation bill which was passed by the two Houses at this session, and was defeated by the President's veto, the intention of the democrats to prevent the preservation of the peace at the polls by the employment of troops when necessary for that purpose, was declared in express words; except in a case arising under the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution.

This well-known and often-manifested intention of the democrats in both Houses must control the construction of the fifth section of this bill unless its language is such as to be wholly inconsistent with such intention; such as to show that the democrats in Congress have abandoned their intention and have concluded to permit the President to employ the troops when necessary to preserve the peace at the polls on election day as well as at any other place or on any other day.

I maintain that this section so far from showing that the democrats have abandoned their purpose of preventing the preservation of peace at the polls, have merely employed artful and cunning phraseology for the purpose of deceiving the republicans in Congress and inducing them to vote for the bill and the President to approve it. They hope that the words in this section "as a police force" will deceive everybody while in fact they mean nothing. In the first place the attempt by jugglery of words to create doubt in the construction of a law, and embarrassment to the executive department in executing it is unworthy of Congress. Our laws should be plainly written. Any attempt on the part of Congress to frame a law so ambiguous that the President might be entrapped into a violation of its provisions as they might be construed by a subsequent democratic House of Representatives, and thereby make himself amenable to impeachment by the House would be disgraceful.

Again, it must be borne in mind that in this debate the democratic members of the Appropriations Committee have refused to inform the Senate whether in the opinion of the committee this section does or does not forbid the employment of troops as a military force, or whether the prohibition is directed against the employment of the soldiers as ordinary civil policemen; while other Senators, and especially the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] rest their support of this bill upon the broad and express declaration that they are opposed to the employment of troops even to suppress a riot at the polls.

Under these circumstances and in view of the fact, as I have already shown, the Army can never be used in time of peace except as a police force,—that the Army, however employed in time of peace, is a police force and cannot be anything else, I submit that the President would be compelled to construe this section as an expression of the well-known intention of a majority of both Houses of Congress to prevent any use of the troops at the polls for any purpose, even to suppress a riot, and that the President would be impeachable for using the troops to suppress a riot at the polls; provided this section be constitutional, which I shall consider hereafter.

The phraseology of this section is remarkable in many particulars:

No money appropriated in this act is appropriated or shall be paid for the subsistence, equipment, transportation, or compensation of any portion of the Army of the United States to be used—

Not "any portion which shall have been used;" nor does it say "any portion of the Army when used, or while being used;" but any portion of the Army "to be used" shall not be supported by this appropriation. Suppose, now, the President intends on the first Monday in November next, to see to it that the peace of the city of New York is preserved, and that riots are prevented on election day, then the Army is to be used to preserve the peace on that day, and the President and those under him have no authority whatever under that section to use the money appropriated, even for their subsistence and compensation up to that time. I see the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] smiles; he probably thinks this is a small point. It is a small point compared with the other objections to this section. But what is the meaning of these words? It certainly contemplates that the use of the Army, for this purpose, is an act to be done in future, in the future, of course, to the application of this appropriation to the subsistence and compensation of the Army. That is the grammatical sense of it; it is the only sense of it. But, of course, that was not intended by anybody. But suppose, again, on the 1st day of November the President should use a regiment of troops for that purpose, what is to be done with them afterward? Can the President clothe them or compensate them after that with this money?

But, Mr. President, these, of course, are small objections, objections sticking in the bark, criticisms upon the phraseology of this section. The grand and conclusive objection to it is that it is intended to, and in my opinion, as it is cunningly constructed, it does forbid the President of the United States to preserve the peace by the use of the Army on the election day. If we are wrong about this, the Senator from New York has prepared several amendments which he will offer during the consideration of this bill to-day, which will make it perfectly plain whether democratic Senators mean what I think they do by this bill, or whether they mean simply to say that the soldiers shall not be degraded from their military character to serve as mere ordinary civil policemen. We will make that thing perfectly plain by amendments that will be proposed; and then, when the democratic Senators shall have determined by their votes upon those amendments, what is the precise meaning of this section and have determined it, as I have no doubt they will, that they mean what I say this section means, that the President shall not, under any circumstances, employ troops to preserve the peace on election day, then the objection will stand out to the section, and be reason enough why it should never be passed by an American Congress, or approved by an American President.

Mr. President, why is it? What look has this bill on its face? The President of the United States may use the money appropriated to clothe, equip, transport, and compensate troops to keep the peace everywhere in the nation on three hundred and sixty-four days of the year, but one day in the year riot shall have full sway, one day in the year the administrative police force of this nation shall be manacled. It is said every dog shall have its day, and the democratic Senators have made up their minds that riot shall have its day, and that that day shall be the election day. All the unruly elements of society, all desperadoes and scoundrels have notice that election day is to be their carnival; and the national power shall not be permitted to oppose or resist them.

Why is this? It was said by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] that there was no need of troops on election day, because on that day the people were out in their might, assembled in their sovereign capacity; and abundantly able to preserve the peace without assistance of troops. If this were true then election day would be the only day of the year when the troops could not be dangerous to the liberties of the citizen. If the assemblies of the sovereign people could by a look awe riot into submission, they could easily restrain the regular Army within its proper sphere.

But is this true? Who does not know that on an election day when party spirit runs high and rivalry, emulation and every human passion is excited to its utmost, one party attempting to overthrow the other, one candidate to defeat another, and when a year's anxiety for political success has culminated in the crisis of a day, men are found engaged in fights and riots who are peaceable and law-abiding on every other day in the year. The Senator from Indiana gives expression to pure theory, and ignores what we have all seen time and again on election day. It is well known that from these strifes, when they ripen into the exercise of physical force, the best men steal away to their homes, and rowdies and ruffians maintain the field. There have been elections in many of our large cities when it was as much as a citizen's life was worth to cast a vote against the democratic party.

In evidence of this in all our large cities the sale of intoxicating liquors is prohibited on that day. If the argument of the Senator from Indiana were sound, and the assembled sovereigns were capable of meeting every emergency it would follow that that was the safest day of the year to give whisky unobstructed flow.

I have not heard it charged from any quarter, neither in this Chamber nor from the press or the stump that any election was ever interfered with, or any voter intimidated or disturbed in voting by any portion of the regular Army of the United States. During the war, and the year in which the war closed, before the angry passions engendered by that contest were allayed it is said that some volunteer troops in some parts of the country did what they were not authorized to do. We all know that the employment of volunteer forces like everything else has its advantages and disadvantages. There is less discipline and less self-control in the volunteer force than in the regular Army. While with proper training they have no superiors on the battle-field after the battle is over they are restive of restraint, impatient of discipline. But the regular Army its Commander-in-Chief the President of the United States a civilian charged with civil administration. General Sherman General-in-Chief, and other generals in command schooled in their profession, and obedient to the law, who entertains the slightest fear that the regular Army will be employed at the polls or elsewhere save in the interest of that peace and good order which is essential to a free and fair election.

But we were told the other day by the Senator from Indiana, that the people of every State in this Union was so fearful that their elections would be broken up and prevented that they had passed laws forbidding the marshaling of a single company or regiment of the militia for drill, for instruction, anywhere at or near the polls; and the Senator from Indiana went out as he said upon an expedition to enlighten the minds of the public, and especially to relieve the darkness that enveloped my mind, in regard to the laws of Wisconsin, which State, he said, had in its wisdom—and the Senator from Indiana said he bowed to the wisdom of that State—forbidden a muster of its militia on election day. It happens that there never was a teacher volunteering for missionary service who was so utterly ignorant of the subject he intended to teach as in this instance.

The revised statutes of Wisconsin—and I refer to this subject because I believe it has been made a very great argument in this Chamber, that the States have been wise enough to prevent military interference with their own elections. In the course of the remarks of the Senator from Indiana, I suggested to him what I thought the true purpose of this statute was; that is that it was designed to prevent oppression of the soldier of the militia; designed to prevent their being called away from home so that they could not vote themselves; and the Senator charged me with unfairness in giving that construction. He commended me as a lawyer for the purpose of saying that I had been unjust and unfair even to suggest such a construction, and that it was totally and absolutely absurd.

Mr. VOORHEES rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. VOORHEES. I did not intend the remarks I made to have the personal force and bearing that the Senator now gives to them. I disclaim any such purpose as that. I think perhaps I said that I did not regard his construction as a fair one; but as to being personally unfair or charging any want of candor, I did not intend that.

Mr. CARPENTER. I accept, of course, the disclaimer; and it only illustrates how a great man like the Senator from Indiana, great intellectually, great physically, with a strong mind, with a robust form of speech at his command and with locomotive, physical, power in him, is apt to overstep the bound he fixes for himself. Let me read a few quotations now from the Senator, which I have marked, to show how completely he deceived himself in that particular and did what he was determined not to do. Referring to this statute he says:

And let me call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to a law of his own State that with all his legal acumen and well-recognized and highly appreciated legal learning he may have overlooked. I state to the Senator and to the country that in the wisdom of the Legislature of Wisconsin—and I make my profound bow to her wisdom—a regiment of soldiers can not only not approach the polls on election day, but they cannot be mustered in the county where an election is going on. Is the Senator aware of that?

And, again, he says, when I suggested to him the construction which I have mentioned:

I am making no mistake, for I have examined it quite recently, and I thought as likely as not an opportunity would be had to instruct and enlighten the public mind as well as the mind of the Senator from Wisconsin, for with all his great liberality and great legal learning (for which nobody has a greater admiration than I have) I thought the traces of party might keep him voting for these unjust, iniquitous, and outrageous measures that menace the free ballot-box of the country, and it gave me great pleasure to find in examining the statutes of every State in this Union that Wisconsin had gone beyond all of them. If the Senator from Wisconsin had given the true reason here that they were not to be mustered because they might be taken away from the polls, it would be queer that the law says they shall not be mustered near the polls.

There again the Senator was at fault, for the word "polls" is not mentioned in the section at all, as I will show him.

There would be a good chance for them to vote, an excellent chance, which would contradict the reason given by the Senator from Wisconsin. I would not say a disrespectful word of the Senator from Wisconsin, for I have the greatest possible respect for his abilities and for his general fairness, but I do not think that he has treated this question at all fairly or justly.

I do not care to read further, but will proceed at once to reciprocate the kindness of the Senator from Indiana. He said he was going to enlighten me, and if I had with the faith of a child submitted to his enlightenment I should have gone dreadfully astray. Now, let me reciprocate and try to inform him what the law of Wisconsin on this subject is. A part of the militia law of Wisconsin, not the election law, is section 646 of our present Revised Statutes. It reads as follows:

SEC. 646. No muster or assembly for instruction, review or parade shall be held or called in any county on any day during which a general or special election shall be held therein, nor within five days before such election, except in case of riot, invasion, insurrection or imminent danger thereof; and if any officer shall order any such muster or assembly, he shall forfeit $100.

Does anybody suppose that the people of Wisconsin were so afraid of their own militia that, if they were mustered for review or instruction on one day the people would not so far regain their senses and their pluck that they could vote within five days afterward? Does any man, looking back to the state of our militia before the war, think it was so terrible that the people in the locality where there had been a muster would be shivering and shaking with fear for five days thereafter? The very purpose and object of that statute was to prevent their being called out for service on that day and thus deprive them of their right to vote. Now see section 647 which confirms this view.

SEC. 647. On the days of military parade, the militia so called out and doing military duty shall be considered to be under military discipline, from the rising to the setting of the sun; and no officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, artificer, or private belonging to the same during the time aforesaid, shall be subject to be arrested on any civil process.

Not a very excellent chance to vote as the Senator from Indiana suggested. They are to be under military discipline; that is, they are to be under martial law from sunrise to sunset, and they might be called to do duty far from their homes so that they could not get back on election day. The idea that the people of Wisconsin were afraid of their militia, bearing in mind that when these States passed these statutes they were dealing, not with the regular Army of the Union, foreign to their soil and unacquainted with their people, as they would be, but they were dealing with the militia of their own State; and the body of the militia and the body of the voters are the same individuals.

There is one authority which my friend from Indiana might have quoted in favor of the idea that the people of Wisconsin were afraid of their militia. We had many years ago—my colleague will recollect him—an exceedingly illiterate, witty, and in many respects excellent man, who was adjutant-general of our State. Some of the wags of Madison got hold of him on one occasion and drew for him his report to the Legislature. They made him recommend an organization of the militia much more severe in its details than that of the regular Army. He recommended the purchase of cannon and muskets and pistols and everything else; and then, after going through the details of an organization as he would have it, he concluded his report by saying, that, thus organized, armed, and equipped, the militia of Wisconsin would be a terror to the world and to themselves also. [Laughter.] If my friend from Indiana had happened to have that report by him, he might have read that in connection with the militia law of our State to show that it was passed for the purpose of not having people terrified at the polls. [Laughter.]

But further answering my suggestion as to the purpose of the law of Wisconsin the Senator from Indiana proceeded as follows:

I will tell you when this statute was born—

Speaking of the statute of Wisconsin——

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will say, frankly, that I was mistaken as to the date of the law. I attributed it to a period when the public mind of Wisconsin was moved, as I thought, on kindred questions. The date of the law I find is far back of that to which I attributed it. That was an error on my part.

Mr. CARPENTER. In corroboration of the last statement of the Senator from Indiana, I will read what he did say and supply him with authority to sustain his present admission on the subject:

I will tell you when this statute was born. I have no fear of speaking plainly.

Let me stop here in candor and sincerity and applaud that Senator for that trait of his character. He does always speak plainly; he does always say what he means; he is never under the bush; he never need be hunted for; you know where to find him; you know what he is in favor of; you know where he is; and when he means that the President shall not suppress a riot at the polls by the use of the troops, he says so. I thank him for it. So far as he is concerned, we are relieved from all anxiety as to what is the meaning of this section. But the Senator proceeded:

I have no fear of speaking plainly. It was when that great sentiment for the liberty of another race sprang up in Wisconsin, when the fugitive-slave act in the Booth case was shaking the public mind, agitating the law-makers that were assembling together, exciting stalwart sentiments of liberty, when the Kansas trouble which invoked the use of the Army from another party that was then here in power gave warning to the young and rising State of Wisconsin, and her legislators went to a stout extreme the other way. That was the cause of this legislation that confronts the Senator from Wisconsin and compels him to make such an explanation as I regret to hear from his instructive lips.

Now, in point of fact, that act was embodied in the revision of our laws, in 1839. The section is not in precisely the same words; but in the revised statutes of 1839 it is as follows:

No parade or rendezvous of the militia shall be ordered on any day during which a general or special election shall be held, nor within five days previous to such election, except in cases of invasion or insurrection, or of imminent danger thereof; and if any officer shall order any such parade or rendezvous, he shall forfeit and pay to the people of this Territory the sum of $500.

The word "riot" is not in the act of 1839; it is in the last revision; and in 1839, speaking of that statute, it is to be borne in mind that that was the first attempt at any revision of our laws. We had lived before, subject to the jurisdiction of Michigan, indeed a part of the Territory of Michigan. Afterward the Territory of Wisconsin was organized, and this was the first revision ever attempted under the territorial authority of Wisconsin; but it was not original with us. It is copied almost verbatim from the Revised Statutes of New York. So that I will refer to that. The section in the New York law was passed in 1801, and is exactly the section found in the revision of 1878 of Wisconsin, except that the penalty is $500 in New York and is only $100 in Wisconsin. With that exception, the two sections are word for word identical. This is found, too, not in the New York election law, but in the laws of that State regulating the militia; providing for their being called out and drilled and disciplined and instructed, their going into camp, their training, and all that; and then comes a proviso that they shall not be mustered on any election day, nor five days previously thereto. In other words, this militia duty was not so important as to require citizens to be called away from the polls on election day, except in case of invasion or insurrection. The statute of Wisconsin excepts the case of a riot; and of course in such case, under the statute of Wisconsin, the troops could be marched to the polls. That is fairly implied from the section I have read. They could not be mustered or called out on election day, except in case of a riot, insurrection, or invasion; but in such case they could be called; and if that riot happens to be at the polls they could be called to assemble at the poll under that statute of Wisconsin. So that the Senator was entirely mistaken as to the time when the law of Wisconsin was passed, and he is entirely mistaken as to the purpose of that law.

Let me turn now to another provision of the Revised Statutes of New York. On page 427 of the first volume of Banks and Brothers' second edition of Revised Statutes of New York is the following:

SEC. 4. Whenever an election shall be held in any city or town, pursuant to this chapter, no declaration by which a suit shall be commenced, or any civil process, or proceeding in the nature of civil process, shall be served on any elector entitled to vote in such city or town, on the day on which such election shall be held.

SEC. 5. No court shall be opened, or transact any business, in any city or town, on the day such election shall be held therein, unless it be for the purpose of receiving a verdict or discharging a jury, and every adjournment of a court in such city or town, on the day next preceding the day any such election shall be held therein, shall always be to some other day than the day of such election, except such adjournment as may be made after a cause has been committed to a jury.

What was the object of that provision in the Revised Statutes of New York? Does anybody suppose the people of New York would be terrified by the sitting of a judicial court, appalled, overwhelmed, driven to shivering with fear, and would run away and not vote? No. The purpose of the provision was to let jurymen and witnesses and everybody in necessary attendance have that day to go to the polls and vote. Then when you get to the militia law of the State of New York, you find the provision that the troops may be called out and mustered and drilled and instructed, but they shall not be so called out on election day, nor for five days prior thereto. They might otherwise be called away from their homes to a distance, and this five days was to enable them to get back and transact their necessary business and be ready to go the polls. The most casual examination of these statutes taken in connection with the fact that they were passed in 1801, before any of these difficulties which have made us so loyal to the Government had occurred, and before any trouble existed, or had been heard of, or was apprehended in New York, or in any other State of the Union; long before the Kansas troubles, long before the troubles about the fugitive-slave law, and that they were passed as mere regulations of the militia, had nothing to do with the election laws, will establish the view I have taken of them. They are not classed as a part of the election laws in any State which I have seen. They are a part of the militia law of every State and they are a regulation of the power of these officers to call militiamen from their homes so as to prevent their attending the elections.

Now, Mr. President, passing to another subject. My learned friend sitting in front of me, the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] read me yesterday a very wholesome lecture on the subject of loyalty, and informed me of the ways in which this Government could be destroyed. I always listen to a teacher with attention and reverence just in proportion to his familiarity with the subject which he tries to teach. That Senator voted for the secession of Georgia, voted for the ordinance which took Georgia out of the Union; to do him justice, though, as he has stated and as I believe, after the convention had determined upon secession; so that he only participated in giving form and apt expression to the determination of the convention.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Only after it was settled.

Mr. CARPENTER. I say so, after it was settled; but the Senator did not stop with that. I am not blaming the Senator or criticising him. I am simply alluding now to the fact of his great qualification to instruct us as to what may break up a government. After Georgia seceded, if I am not mistaken, he became a leading member in the confederate senate. He was one of the advisers of Jeff. Davis as president of the confederacy. He was one of his right-hand men and bowers. For four years he had his hand on all the springs, and to be loyal to his position had to do everything in his power to break up this Government. It would be remarkable if, during those four years' experience, he had not learned the best ways to destroy this Government. I should, therefore, be a bad scholar, I should not exhibit that tractable disposition which every disciple should exhibit who would learn, if I did not sit at his feet and listen patiently when he enters upon the theme of the best way to break up this Government. The Senator thinks the best way to do it is not to fire on Fort Sumter. He is eminently sound there. That was the first lesson he got on the subject. The firing on Fort Sumter was the first thing that roused this nation, that fired the blood and stimulated the nerve and muscle of every northern man to the fixed purpose that that flag, which rebellion had fired upon, should be replaced upon the battlements of Fort Sumter and should wave as long as there was a man left to defend it. That was not a good way to break up this Republic. That was the Senator's first lesson on this subject.

If the Senators from the South had withdrawn from this body and the Representatives from the other House of Congress; had made no forcible opposition, had sat like school-boys, snlking with their fingers in their mouths, let the Government take them their mails, protect them from the Indians, aid them in facilitating commerce, they might have broken up this nation. It might have taken some time to do it; but they would have embarrassed the Government, worn out the people, and succeeded much better than they did when they fired on Fort Sumter and rallied in military array all over the South to put down the Government. And so the Senator says. He says you are to destroy this Government when you want to by non-action. That advice is entitled to great consideration, considering the source from which it comes. Non-action is to break up the Government, and we were informed here that, because we did not vote for this Army bill on Wednesday night after six o'clock, our refusing to vote was a revolutionary act, one step toward destroying this Government.

Mr. President, I entirely concur with the learned Senator, in regard to the manner in which this Government might be broken up, that it cannot be by action; it might be by non-action when applied to the proper subjects. If it be a question, for instance, of whether we shall enable the President to preserve the peace of the land on every day and every hour and in every place, if it be a question whether these Halls shall be filled with the representatives of all the States, then mere non-action is a means to break up the Government; but if the question be merely, whether we shall pass an appropriation bill on Wednesday or Thursday, which is not to take effect for two weeks yet, merely voting to adjourn on Wednesday after six o'clock would hardly be called unconstitutional, although it would obstruct legislation, because the Senate could not legislate after it had adjourned and dispersed. It would not be called an attempt to break up the Government. What took place was merely forcing an adjournment. The usual way of obtaining an adjournment failed. We tried that several times and it could not be carried. Most of the day had been employed by democrats in mere campaign speeches. After six o'clock had been reached we were required to go on with the discussion of this question that night. We wanted an adjournment. We could not get it in the usual way. We thought there was a way to get it, and we merely resorted to that way. We sat up with our democratic friends through the weary watches of the night, and on the following day, they returned to the traditional courtesy of the Senate; an adjournment was granted; and now we are able to discuss and vote upon this bill, with cool blood and in good temper.

I submit there was nothing revolutionary in that. And I submit to my learned friend from Georgia that he need have no apprehension that the Government is endangered by the fact that we are discussing this bill to-day instead of Wednesday night at midnight. But, Mr. President, let us come now to apply the sound and healthy doctrine of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] to the case in hand. Is there in this bill a studied attempt by non-action, by refusing to make appropriations, to take away from the President the power to perform any one function of the executive office? If that can be shown, then the Senator's authority is conclusive and his remarks entirely applicable to this bill; and such I maintain, and shall very briefly attempt to show, will be the effect of this bill if it shall be passed.

I believe the bill to be unconstitutional for that reason. If a State should refuse, contumaciously, persistently neglect, to send a Senator to this body, such non-action would be as unconstitutional as it would be for such State to pass a law that there should never be a Senator elected from the State. You may violate the Constitution by silence and by non-action as effectually as you can by action and by positive provisions in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution. A law of any State saying that no Senator should ever thereafter be elected to the Senate of the United States from that State, would be unconstitutional, because it would be in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution; but the non-action, the contumacious refusal to send a Senator, would produce the same effect and would be just as unconstitutional.

The provisions of the Constitution applicable to this subject omitting immaterial words are as follows:

The Constitution, article 1, section 8, provides "the Congress shall have power to raise and support armies;" "to provide and maintain a Navy;" "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union."

Article 2, section 2, provides that "the President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States," when called out to execute the laws of the Union. And that the President "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

These are the provisions of the Constitution. Now, should Congress refuse to raise an Army to protect the frontier of this country and to preserve peace within our dominions and to execute the laws, they would as palpably violate the Constitution as they could do by an affirmative act which came in direct conflict with the express provisions of the Constitution. The Constitution lays upon Congress a duty, and whether Congress refuses to perform it or neglects to perform it, makes no difference. In either case Congress has violated the Constitution, by omitting to perform a constitutional duty.

The section in regard to the militia shows that it was contemplated, and understood, to be constitutional to enforce the laws by military force when necessary. Referring back to the definition of the police powers, which was read from Bouvier's Law Dictionary, an administrative police is to prevent crime; a judiciary police is to punish those crimes which the administrative police have been unable to prevent. The cases falling within the jurisdiction of each police, are perfectly well understood. Suppose a mob to assemble around the house of any citizen in Washington for the purpose of murdering him, must the President, charged with the execution of the laws, wait until the laws are violated before his face, wait until the murder is committed, before he can intervene? He is the Commander-in-Chief of the military forces of the nation, and he may use them all, if necessary, to prevent such violation of the law as the commission of a murder here in the District of Columbia. Take a case in the States. Suppose a mob had assembled to prevent the transmission of the mail; does anybody doubt that the President could send a military force to disperse that mob? After a man had committed a murder and had been tried and sentenced to be hanged, and a mob should assemble to prevent his execution, nobody doubts the power of the President to call out the troops and employ as many as might be necessary to quell that riot and disperse that mob, and carry the sentence of the court into effect.

Suppose a riot in California, or suppose an organization armed and equipped for the purpose of driving every Chinaman out of that State in violation of our treaty with China, does anybody suppose that it would be the duty of the President to sit by and see that carried into effect, and see the Chinamen murdered, driven into the Pacific, or sent in any other way out of the State? Would it not be his duty to interfere by military force, if necessary, to disband such an organization and to execute the terms of our treaty with China?

There are things which, of course, cannot be done by military force. A murder may be committed. After its commission, it cannot be prevented. All that can be done is to punish it by the judiciary, and the military may be used, if necessary, to execute the punishment; but while it is a question of preventing the violation of law, and if the violation can be prevented then, it is as much the duty of the President to use military force to prevent a violation of the law as it is to execute any other law of the Union. So that, the employment of military force may be entirely proper and entirely constitutional to execute laws.

Now, Mr. President, I maintain that the first, the primal condition of executing the laws of any State or country is the preservation of the public peace. There is no doubt, I believe no question has been raised, of the constitutionality of those acts of Congress which regulate the time, place, and manner of holding elections for members of the House of Representatives. Nobody, it seems to me, can question the power of Congress to pass the laws which we have passed. They are as much laws of the United States as any others. They are laws which the President, by the Constitution, is charged with the duty of seeing executed; and, to enable him to execute those laws, he is made by the Constitution Commander-in-Chief of the Army and of the Navy and of the militia of the States, when they are called out to execute those laws. He is by law authorized to use the Army and Navy instead of calling the militia, as he was authorized to do by the early acts on this subject; and those laws are of the kind which can only be executed by previous care, and precaution. For instance, the election is to be held on a certain day: if there is an organization to prevent its being held on that day, it cannot be done on the next day, or in the next week. It is to be done that day, or never; and if the President is informed that there is a purpose to prevent its being held, by lawless violence, and to defeat the operation of the laws of Congress in that regard, it is his duty to preserve the peace at that place and to break up any such organization or combination to violate the laws, or at least to resist it in such attempt.

But, say our democratic friends here—and I treat them now as all deserving of the candor which the Senator from Indiana claims for himself and which must be awarded to him—the President shall not use the military of the nation to preserve the peace on election day, and yet the Constitution says the President shall take care that the laws of Congress in regard to elections shall be executed and carried into effect; and that he shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy to enable him to do so. Yet our democratic friends say that on election day riot may have its own way, and the President shall not be permitted to use the military power of the Government, to use the police force of the Republic, for the purpose of executing the laws in regard to elections! That they will not make, and in the bill before us they say they have not made, any appropriation to enable the President to perform this undoubted constitutional duty.

This is unconstitutional non-action. The very thing the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] from the depths of his experience on this subject, and after four years of constant effort to destroy this Government, says is the most effective way to accomplish that end.

Sir, I am willing to go to the people of Wisconsin and to the people of this country upon this question, whether the President shall have the power to preserve the peace and to suppress a riot on election day as well as on any and every other day of the year. That is the day above all others when we are interested in having the peace preserved.

Our democratic friends either go too far, or they do not go far enough. If, in this country, with all the safeguards of law and public sentiment that surround it, the Army of the nation is dangerous to free institutions, then they should cut it up by the roots and abolish it. When they refuse to abolish the Army, or neglect to do it, they admit that the Army is not dangerous to our liberties. If it be not, why may it not be used safely on election day as well as any other day? Why will our democratic friends insist here that, on that one day of the year no military force shall be called out or used to put down riot and rebellion, and the confusion and violence that may exist at the polls for the purpose of breaking up or controlling an election? Why, with all the charity that a Christian can have for a Christian, there is not a child ten years old that would not answer, because they do not wish to have peaceable elections. There can be no other answer. To say that the people are afraid, that the people dare not vote because soldiers are there to prevent violence, suppress a riot, and enable every man to do as he pleases, is trifling with the good sense of even the children of this land.

Mr. INGALLS. For a while, Mr. President, it appeared that the degraded device known to history as the electoral commission, which was accepted by each party with the hope that it would cheat the other, had resulted in defrauding both. But the events of the last two years, and notably of the present session of Congress, have unexpectedly vindicated the wisdom of that policy which, when it was adopted, was regarded by many as a surrender of principle, an abandonment of friends, and a falsification of history.

President Hayes has been the object of much assault during this debate; but he has at last rendered one signal and inestimable service to his party and his country. He has shown that the democracy in their professions and protestations are insincere and implacable. If he designed the result that has been accomplished, he is a consummate master of political strategy. If the end has been attained through the inexorable logic of events, our debt to him is not less. Whether he made the opportunity or the opportunity made him, is immaterial now.

Immediately upon his accession he began the labor of reconciliation. He announced that he was President of the country, and not of a party, and that he served his party best who served his country best. Surrounded by political visionaries and dreamers, sycophantic mercenaries and apostates from both parties, and subtle enemies in the disguise of advisers and friends, he yielded promptly to their suggestions that it was his mission to restore to the Republic the halcyon days of concord, harmony, and peace. He alienated the great body of his supporters by undisguised and futile efforts to propitiate his adversaries. Though Packard and Chamberlain received more votes in their States than the republican presidential electors in their respective States, yet he recognized Nicholls and Hampton as the lawful governors of Louisiana and South Carolina. He withdrew the soldiers from the conquered capitals to their barracks and garrisons.

He placed a representative southern democrat in his Cabinet; he appointed democrats to many important offices in Southern States; he extended the olive-branch; he preached the gospel of reconciliation, of forgiveness, of forgetfulness, and of love rather than that of hatred; he fanned no dying embers; he revived no dead issues; he appealed to no sectional animosity; he boldly recognized the courage and sincerity of the southern soldiery in their attack on the Union; he ceased to consult with the aggressive, stalwart leaders of northern opinion, and forfeited their confidence by his apparent concessions to the South.

Under his administration there has been no military or civil interference with elections in the South or elsewhere in this country. There have been no bayonets at the polls; local self-government, so called, in every State and locality has been restored; the last vestige of national intervention has been withdrawn; every complaint has had an attentive ear; every wrong has been redressed, and the "iron heel of depotism," about which we have heard so much, has been lifted from the prostrate and bleeding liberties of the people.

But what has been his recompense? How have his advances been met? What response has been made to his appeals for reconciliation? This debate may answer. The history is too recent to need rehearsal. When proceedings were instituted with the avowed purpose of impeaching his title to the Presidency, not a democrat, with perhaps a solitary exception, in either House of Congress denounced or voted against them. No censure has been too extravagant, no epithet too coarse, no comparison too degrading, no insult too intolerable to be addressed to him. And now when he presumes to exert an undeniable constitutional function in returning bills without his approval he is courteously described in debate and by the press as a fraud, a de facto President; that man; Rutherford the First; the man at the other end of the Avenue; and threatened with the non-payment of his salary if he refuses to surrender his convictions!

Congress has now been in session nearly three months, having been summoned by the President for the single purpose of making appropriations for the support of the Army and for the payment of the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year beginning July 1, 1879.

These bills were allowed to fail at the previous session, not for want of time—for there was an abundance of that—nor because there was factious opposition by republicans. But it was necessary upon some plausible pretext to profit without delay by the opportunity offered to the democrats to control the organization and patronage of the two Houses of Congress for the first time in eighteen years. They could not wait till December. So it was suddenly discovered that the liberties and rights of the people were in imminent danger and peril; that sundry despots and tyrants, notably, R. B. Hayes, Charles Devens, and John Davenport, were abroad in the land, trampling down the liberties of the people, destroying State governments, corrupting the fountains of justice, consolidating and centralizing our political system, and paving the way for despotism. There was much parade of English history in search of precedents and the Senator from Ohio finally formulated the situation by declaring that appropriations should not be granted unless grievances were redressed.

The grievances finally selected for redress were three in number, and found in certain provisions of the statutes of the United States permitting—

First. The challenge of jurors who aided, abetted, or sympathized with the rebellion, under the discretion of the court, in cases where justice would be promoted by their rejection. This grievance was formulated as the "exclusion of intelligence from the jury-box."

Second. The constitutional employment by the President of the armed forces of the United States to keep the peace at elections, whenever their use was necessary and lawful. This grievance was denominated as the use of "bayonets at the polls."

Third. The supervision of elections for members of Congress and presidential electors by the civil authorities of the United States for the prevention of fraud and violence. This grievance was denounced as "an invasion of the sovereignty of the States."

Those who have insisted upon the repeal of these provisions contend that they are irritating remnants of war legislation; that they have been perverted to partisan purposes and have been used to thwart rather than promote the expression of the popular will.

But it is evident, and the country will not fail to observe, that even were all these allegations true to the utmost that has been claimed by those who have sought to justify their attempted defeat of appropriations unless these obnoxious statutes were annulled, yet that the issue as presented at this time has been feigned and unreal, because there are no elections at which either the military or civil forces of the Government could be used during the period over which the appropriations would extend. They expire June 30, 1880, and there will be no elections of members of Congress or of presidential electors till November of that year. It is not pretended, it should be observed, that there has ever been any Federal intervention at purely municipal or State elections since the commencement of the present Administration.

The repeal of the statutes indicated has been opposed—

First. Because it was legislation upon general appropriation bills. But I attach no importance to this objection. The precedents are too numerous, and the practice too well established to admit of question now.

Second. Because the method of repeal was menacing to the minority in Congress, deprived the Executive of his independence, and abrogated a constitutional prerogative.

Third. Because the statutes themselves were beneficent and essential to the preservation of the essence as well as the form of civil liberty, and to the maintenance of the covenants of freedom and justice contained in the war amendments to the Constitution.

Upon these issues the bills were vetoed by the President, and failed to receive the majority required to pass them upon reconsideration. Thereupon a bill was passed extending the legislative and executive appropriations of the former fiscal years, with no political features whatever; a confused, incongruous measure, apologized for by its advocates; a weak device intended to conceal the defeat of the attempt to coerce the President.

A second bill was passed making appropriations for certain judicial expenses, as a separate measure; an unprecedented course, containing mischievous provisions, which have been aptly characterized as indecent and degrading to the administration of justice.

The third bill is now under consideration, making appropriations for the support of the Army for the ensuing fiscal year, and containing among other objectionable features the following section:

SEC. 6. That no money appropriated in this act is appropriated or shall be paid for the subsistence, equipment, transportation, or compensation of any portion of the Army of the United States to be used as a police force to keep the peace at the polls at any election held within any State.

The corresponding section in the vetoed bill is in these words:

SEC. 6. That section 2002 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States: Provided, That nothing contained in this section, as now amended, shall be held or deemed to abridge or affect the duty or power of the President of the United States, under section 5297 of the Revised Statutes, enacted under and to enable the United States to comply with section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, on application of the Legislature or executive, as provided for in said section."

And that section 5528 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"Every officer of the Army or Navy, or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States, shall be fined not more than $5,000, and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years."

In the one section are five lines and in the other section are twenty-seven lines. There is the same difference between these two sections that there is between a highway robber and a pickpocket. Both have larceny for their object, but their methods are unlike. One is open, courageous, and manly, and the other is not. The section in the first bill forbids an act, makes it illegal, and affixes a penalty. The second, now under consideration, endeavors to reach the same result by withholding appropriations, and concealing the purpose by the interpolation of a senseless sentence.

The words in this section claimed to be controlling are, "to be used as a police force," but in reality they are meaningless and delusive. They are thrown in as a sop to Cerberus. If those words were omitted the section would mean just the same as it does now, for neither under the Constitution nor under any law can the Army "be used as a police force" in the technical sense for any purpose whatever. The Army appropriation bill of last year prevents the Army from being used as a posse comitatus even to assist the civil authorities in case of open and violent resistance. The principle involved, therefore, is the same as that contained in the bill that has already been vetoed, and he who opposed one cannot consistently support the other.

Mr. President, the scenes that we have witnessed during the debate which has arisen on these issues have a dark and ominous significance. The discussion has been intense and violent beyond precedent. Its scope has embraced the whole theory and practice of our government from its inception through all its vicissitudes of war and peace. To the country it has been a revelation. The sonorous clamor and roaring declamation about the iron heel of Federal despotism, intelligence excluded from the jury-box, bayonets at the ballot-box, and the use of the Army to control elections has not deceived nor alarmed the people. They are aware that this combat between Congress and the Executive is not waged upon a point of legislative etiquette, and cannot be ended by an exchange of courtesies or compliments or apologies on either side. They regard the struggle as the initiation of a contest for political supremacy in the presidential campaign of 1880, which will be characterized by convulsive violence hitherto unknown in our history, and the last, I believe, to be waged between the two parties which now divide the country.

But because we opposed the repeal of the sections sought to be abrogated in the appropriation bills it is not true that we favor the exclusion of intelligence from the jury-box nor that we intend to use the Army or marshals or supervisors to control elections. The employment of the Army to control elections in Kansas did more to dethrone democracy and render it odious to the people than any other feature of its policy, and we should not be wise were we to fail to profit by the instruction of history.

It is not true that the sections sought to be repealed permitted the exclusion of intelligence from the jury-box, nor that they allowed the use of the Army at the polls, nor that they interfered with the right of any citizen to vote; nor is there evidence anywhere that any man entitled to vote has ever been prevented from voting by any soldier, marshal, or supervisor.

Thousands of aliens, repeaters, and felons have been arrested and punished for frauds attempted and perpetrated at elections; great cities and States have been rescued from degraded misrule, rapacious and ruffianly despotism, and threatened anarchy, by the operation of these beneficent statutes; but if any citizen has been denied under these statutes the opportunity to cast an honest ballot, by the Army or by the civil authorities of the United States, his name though often demanded has not yet appeared in this debate.

We have had surfeit of froth and rant about centralization, resistance to tyrants, and redress of grievances, but it has all been under the general count. Specifications are wanting. There is not a man in the United States, outside of Congress and the lunatic asylums, who believes that the liberties of forty-five million people are or can be endangered by the national Army. The brazen effrontery and hardihood of the pretense is only equaled by its grotesque and preposterous absurdity.

The American people have given too many convincing proofs of their vigilant love of liberty, of their capacity for self-government, and their unconquerable passion for justice, to require admonition from any quarter. If they are convinced that the effect of these statutes has not been wholesome and salutary; if it can be shown that they have been detrimental to society, or that they menace the rights of the humblest citizen, they will be eager to destroy them.

The senior Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] in a speech that he made during the debate, said truly that the people of this country want peace and prosperity. So they do, Mr. President, but there is one thing they want more than either, and that is—justice. They have hitherto made incredible sacrifices for justice. If need be, they are prepared to make still greater sacrifices hereafter. They are patient. They will not be persuaded by partisan assertions. They are slow to anger, but when discontent changes to resentment, nothing can retard the steps of vengeance and retribution.

They venerate constitutions; they obey laws; but above charters and statutes they revere the rights and liberties which these were ordained to establish and maintain. These rights have cost too much; they have been purchased too dearly to be surrendered, or compromised, or bartered, or jockeyed. There is no danger of bayonet rule, or Cæsarism, or the "man on horseback." They read the history of the past twenty years to little purpose who fail to learn that the American people prefer the wildest excesses of popular liberty to the calm stagnation of despotism, in whatever shape it may come or however placid, prosperous, and gilded it may be.

There is one great reservation of power to which reference has not been made in this debate, and which politicians are prone to omit in their calculations. The tenth article of amendments to the Constitution declares that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." Not, as the Senator from Maryland said, to the people "thereof," or "the people of the States," but to the people. This is the great power underneath and above and outside of and beyond the Constitution, competent to determine all questions that may arise and to deal with every exigency. It exists always, and at the proper moment will be invoked. Its exercise may be moderate and gradual, or it may be violent and excessive; but it will not fail in any emergency to announce and register the nation's will. When the Constitution ceased to express their convictions they amended it; and when its capacity for peaceful amendment was exhausted, the people amended it by the sword.

The amendments so secured were expensive. They cost 335,000 lives and billions of gold. They embody four fundamental ideas; universal freedom, national citizenship, the indissoluble union of the States, the supremacy of the nation. These are the ideas for which the people fought and against which the South contended, both claiming warrant under the Constitution. When the war closed we believed that the great arbitrament had decided that every man was free; that citizenship was a national attribute; that the Union was permanent; and that the authority of the nation was paramount and supreme.

We have lately read elaborate accounts of the dedication of a monument to the confederate dead at Winchester. It is stated that the confederate flag was conspicuously borne in the procession, and that the graves were profusely decorated with this emblem. The utterances of the orator, a Senator of the United States from the State of Alabama, which justified the objects and designs, and eulogized the leaders of the South, were loudly applauded and excited responsive enthusiasm.

No generous heart could refuse its tribute of sympathy to those who sought to commemorate valor and perpetuate the memory of heroes who fell in defense of any cause, whether right or wrong. But these solemnities had a wider scope. One of the monuments is said to be inscribed with the declaration that it is erected to the memory of those "who fell in defense of constitutional liberty and the sovereignty of the States between 1861 and 1865."

The orator of the occasion, among many similar declarations, said:

The demand of the South was simply that these rights and guarantees should be faithfully observed. They made no aggression upon the legal, moral, social, or political rights of any other section or State. Nothing that they demanded was liable to just censure. It was their homes and their wives and children and friends that were their stake in the war. Their homes they defended against desecration; their wives and children against insult and humiliation; their friends against wrong and injustice, and their country against invasion. For these they died. This is the whole story.

If this is the whole story, as told by the orator of the occasion at Winchester; if these brave but misguided men fell in defense of constitutional liberty, for what did the Union dead give up their lives? If the South were the champions of constitutional liberty, then when they surrendered, constitutional liberty fell. If the war was fought for the sovereignty of the States, as the inscription upon that monument declares, and its results are acquiesced in by the South, why is the dogma again asserted with such open and aggressive vigor and the supremacy of the nation so strenuously assailed and denied?

If the exercises at Winchester reflect the true sentiments of the southern people, and if the ideas there advanced are to be enforced by the triumph of the democracy, then the reaction will be complete. The dreams of Calhoun will be realized, posterity will revise the contemporaneous estimate of Wilkes Booth, and the war waged in defense of the Union and of the authority of the nation will be justly stigmatized as the greatest crime in the history of the human race.

The people of the North believe that the United States are a nation, not a mere association of incoherent political societies. The nation exists not at the pleasure of a State, nor of a majority of the States, nor of all the States, but by the will of a majority of all the people. Behind every citizen, black or white, at home or abroad, on land or sea, stands the nation, a potential, beneficent energy, pledged to protect him in the unrestricted exercise of all the rights of manhood and citizenship. None can be so humble, so obscure, so remote as to be alien from its blessings. If his rights are denied or infringed and reparation is refused, he can confidently appeal to the nation for restitution and redress.

The republican party does not deny nor assail the rights of the States. Had we desired to destroy the States, the war gave us the opportunity. There was a strong sentiment at the North that desired the obliteration of the revolted States, and demanded that they should be reduced to a territorial condition, to be readmitted to the Union under new names and with other boundaries. But the republican leaders conducted the war upon the constitutional theory that the States were indestructible and the Union indissoluble, and that when armed resistance to national authority ceased, the States would resume their wonted relations to the Government, subject to certain conditions, which were to be obligatory when voluntarily accepted in the manner prescribed by the Constitution.

The independence of the States is indispensable to our political system. To preserve national unity there must be both local self-government and personal liberty, for we are not a homogeneous people. The diversities of birth, climate, soil, production, and temperament forbid it. Maine and Louisiana have little in common. They require different social and political institutions. They are as unlike as England and Italy. A mean annual temperature of seventy degrees and a mean annual temperature of fifty degrees do not allow the same social, moral, intellectual, or political conditions. No rigid inflexible rule, emanating from centralized power, could be successfully applied to our vast and diverse dominions, and our political history has always moved in an orbit defined by the conflict between State and national authority. The contest arose when our Constitution was framed. It gave birth to our political system, which is unique and has neither model nor prototype. The questions growing out of slavery, finance, revenue, internal improvements, tariff, territorial acquisition, foreign policy, war, reconstruction, have all been incidental to the great strife which is still going on, and which will survive so long as our Government shall endure.

Many Senators have said that secession and the other sequences of the doctrine of State sovereignty for which the South contended were settled by the war and were dead. But I have listened carefully and sedulously to hear some one say that secession was wrong or that it had no warrant in the Constitution. But I have not heard that. If the right of secession existed before the war under the Constitution, it must exist now, for the Constitution has not been changed in this respect.

Men are not convinced because they are vanquished. Ideas are immortal and cannot be extinguished by force. War proves nothing except which side has the most endurance and men and money. It does not change the convictions of the combatants, and I doubt whether a State south of the Ohio River would vote for an amendment to the Constitution declaring that the Union is perpetual and indissoluble, and that the authority of the nation is the supreme law of the land. Secession was a mistake, not because it was unconstitutional but because it was unsuccessful; and the people observe with alarm the renewed assertion of those pernicious doctrines which have resulted in such immeasurable disaster and ruin.

Much has also been said in this discussion about sectional hate and the resurrection of issues that were in their grave. But there is no sectional hate in the North; nothing but cordial kindness and goodwill, and an earnest, heartfelt desire for fraternity, union, and peace.

Mr. RANSOM. Would it interrupt the Senator for me to call his attention to the constitution of North Carolina?

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir; I would be glad to hear it.

Mr. RANSOM. It is not in reference to what the Senator is now saying, but in regard to a proposition he stated a moment ago. This is the constitution of North Carolina which was ratified in 1868, and this part of it reaffirmed in 1875:

SEC. 4. That this State shall ever remain a member of the American Union; that the people thereof are a part of the American nation; that there is no right on the part of this State to secede, and that all attempts, from whatever source or upon whatever pretext, to dissolve said Union or to sever said nation ought to be resisted with the whole power of the State.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I am exceedingly glad to hear that, and I am obliged to the Senator from North Carolina for calling my attention to it. It gives me sincere pleasure to know that in the constitution of one of the revolted States there has been a recognition of the indissolubility of the American Union, of the supremacy of the national authority.

If it be true that that is the case, then the representatives upon this floor and in the other House from the State of North Carolina could not, it appears to me, logically deny the authority of Congress to pass an act authorizing the President under proper circumstances not only to use the Army but all the national authority for the purpose of maintaining the Constitution and preserving the laws of this country upon election day and at the polls as well as upon every other day in the year and at every other place in the land.

The observation that I made with regard to the condition of public sentiment in the South was derived from conversations with several Senators upon that subject, who assured me in response to an expression of wonder when this great question was before the people of the country, when it was admitted that the war was fought for the preservation of the Union and to denounce and destroy the idea that the Union could be destroyed, why it was that an amendment had not been offered to the Federal Constitution declaring that the Union of States was permanent, indestructible, and indissoluble, stated to me that in case such an amendment were now to be offered they believed it would be rejected by the people of their States as a device on the part of the republicans for the purpose of accomplishing some political result.

But to return, Mr. President, I was saying that there is no sectional animosity or hatred in the North toward the people of the South. What has the North ever done that could be said to have been actuated by sectional hate? To what appeal for aid or sympathy have they not responded? What southern man has ever been abused, or insulted, or maltreated in the North, as multitudes of northern men have been in the South, before and since the war? What sectional hate was exhibited in the terms of capitulation, in amnesty, in restoration to forfeited political rights, in the rehabilitation of the State governments? What just cause of complaint to-day can be urged by the South? What right is denied them? How are they oppressed? In what respect are they not the peers and equals of the loyal States? They have absolute control of their local affairs. They have practically a majority in both Houses of Congress. The chieftains who led their legions with insolent menace against the capital of the nation now sit in its legislative Halls, control its revenues, direct its policy, and claim to be the exclusive champions of constitutional liberty, the preservers of the Union, and the sole guardians of the rights of the people. They eulogize Jefferson Davis as the equal of Lincoln and the peer of Washington and Hampden, and then ask us to let by-gones be by-gones and the dead past bury its dead. New England is denounced as the birth-place of slavery and secession. The republican party is habitually assailed with loose, coarse, and intemperate denunciation, and any attempted reply is characterized as preaching the gospel of hatred. There is a touch of grim humor about the proceeding, like that engendered by the spectacle of the intimidated southern voter who, with a mask upon his face, a pair of revolvers at his waist, a bowie-knife in each boot, and a double-barreled shot-gun over his shoulder, indignantly insists upon the adoption of the sixth section of the Army bill and protests against armed interference at the polls!

No, Mr. President, there is no hate at the North, and no fear, and no prejudice. There is much patient toleration. But this session of Congress has engendered a very grave and serious distrust of the methods, the tendencies, and the purposes of the apostles of this new political dispensation. There is no disposition to judge the South harshly. It was not to be expected that the tremendous passions aroused by the war, the trepidation of the vanquished, the baffled ambitions of its leaders, and all the baleful agitations of that awful tragedy should instantaneously subside and disappear. The South has exhibited many high qualities of courage and endurance. There has been less of turbulence and disorder than might have been anticipated. The conditions of restoration have been ostensibly accepted. The revolted States have resumed their relations to the Government and, with their obsequious allies, have obtained control of both Houses of Congress.

If these results have been reached through constitutional, just, and lawful means, if suffrage has been protected, if education has been universal, if freedom of speech and opinion has been maintained, if equal rights have been enforced and justice impartially administered, there can be no cause for discontent in the loss of political supremacy. Majorities must rule. We made the terms. We must accept the consequences.

But the events of the past two years have begun to provoke incredulity. There are some who suspect that the sacred covenants of freedom and the solemn guarantees of the Constitution have not been observed with absolute fidelity. It is vaguely rumored that under the pernicious pretext of State sovereignty bloody tyrannies have been builded on the ruins of liberty, and that white minorities have suppressed black majorities by premeditated violence and systematic slaughter and assassination. Evidence has been offered tending to show that "home rule," literally interpreted, means the right to murder with impunity, and "local self-government" the right to reduce the freedmen to a servile condition that has all the horrors with none of the alleviations of slavery. The only answer to these allegations has been a denial or a sneer. All attempts to invoke the intervention of the nation in behalf of those whom it is under the most sacred obligation to protect are denounced as an invasion of the rights of the States. The purpose is boldly avowed to deprive the Federal courts of their jurisdiction, to practically annihilate the Army, and to hinder, hamper, impede, embarrass, and obstruct the exertion of the Federal authority in every manner within the limits of the States; to strip and divest the Government of all national attributes; to make it a name, a shadow, an effigy,

An idle Jove,
With painted thunder in its hand.

There is one other topic to which I will advert in closing, craving the indulgence of the Senate for trespassing so far upon their patience at this period of the debate; but I do this because the subject is one that peculiarly affects my own State and people, and because they have been unjustly stigmatized during this debate as participants in a political scheme to harass and injure the South—a statement which I mention only to denounce and deny. I allude to the departure of the negro from the South, popularly known as "the exodus." Several Senators have taken the opportunity to say that the movement was stimulated for sinister purposes by northern politicians who had dispatched their emissaries into the Southern States, pandering to the ignorance and cupidity of their victims.

Against these assertions I will call the attention of the Senate to the statements of leading democratic newspapers recently published in relation to the causes and consequences of this migration. I read from the New Orleans Times. I do not know whether that is a strictly democratic paper, but I suppose it to be. It says:

Why in the world can we not be honest and truthful to ourselves about this matter? Why not recognize the evil, acknowledge its causes, appreciate its seriousness, understand the necessity of averting and checking the movement which threatens to impoverish the fairest portion of the State? The Times has already pointed out the necessity of local organization of the planters in parishes interested, with the view of inspiring confidence in the minds of the people who are affected by this epidemic, for in every sense it is that. When a prudent physician desires to remove a disease from the body he seeks the cause of the ailment and aims to remove that. Let our planters understand that the negroes are leaving their homes because they fear and believe that their political, civil, and personal rights are in danger. Let these suspicions be removed, and the exodus will cease.

In a late editorial the same paper says:

We might ask them—

That is, the people of Mississippi—

We might ask them whether there are no fertile and favored districts liable to be abandoned by the laboring classes because the solid and substantial citizens, whose interests are at stake, are too blind or too timid to do what the people of Lincoln County have just done? There are landless and penniless office-seekers who have nothing to lose, and who can afford to say of the negroes "let them go." But we are not addressing our suggestions to them. We have heard enough, and far more than enough, from them. It is our sorrow and our curse that such men have been doing the bulk of the talking for lo these many years. What we desire is that the men who own the property, who represent the interests, and who bear the risks and the consequences, shall consider whether there are not some neighborhoods where it behooves them to take pattern by "Beat Five" and to take up arms against the ruffians and cut-throats who are ruining them and disgracing civilization.

The Memphis Avalanche, a Tennessee paper, said to be democratic, referring to the movement of the colored people, says:

The incendiary teachings of the Bourbon press and politicians have furnished in great part the material now feeding the emigration movement that so alarms the planters of the Mississippi Valley. These presses and politicians have taught only bitterness. They marked for social proscription all who refused to submit without question to their partisan guidance. This became the partisan creed. The brunt of their denunciation fell on the colored people. The lawless classes were but too ready to begin the dastardly work of persecution. They found it a certain means of suppressing the ballot. They inaugurated reigns of terror, shot and killed where shooting became necessary, and so preyed on the fears of the unprotected blacks as to practically disfranchise them in every locality where the bulldozing programme was adopted. And the Bourbon presses and publications, instead of demanding protection for all classes under the laws, pronounced all charges falsehoods, and at least indirectly encouraged the dastards to further deeds of violence. This is the truth, and the truth should be told.

The Vicksburgh Herald, another democratic paper, in an article concerning the late Vicksburgh convention and the fears expressed lest it should drift into politics, said just before the convention assembled:

These gentlemen are distressed lest the convention drift into politics. We want to ask them what politics has to do with a pernicious credit system, or a gambling system of furnishing supplies on a growing crop. They know the systems of which we speak; let them answer. We want them to tell us what politics has to do with armed men going about at night-time forcing laborers to leave their homes, as was recently done in Hinds and Wilkinson Counties, and has been done in several of the counties and parishes of this State and Louisiana. If putting down this sort of thing will hurt either party, we say let it hurt.

Senator BRUCE, of Mississippi, the only colored member of the present Congress, has written a letter on this subject, in which he says:

The causes promoting this movement are complex and multiplied; but from the best information that I can obtain the exodus of the colored people from the South is referable mainly to two considerations: first, the feeling of insecurity and uneasiness among the colored classes springing from the unfortunate race collisions and violence that have sometimes existed in certain southern localities; and, second, from the fact that the colored laborers have not in many instances received satisfactory returns from the products of their labor.

Of similar import is this statement from the Charleston News and Courier:

When three thousand negroes are on the bank at one place on the Mississippi awaiting transportation to Kansas it is useless to speak of the movement as sporadic and unimportant. Like an army, the negroes will pass over the bodies of those who fall by the way and make of the vanguard a bridge to bear the rest of the column in safety. In freedom confronted by hard work and small pay they long for a new deliverance, whether it shall come in the shape of Liberia with its molasses trees or Kansas with its golden grain. It will take time to overcome this fallacy, if it can ever be overcome; for to the negroes the supremacy of the democrats in the South is a cause for uneasiness, if not of alarm. Curiously enough, there is a steady flow of colored people from other counties to Beaufort County, the only county in this State which the democrats did not carry at the last election.

Against the assertions that have been made here as to the origin of this movement, I place these declarations from well-known newspapers published in the localities where these outrages have occurred. If these declarations are true, then the exodus of the negro is a fact of supreme significance. He is not needed for political purposes in the States to which he goes. The republican majority in Kansas is too large for the good of the party now. He does not belong to the North; left to himself, he would remain in the tropics.

Migration is governed largely by climate, and the negro would gravitate naturally toward the equator rather than toward the poles. The tranquil and orderly dignity with which he has accepted the trusts and responsibilities of citizenship has defeated the prophecies and challenged the admiration of mankind. Had he been turbulent and disorderly when enfranchised, our system could not have endured the introduction of such an element of uneducated suffrage. During the war he was loyal and faithful. He did not pillage nor plunder the estates that he tilled, nor insult nor wrong the helpless women and children who were at his mercy while his masters were delivering desperate battle to rivet more firmly the fetters that bound him. Emancipated, he has retained the typical virtues of his race and has gradually discarded the vices that were engendered by the cruel code of which he was the reluctant victim. He has been patient of labor and obedient to law. He has in many instances acquired home and property. His domestic relations have become more definite and he has sought with avidity the rudiments of education for himself and his children.

Probably there is not a former master nor a freedman who wishes slavery restored; but there are many who believe, and I am one of them, that the Africans are in a worse condition now than when they were slaves. Emancipation has been a curse to them. The promise of freedom has been kept to their ear, but broken to their hope. When they were property they had some guarantee of protection in the selfishness of their owners. Now that they are men, they are denied the right to protect themselves and refused the protection of the nation. Land monopoly, a vicious credit system, social intolerance, and political proscription have combined to render their servitude unendurable, and when they attempt to escape, their flight is obstructed, and those who would welcome the fugitives and insure them the free enjoyment of citizenship are denounced as incendiaries and characterized as the enemies of the southern people.

Mr. President, the present aspect of affairs is in many respects deplorable. Were it to continue for any protracted period the gravest consequences might be apprehended. But the admirable flexibility and strength of our Government and the wisdom of its framers receives a new illustration at this serious juncture.

The next census will readjust the social and political forces of this country upon a basis which will finally determine the sectional controversies which have so long disturbed its peace and delayed its prosperity.

Upon the present ratio of representation the great interior States drained by the Missouri River and its affluents will gain under the next apportionment not less than fifty-two members of Congress and presidential electors.

Ohio, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Nebraska, Colorado, and Kansas alone will have at least twenty Representatives more than all the Southern States combined. Under a just distribution of political power among the States, as contemplated by the Constitution, the issues would have been entirely changed. Had a new apportionment been made operative in 1875 even, the condition of the nation at this time would have been radically different.

There would have been no electoral commission. There would have been no "solid South," for when southern solidity cannot secure democratic ascendency, the South will cease to be solid. Political cohesion will end. Parties will divide there as elsewhere upon economic and practical, rather than emotional questions, affecting the whole people rather than a section or a State.

We are on the threshold of a new epoch. With the close of the Forty-seventh Congress the seat of political power will be transferred from the seaboard to that vast region between the Appalachians and the Cordilleras, extending from Manitoba to the Gulf. Upon this theater the great drama of American civilization is to be enacted, and there its ultimate destiny will be accomplished.

Hitherto the controlling influences have proceeded from the circumference of the continent. They will emanate hereafter from its center. Relieved from exterior causes of estrangement, the States of that great basin, united by twenty-five thousand miles of navigable inland waters, by indissoluble ties of mutual interest, and by patriotic devotion to the welfare of the country, will inevitably coalesce and give a new impulse and direction to national growth and development.

It is idle to anticipate revolution, separation, or disunion. Geography has much to do in shaping the destiny of political societies and kingdoms. This continent was formed to be the abode of one nation, a people indivisible, one in language, motive, and impulse, having one civilization and absolute political liberty. Local causes may distract and delay the accomplishment of this great design, but at last the coalition will be complete; from diversity will come unity, from conflict will come strength and peace.

Mr. HAMPTON. Mr. President, I did not wish to interrupt the Senator from Kansas in the course of his remarks, but I should like now to ask him a question. Before I do so, I should be glad to correct a mistake into which he has fallen. I can do that best by reading one or two articles from the constitution of South Carolina:

Every citizen of this State owes paramount allegiance to the Constitution and Government of the United States, and no law or ordinance of this State in contravention or subversion thereof can have any binding force.

SEC. 5. This State shall ever remain a member of the American Union, and all attempts, from whatever source, or upon whatever pretext, to dissolve the said Union, shall be resisted with the whole power of the State.

Mr. INGALLS. May I ask the Senator from South Carolina the date of the constitution from which he reads?

Mr. HAMPTON. It is the constitution of the State.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the date of the instrument from which the Senator reads? When was it adopted?

Mr. HAMPTON. In 1868.

Mr. INGALLS. I apprehend that constitution was framed by the negroes of South Carolina, and was adopted when the republican party was in power.

Mr. HAMPTON. It is the constitution of the State now. If the Senator will allow me, I will now give a few words from the oath of office which every one has to take there:

I recognize the supremacy of the Constitution and laws of the United States over the constitution and laws of any State; and that I will support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of South Carolina, as ratified by the people on the 16th day of April, 1868. So help me God.

I took that oath when I was elected governor. It was upon that point I wished to ask the Senator from Kansas one question.

Mr. INGALLS. Before the Senator proceeds, will he allow me to ask if that oath is not the same oath that was taken by the citizens of South Carolina elected to office before the war?

Mr. HAMPTON. I do not know whether it is exactly the same or not. I have only read from the constitution to show that the objection the Senator made was not valid in regard to what had been put into the constitution of South Carolina.

But if I understood the Senator aright, and if not I hope he will correct me, he said in the course of his remarks that Mr. Chamberlain received more votes than myself for governor, and that Mr. Hayes received less than Mr. Chamberlain.

Mr. INGALLS. What I said was that although Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Packard received more votes in their respective States than the republican electors for President and Vice-President, after his accession to office President Hayes promptly recognized Mr. HAMPTON and Mr. Nicholls, respectively, as governors of the States of South Carolina and Louisiana.

Mr. HAMPTON. I think if the Senator will refer to his remarks as he had them written, he will find that he said also that Mr. Chamberlain received more votes than I did.

Mr. INGALLS. Oh, no; I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. HAMPTON. Very well; I accept that.

Mr. INGALLS. I spoke with great deliberation and with a design to be accurate, because the statement was one of considerable importance and referred to a historical matter about which I could not well afford to be inaccurate.

Mr. HAMPTON. I am very glad the Senator has said that; and I propose to show him how inaccurate he was. Mr. Chamberlain received 91,127 votes; I received 92,261; and the average vote of the republican electors was 92,104. That was the average: some of them received more than that. Thus by that showing Mr. Hayes received more votes than Mr. Chamberlain did.

Mr. INGALLS. From what return does the Senator from South Carolina read? I understand there was a very material change made in the return as compared with the actual vote that was cast.

Mr. HAMPTON. I am reading from the returns of the committee that went down there and from the official returns.

Mr. INGALLS. I still believe as a matter of history that Mr. Chamberlain received more votes for governor of South Carolina than the presidential republican electors received in that State at that election.

Mr. HAMPTON. I have given the returns of the vote. There never was any claim anywhere on the face of the earth that Mr. Chamberlain received more than 91,127 votes. Upon that there could be no mistake, because in that State the returns for governor and lieutenant-governor are sent sealed to the speaker of the house, opened by him and announced by him, and those votes did not go before the returning board. The returning board had nothing to do with those returns, but did give the return of the presidential electors, and if that return had been fairly made it would have shown a very different result.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand that there were two counts in South Carolina, one made by the returning board, and one made under the direction of the Legislature, and that the disclosure of the actual number of votes cast at the polls at the election will verify the statement that I made.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, in order to vindicate the truth of history by the facts, and the real facts, in regard to the negro exodus, I venture at this late stage of the debate to inject a slight amount of testimony in addition to that already given to the country by the Senator from Kansas. I live in the immediate vicinity of that Senator; I live upon the borders of the State of Kansas; and it was upon my city, the place of my residence, that this exodus from the Southern States was thrown with all its fury. I happen to know personally something in regard to the true inward history of this remarkable movement. The Senator from Kansas has painted to us in glowing terms, as was done once before on this floor, the misery and the wrong inflicted upon the colored people of the South. Southern men, armed with shot-guns, rusty sabers, bowie-knives of the most fabulous length and ferocity, are paraded until the terrible picture drawn by the Scotch poet in Tam O'Shanter of the witch's den sinks into insignificance compared with the terrible and monstrous picture drawn also by the imagination.

I assert that it is simple and pure fancy. I assert, before I read the evidence, that the negroes were induced to leave the South and flee to Kansas under false representations made to them that the Government of the United States had provided an Arcadia flowing with milk and honey, filled with fat opossums and accessible 'coons, and no labor—everything that makes up a negro's Utopia. They went there believing that Kansas was an ideal land in which there was sunshine and eternal exemption from labor. I send to the Clerk's desk a circular which I received on a late visit to the State of Kansas, in the town of Wyandotte, from one of the leaders of the negro exodus, a colored man, who told me with his own lips that this induced him to go to Kansas, and who denounced the miserable villainy that had been perpetrated upon him. Let the Secretary read that circular, which was distributed throughout the South.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[Strictly private.]

ATTENTION COLORED MEN!

OFFICE OF COLORED COLONIZATION SOCIETY,
Topeka, Kansas, February 2, 1872.

Your brethren and friends throughout the North have observed with painful solicitude the outrages heaped upon you by your rebel masters, and are doing all they can to alleviate your miseries and provide for your future happiness and prosperity. President Hayes, by his iniquitous southern policy, has deserted you, while the democrats, who now have control of Congress, will seek to re-enslave you if you remain in the South, and to protect you from their designs, the Colonization Society has been organized by the Government to provide land for each head of a family, which will be given in bodies of one hundred and sixty acres gratuitously. This land is located in the best portion of Kansas, in close proximity to Topeka, and is very productive. Here there is no distinction in society, all are on an equality. Leave the land of oppression and come to free Kansas.

LYCURGUS P. JONES, President.

Show this circular to none but colored men and keep its contents secret.

Mr. INGALLS. I pronounce that paper a forgery, a fabrication, and a fraud invented for precisely the same purpose for which it has been used to-day, and that statement is susceptible of abundant proof. No such document as that ever emanated from Topeka or from any part of the State. The whole thing is simply a secondary invention, thrown out for the purpose of casting suspicion and imputation upon the people of my State and others where these men have been welcomed. In reply to it, and in reply to the assertion of the Senator from Missouri that these men were beguiled away by the promise of a land where

Softer suns dispense serener light,
And milder moons imparadise the night,

I want to call the attention of the Senator to the declaration in those newspapers that I read, that are not denied, whose authority is admitted, and that stand as reputable representatives of the democratic party in the States of Mississippi, Louisiana, and Tennessee. Look upon this picture and then on that.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, for the first time in my political life I hear from a politician and a lawyer of experience quotations from partisan papers to prove facts.

Mr. INGALLS. On your own side.

Mr. VEST. If one-tenth part of what the gentleman's own papers say about him in the State of Kansas is true, he would occupy a very different position.

Mr. INGALLS. That is the retort courteous.

Mr. VEST. No, sir; it is a retort proper, because they have said the same thing of every Senator, I presume, upon this floor. I simply go to the very marrow of the gentleman's statement by saying that what a newspaper in these days will not assert cannot be conjectured by mortal man. It is no answer, sir.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to ask his attention to a statement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) Does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator allow me to direct his attention to the statement of a southern man resident in New Orleans, Mr. Foote, eminent throughout the country, addressing a southern labor convention at Vicksburgh?

Mr. VEST. Did I catch the name? Was it Governor Foote?

Mr. McMILLAN. Foote.

Mr. VEST. Henry S. Foote?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; we have heard of Governor Foote.

Mr. McMILLAN. Before a convention in regard to this very southern labor in a Southern State and assented to and recognized in their resolutions——

Mr. VEST. I had the honor, whatever gentlemen may think of it on the other side, of serving in the confederate congress with Governor Foote. He had the same extraordinary facility then of being on one side and talking on the other side, that he has now. [Laughter.] He is now an appointee of President Hayes, confirmed by a confederate Senate, and has taken up his residence in the city of New Orleans as director of the mint.

Mr. BLAINE. "Confirmed by a confederate Senate?" [Laughter.]

Mr. VEST. By this Senate. [Great laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will observe order.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator says he was confirmed by a confederate Senate.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, if I have heard one thing since I have been on this floor, it has been from the Senator from Maine that this was the confederate Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. And the gentleman now owns that it is. [Laughter.]

Mr. VEST. No, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. I am glad to be vindicated by the testimony of so valuable a witness.

Mr. VEST. I used the word "confederate" in juxtaposition to my statement that Governor Foote had been a member of the confederate congress, and I answer the gentleman by stating that he has made the charge over and over again that this was the confederate Senate and controlled by confederate influence. I know that it is not true, and I know that the gentlemen on this side of the Chamber who sit around me are as true to their oaths to support the Constitution and the Union of the States as the gentleman from Maine or any Senator who sits upon that side of the Chamber. The Senator from Maine is apt in his play upon words, and he seeks nothing better than a syllable out of which to make a harangue to fire the Northern heart and bring about a republican victory.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope the honorable Senator from Missouri will never say that I called this a confederate Senate. I said it was the United States Senate controlled by confederates. That is what I said.

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; I understand. If it were ruled by the true and gallant and honest men who risked their lives and all they had for the people with whom they lived, what a slur that would be upon this Senate! It would be ruled by gentlemen, by true men, and by brave men, and the country would be safe in their hands under their oaths of office.

Mr. President——

Mr. WINDOM. Before the Senator leaves the question of the exodus, I should like to get back to it a moment and ask him if he ever read a memorial prepared by citizens of Saint Louis and signed by many of its leading citizens?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir, I read it. It was referred to on this floor by the Senator from New York, who stated at the time that the democratic mayor of Saint Louis had signed it.

Mr. CONKLING. Did he not?

Mr. WINDOM. Does the Senator dispute it?

Mr. VEST. He was never a democrat, never any more a democrat than the Secretary of the Interior. [Laughter.] He belongs to the same party with the Secretary of the Interior. If the Secretary of the Interior is a democrat, the mayor of Saint Louis is. That is the nearest approach he ever made to our party.

Mr. WINDOM. Has he not frequently acted with the democratic party, and is he not recognized generally as a democrat?

Mr. VEST. He was elected mayor of the city of Saint Louis upon what was called the people's ticket.

Mr. WINDOM. Was it mainly composed of democrats or of republicans?

Mr. VEST. Well, sir, he was elected by both democrats and republicans, but never as a democrat; I speak of his distinctive political character.

Mr. WINDOM. I will ask the Senator if he observed that Judge Dillon and a very large number of leading citizens of Missouri signed that memorial?

Mr. VEST. If Judge Dillon was ever a democrat, I have always been a republican.

Mr. WINDOM. I did not ask if he was a democrat.

Mr. VEST. I speak of Judge Dillon with great respect, for I take now this opportunity of saying that I have practiced law before him for years, and no words could express my high admiration for his virtue and his official character; but he is a strong partisan, belonging to the stalwart school to which the gentleman belongs.

Mr. WINDOM. Then the gentleman would believe him if he happened to be a republican even?

Mr. VEST. Not in politics; no, sir. [Laughter.] I would take his personal statement just as soon as that of any man; but not where the great banner of the republican party is unfurled.

Mr. WINDOM. So the Senator does not believe the statement made by a hundred leading citizens of Saint Louis on this subject?

Mr. VEST. I read that statement and I know how it happened to be got up; and since the gentleman has alluded to it, I take pleasure in giving him information. In this very Senate Chamber, sitting within a very few feet, at the time, of the Senator from Maine, I asked Ex-Senator Henderson, who was named also as one of the signers of that instrument, in regard to the truth of the instrument, how he happened to sign it; and he said to me that he never saw the negroes, that he knew nothing personally about the facts, and he signed it upon the request of political associates, notably General John W. Noble, of the city of Saint Louis, a most devoted partisan. That paper was got up, and I charge it here, for political purposes; and I charge more, that the men, whether they are here or elsewhere, who induced these negroes to leave their homes in the South, where God and nature intended them to live——

Mr. WINDOM. Where men will not permit them to live in safety.

Mr. VEST. If the gentlemen would let the negroes alone, they would stay there in peace and plenty; but for political purposes they go to the South or send their emissaries there to teach the negroes that there is another land where no labor will be required, where peace and plenty are to prevail the whole year throughout, and they tell them if they remain in the South they are to be sold into slavery, and that this Congress proposes to sell them into slavery.

The Senator from Kansas denounces this circular as a fraud and forgery. Sir, I doubt very much the correctness of that assertion. I state here that I obtained it from a negro who said it was delivered to him. I will not go further, and imitate the example of distinguished Senators on that side of the Chamber, and quote the testimony of these negroes. Various reports have been read from by distinguished Senators, in which field-hands at the South, semi-barbarous negroes, took away the character of the southern people, and stamped them as assassins, and scoundrels, and murderers. I will not emulate that example. If I did, I have the testimony of the leaders of this negro exodus, who stated that they were induced to go to Kansas by Senators on this floor, and that they were induced to go there under false representations. Now, sir, the Senator from Kansas says that this picture of mine in regard to the representations of an Arcadia existing in Kansas is simply my own imagination. Mr. President, it is easy for the gentleman to denounce this circular; it is easy for him to tell me that it is a fraud and a forgery of Lycurgus P. Jones.

Mr. INGALLS. There is no such man.

Mr. VEST. Very good. He stated that as an evidence of the fact that it is a forgery. If so, it was manufactured and sent to the South for the purpose of inducing the negroes to go to Kansas when there was not one particle of truth in it at the time.

But I now come to another document, and I want to hear the gentleman denounce this as a forgery. I live within a few hundred yards of the town of Wyandotte; I know the men who signed this paper, and I ask the Secretary now to read in corroboration of what I have said, the following proclamation signed by leading republicans in the town of Wyandotte, showing under what representations the negroes were induced to go to Kansas, and branding as a fraud, branding as a piece of unadulterated villainy, the whole scheme from beginning to end. Let the Secretary read that proclamation. I know the men who signed it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A protest of the people of Wyandotte, Kansas, concerning the negro immigration.

To the people of the United States:

Within the past two weeks over a thousand negroes direct from the South have been landed at Wyandotte. None of them have money to carry them further west or to purchase the wherewithal to supply their most urgent necessities for food or shelter. But few of them are sufficiently protected from the inclemency of the weather, and on account of exposure, want of proper food, care, and medicine they suffer severely, and a terrible mortality affects them. Large numbers have died, and at least 5 per cent. of the whole number are sick with pneumonia and kindred complaints. In a word, over a thousand paupers have within a brief space of time been thrown into a town of about five thousand people, who are unable to properly provide for their wants.

These people are possessed of the most visionary ideas concerning what they must confront by coming to Kansas. Their sole idea seems to be to get West where Government lands can be occupied, but they are wholly destitute of means to improve it or to sustain themselves until they can cultivate a crop. Go where they will in Kansas, they must be provided and cared for or they will perish. We have reliable information that thousands more are coming. If so, the situation will soon be a very serious one for the deluded, helpless, and ignorant negroes who are thus blindly rushing to Kansas, and a mighty burden will be thrown upon our people. There is not sufficient demand for farm labor to give employment to such a mass of people. They must become virtually a public charge upon the communities where they may happen to be cast.

In view of this state of facts we, the undersigned, citizens of Wyandotte, Kansas denounce those who are encouraging these people to come to Kansas as really their worst enemies, whatever their intentions may be. We call upon humane and reflecting people everywhere to use their best efforts to check this most disastrous movement on the part of the negro population of the Southwest, and to correct the utterly baseless and visionary ideas concerning what is before the negro immigrant in Kansas, which seems to have taken hold on the minds of the thousands who are leaving their southern homes. We further say that the sentiments of this protest and memorial are those of the people of Kansas without regard to party; and we request papers throughout the country to publish this, our protest and warning.

J. S. Stockton, mayor of Wyandotte; Ant. Kuhls, Catholic priest; V. J. Lane; R. E. Cabe, probate judge; N. Cree, attorney; James S. Gibson, county attorney; William Albright, deputy county treasurer; S. Perkins, county commissioner; Perley Pike, county commissioner; E. R. Emmons, county clerk; W. H. Ryus, sheriff; G. H. Miller, superintendent institution for blind; J. S. Clark, register of deeds; H. M. Northrup, banker; George W. Betts, clerk of district court; J. A. Hale, city attorney; R. B. Armstrong, member of Kansas Legislature; E. L. Buesche, merchant; S. F. Mather, druggist; B. Judd, ex-senator; I. B. Sharp, attorney; F. B. Anderson, justice of the peace; J. M. C. Louther; W. P. Brush, school-teacher; H. L. Alden, attorney; E. Sprague; Byron Sherry, attorney; H. J. Armstrong, route agent; C. Hains, ex-mayor; O. D. Burt, jeweler; G. P. Nelson, ex-senator; L. Cook, councilman; H. H. Sawyer; Gottlieb Knipfer; D. S. Young, farmer; A. Caley, Times reporter; A. G. Walcott, lumber merchant; G. W. Bishop, merchant.

Mr. INGALLS. The great majority of those names are obdurate, indurated democrats, into whose head you could not drive the slightest idea of justice to the negro with a beetle and wedge.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if the mayor of Wyandotte is not a republican of the strictest sort?

Mr. INGALLS. I am not going to select names.

Mr. VEST. Ah! That is the sort of republican argument we hear here every day. I assert that that paper is signed by the leading republicans of the town of Wyandotte, in the gentleman's own State. I assert that Mr. Stockton is an indurated radical of the stalwart sort, acceptable to the most stalwart of the republican party, elected on that ticket, and the gentleman knows as well as I know that a large majority of the men signing that paper are republicans of the strictest sect. I assert that as a fact, and I leave to the Senator from Kansas and to his people the settlement of this question as to the negro exodus. They say these negroes were drawn from home by false pretenses, and they denounce the men who have thrown them upon Kansas.

I might go further, and read the statements of these negroes themselves in regard to the miserable fraud that is practiced upon them. The Senator from Kansas himself upon this floor says that "bleeding Kansas," "free Kansas" extended her snowy arms to embrace all the oppressed and persecuted people who came on her soil and welcomed them to hospitable homes. They welcome them very much like Tom Corwin advised the people of Mexico to receive the American Army, with hospitable hands to bloody graves. They have not given them bloody graves, but they will give them frozen graves in the next winter. That will be the extent of Kansas charity and the love that Kansas has for this exodus. Why, sir, the city of Atchison—and I have here the ordinance of that city passed for the very purpose of excluding these negroes from landing within the corporate limits——

Mr. INGALLS. The ordinance of a democratic mayor and council.

Mr. VEST. Ah, yes, sir; and it has also a large republican population that indorse it.

Mr. INGALLS. And which people welcomed them and gave them good cheer.

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; and passed this ordinance putting a fine of $500 on a railroad that landed a negro inside the corporate limits, even for the purpose of peddling peanuts. [Laughter.] That is the sort of charity and hospitality Kansas is giving them.

Why, sir, when I visited my home recently upon professional business, I visited Wyandotte to see for myself the real truth, the exact truth in regard to this negro exodus. I found these miserable creatures, two hundred of them, living in holes in the ground upon the river bank, one-tenth of them having died with diseases produced by the want of acclimation, produced by hunger, starvation, and the want of sufficient clothing; and while I was there, to give the whole truth, two boxes of clothing coming from the charitable in Boston and Chicago arrived there for distribution. I have seen in my Western life upon the plains the cayotes as they tore each other in attempting to get at the carcass of a fresh-slaughtered buffalo; I have heard the shrieks of famished wolves, but I never expect to see anything again like what took place then when these negroes gathered around these boxes and clamored for the distribution, screaming and yelling that they were entitled to those goods, that the Government of the United States had sent them there for distribution. The poor, miserable, ignorant, semi-barbarous creatures had been taught to believe that this Government had stretched out its arm to carry them to Kansas and that they were indeed what the republican party has long proclaimed them in imagination to be, the wards of the nation. And they have been wards! The Freedman's Bank is a standing monument of that wardship. The republican party never recollects them except at an election or when it chooses to use them for political examples in order to set off the bloody picture of the southern bravo with his bowie-knife in his boot and his double-barreled shot-gun on each shoulder and ten six-shooters stuck in his belt. Then only does our colored friend and brother come to the front.

Sir, without the negro the radical play would be Hamlet with the character of Hamlet left out; no one would parade him here. The exodus has come because the fuel on which the fire of civil hate has been fed was fast being exhausted; it was necessary to get up something else upon which to fire the northern heart and champion the truly loyal to the polls in 1880; and for that purpose these poor, miserable, degraded creatures were dragged from their homes in the South and carried to a land where I assert now that the frost will kill them without assistance from the snow.

Mr. INGALLS. Why did they want to make Kansas a slave State, then, if it would kill all the negroes?

Mr. VEST. Why did we want to make it a slave State! [Laughter.] We desired, Mr. President, not to make Kansas a slave State but we desired that Kansas should come into the Union like the other States, with its own institutions, under the Constitution and laws of this whole country. When the gentleman says we desired to make Kansas a slave State I assert to him now what he and I both know to be the fact that under climatic influences the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor was fast becoming free soil, because we found—and it was a case of dollars and cents—we found that slave property was not remunerative in Missouri; we found its natural home was in the South in the production of cotton, the great staple of the country. I assert that the men who are carrying the negroes now to Kansas are carrying them there to destitution and death. They are now returning, all that can get transportation; one hundred and eighty-eight have passed down the river to their former homes and were received there with joy and acclamation. The balance desire to return and the men who are now carrying them to Kansas are carrying them there for political capital and not from any love for the negro.

Mr. LOGAN obtained the floor.

Mr. INGALLS. May I have a moment?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, before this debate closes I wish, for the purpose of setting this matter right, to ask the Senator from Louisiana, if he is in the Chamber, whether the New Orleans Times is a reputable democratic paper?

Mr. JONAS. No, sir. The New Orleans Times is an independent paper. It prides itself on being independent of all political connections.

Mr. INGALLS. Let me ask the other Senator from Louisiana his opinion of the New Orleans Times.

Mr. KELLOGG. The New Orleans Times has the largest circulation of any paper in Louisiana or in the Southwest, and I believe it is accredited in the forefront in its advocacy of democratic doctrine.

Mr. INGALLS. A democratic paper with the largest circulation of any paper in the State. Now, will the honorable Senator from South Carolina oblige me with his opinion as to whether the Charleston News and Courier is a reputable newspaper?

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas, with the permission of the Senator from Illinois, yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. Not for a speech.

Mr. INGALLS. As I have quoted these newspapers, I desire to know whether they are reputable or not.

Mr. JONAS. In answer to the question I would say that the Senator from Louisiana sitting on the other side of the floor is a very poor authority for a description as to anything democratic in the State of Louisiana. I say that the New Orleans Times is not a paper of the largest circulation, and is a paper of small influence in the State of Louisiana. I say that according to popular report it is owned and controlled by the gentleman who was auditor elected upon the same State ticket—no, not elected but counted in—upon the same ticket with the gentleman when he became governor of the State of Louisiana. It is owned and controlled by Mr. Charles Clinton, a leading republican. It is edited by a republican formerly from the city of Saint Louis; and it is in no respect either a democratic paper or a democratic organ, and it is not regarded as such in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the other Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. INGALLS. I did not desire to provoke any colloquy upon the subject; I merely wanted by the testimony of Senators present to authenticate the character of the evidence I had given, for the purpose of offsetting it against the circular issued by Lycurgus P. Jones.

Mr. KELLOGG. One moment.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, some two or three weeks since, if my memory serves me aright, my colleague published a card in response to certain strictures that appeared in the Baltimore Gazette denouncing the repudiation element of Louisiana. In that card my colleague stated over his signature that there was no repudiation sentiment in Louisiana worthy of consideration, that the gentlemen who had charge of the financial policy of the State, composing a committee of eighteen members of the present constitutional convention of the State, were his friends and represented his financial view and policy. Of that committee within the past few days twelve have signed a report repudiating the entire debt of the State except $4,000,000, a large proportion of which is held in the city of New Orleans or in the State, and for a portion of which the State never received any consideration whatever. Nearly all the debt owned abroad and without the State, and for which the State received eighty or ninety cents on the dollar, and which was used for the purpose of building and repairing the levees and preserving and redeeming the alluvial lands of the State from overflow, is repudiated in the interest of a few holders of bonds, for a portion of which as I have said, the State received no consideration whatever. Every one of the twelve members of that committee who signed this repudiating report are democrats, Bourbons to the backbone, two independents and four republicans, among the latter Ex-governor Warmoth, signing a minority report in favor of maintaining the credit of the State unsullied and unimpaired.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator who is the best authority to speak as to the sentiment of the State of Louisiana? At that time I said that the convention would repudiate in all human probability, and I said that I believed the majority of the convention were in favor of repudiation. My colleague said no; there was no sentiment entitled to any consideration whatever in the entire State in favor of repudiation. My colleague was evidently mistaken. The democratic party of Louisiana is in favor of repudiation. The republican party is not. I prefer to represent the party opposed to repudiation—the healthy and honest sentiment of the State. Now a word regarding what my colleague has said as to the New Orleans Times. This journal has taken the lead of all our papers in the city of New Orleans upon that issue, earnestly opposing repudiation and in favor of maintaining the honor and credit of the State. Upon this issue and others calculated to benefit the State it has increased its circulation between three and four thousand, I believe, in the past four or five months, and I assert to-day that it wields more influence than any other one paper in all the Southwest. It is not a republican paper, is opposed to me politically, but it is opposed to repudiation and in favor of maintaining the credit of the State, and is honestly, I think, endeavoring to promote the best interests of the State.

The Senator from Kansas read a short time since an extract from that paper. The extract that he read was a portion of an editorial published some eight or ten days after my colleague made a speech on the floor of the Senate. It will be recollected that my colleague in that speech dwelt upon the question of the exodus, and stated then as one of the principal reasons why the exodus was not occasioned by any maltreatment of the colored people on the part of the whites, that the exodus was chiefly confined to the parishes of Madison and Carroll, where the colored people are largely in the majority, and where there is comparative peace and quiet. That is true, as my colleague put it, namely, that the colored people left those parishes. Why? Because they were compelled to embark from those parishes; but most of them came from the parishes where violence and disorder had reigned during the election of 1876, the two parishes of Morehouse and Ouachita, that lie directly to the west and in the rear of the parishes of Carroll and Madison. These colored people were compelled in leaving those parishes to embark on a steamboat, to go up the Mississippi, to cross the parishes of Madison and Carroll, and embark from those parishes. His statement was true in that respect. Some of those men came from Carroll and Madison, but the best proportion, the majority, came from the rear parishes, and where there had been much violence. I only refer to this as an additional evidence of his vaunted accuracy of statement as to the condition of things in Louisiana.

I will conclude by saying, in reply to the statement of my colleague that the New Orleans Times is owned by the gentleman who was my auditor, if it be true that the New Orleans Times takes the lead and has the largest circulation and influence of any paper published in New Orleans, that is pretty good evidence that a member of my administration, so much denounced, is beginning to be pretty popular. But, Mr. President, this paper is not owned by my old auditor. He owns, I believe, a few shares in the paper, but the paper is published and edited by a corps of men who are, for the most part, democrats; and you have I think only to scan the columns of that paper to be convinced of it so far as its political articles are concerned.

Mr. LOGAN and Mr. JONAS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is entitled to the floor. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Louisiana on the right?

Mr. JONAS. For a moment, if the Senator pleases, I should like the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. What does the Senator mean by "a moment?"

Mr. JONAS. Not over five minutes, in answer to the gentleman.

Mr. LOGAN. When I get through the Senator and his colleague can have their quarrel out; but I do not desire to yield for the purpose of having a colloquy go on here of an offensive character between two Senators.

Mr. JONAS. I only ask this because I was drawn into this controversy unwittingly in answer to a question of the Senator from Kansas, and I only wanted to make my answer fully understood.

Mr. LOGAN. I will yield, then, if the gentleman will take but five minutes.

Mr. JONAS. But five minutes. I only desire to say, while the question of bonds and repudiation is altogether foreign to the question which was addressed by the Senator from Kansas to my colleague and myself, that the bonded debt of Louisiana was about $6,000,000 when the war ended, and it was increased to twenty-odd million dollars during the administrations of Governor Warmoth and Governor KELLOGG, an administration never elected or chosen by the people of Louisiana. I wish to say that debt (which I believe will not be repudiated) was created by a class of individuals sitting in the Legislature whose peers and whose exemplars testified in a committee-room of this Senate during the last two weeks; and almost every bond issued and every debt created was created by those individuals by the passage of acts which received the sanction and approval of the gentleman over the way who professed and claimed to be governor of Louisiana, although never chosen by her people.

I say that that debt the people of Louisiana may well question and may well scrutinize, since not one dollar of it was ever expended for the public welfare of that State or of her citizens; but the debt was created by a carpet-bag government, which the gentleman over the way in large represented, and the proceeds passed into the pockets of his friends in the country, without benefiting or doing any good to the people. I say that while I was willing and advised that my people should shoulder the interest of that debt and pay the principal of the debt, if possible, I believe that debt has no official or moral obligation on which to rest. It was plundered from their pockets and their treasury by a government never elected, never recognized by that people, and the people have never received one dollar's worth of benefit from it.

I say again that the New Orleans Times is no representative of popular opinion among the people of Louisiana. I say that the auditor, not elected but counted in on the ticket with the honorable gentleman opposite, is owner of a part of that paper. He was extremely fortunate in acquiring wealth during a few brief years when he was auditor of that State to enable him to purchase it; but I say that the fact that he is recognized as one of its owners, that he is recognized as its director, is sufficient alone to prevent that paper from being a popular exponent of the people, and to prevent it from being recognized as an organ either of the democracy or of the people of Louisiana, and I say that the gentleman over the way, claiming to represent the people of Louisiana, is as thoroughly unacquainted with their feelings, their interests, their opinions upon any question of public interest as any gentleman who represents any other State upon this floor.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I will state to the Senator from Illinois——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield one minute and no more, and ask the President to note the clock.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, the statements just made by my colleague are fair samples of the statements so often made in regard to the condition of Louisiana by him and others like him. Let me make a plain statement that he cannot deny and that will fairly test the accuracy of his statements. During my administration not one dollar was added to the State debt of Louisiana under any law passed during my administration. The State debt was reduced one-third in amount, and the taxes were also reduced one-third during my administration. No bonds were issued during my administration of any kind whatever, except the consolidated bonds, under any law passed during my entire administration. No other bonds were issued by me save to a limited extent, less than $700,000, and these bonds were issued under a law passed prior to the time when my administration came into power, and in obedience to a mandate predicated upon a unanimous decision of the supreme court of the State, a democratic member of that court being the organ of the court.

The entire present consolidated debt of the State represents less than $400,000 of bonds issued during my entire administration, and these, as I have already stated, were issued under a law passed before I became governor. The State debt was nearly fourteen millions when the republican party came into power; and so far from the present consolidated debt representing, as my colleague says, chiefly the debt incurred under my predecessor, Governor Warmoth, and myself, it represents and is mainly composed of bonds which were issued before and since the war, under laws passed by democratic Legislatures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The one minute has expired that the Senator from Louisiana insisted upon.

Mr. KELLOGG. Just one other minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield further?

Mr. LOGAN. I appeal to the Senator to let me go on.

Mr. KELLOGG. Just wait a minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I cannot do it. The Senator can have an hour after I am through.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will take but a moment.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, go on for half a minute.

The PRESIDING OFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LOGAN. For one half minute. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. KELLOGG. Now, in reference to my identification with the State of Louisiana, I was not born in the State of Louisiana; neither was my colleague born in the State of Louisiana. He is a carpet-bagger and so am I, [laughter,] with this difference, he is a democratic carpet-bagger and I am a republican carpet-bagger; but I venture to say that during my residence in the State I have paid more taxes there in five years than he ever did in ten. In answer to just such intimations I was in the habit of saying from the stump, when I ran for governor in 1872, that I paid more taxes on property owned by me in the State than the candidates on the democratic ticket, including the governor. I did not make it there; I took it there. I invested it there; I lost a good deal of it there; and my interests are as identical with that State as his are, and I think even greater. As to the statement that I and others have been counted in, I have only to say I prefer even to be counted into office than to be put in by fraud and violence.

Mr. LOGAN. I cannot yield longer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The half minute has expired.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I desire the attention of the Senate for a short time only, and I hope that I shall confine myself to the question that is before the Senate. I have heard, but with one or two exceptions, almost everything discussed except the question that is presented to the Senate for consideration.

I am sorry that, so far, the democratic side of this Chamber has discussed nearly everything outside of the question and but little touching the bill. In fact there has not been an argument made by a Senator on that side of the Chamber except in opposition to the use of the troops at the polls, where no necessity required it, at the same time charging a desire on the part of the republicans to have the Army at the polls for the purpose of preventing persons from exercising the elective franchise rightfully.

Now, sir, I desire in the few moments that I shall detain the Senate to say that there is no desire on the part of the republican party, nor has there ever been to my knowledge, to use the Army or any part of the Army for the purpose of preventing any citizen from exercising the elective franchise; and all that has been said by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] in reference to the question in 1865 in his State, and all that has been said by the two Senators from Indiana in reference to the election in 1864 in their State, is, I must say, going a long way back for the purpose of making charges against the republicans, and is poor evidence to prove that they desire to prevent the exercise of the elective franchise by citizens entitled thereto. I desire, in but one moment, to say to the Senator from Kentucky, that in reference to the election in 1865 in his State, he knows well, and it has been said on this floor, that what was done was in pursuance of the laws of his own State, enacted by his own State Legislature, and in pursuance of the proclamation of his governor, based upon those laws, and in pursuance of an order of the commanding-general at the time, who now stands side by side with him in the democratic ranks. He took occasion to say that Governor Palmer, who issued that order, had been getting mad ever since, and had joined the democratic party.

Mr. BECK. Oh, no.

Mr. LOGAN. That he was a gallant soldier.

Mr. BECK. Not that he got mad.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. BECK. One word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. I said that General Palmer was a gallant soldier during the war; that he violated the Constitution immediately after the war under orders; but that he had got into a good humor, while my friend from Iowa was a peace patriot, and had been getting mad ever since.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I misunderstood him.

Mr. ALLISON. What Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BECK. The senior Senator, Governor KIRKWOOD.

Mr. LOGAN. Let it go that way. I say that, without exception, in my judgment the Senator cannot name a commanding officer of high reputation in the armies of the United States during the war who ever attempted to use the Army in any other way than for legitimate purposes that is not to-day in the ranks of the democratic party, from General McClellan down. From the days of Mr. Buchanan in the use of the Army in Kansas down to General Palmer with the use of the Army in Kentucky, there is no man to-day in my mind that is in the republican party. You may take all instances of alleged arbitrary use of the Army in this country during its whole history, in the pursuit of slaves and in the suppression of the voice of the people in a free Territory of Kansas, and it has been either under a democratic Administration or wielded under the influence of a democratic officer.

Now, sir, what is the position of the republican party? It is not that we desire the use of the Army at the polls to suppress the rights of citizens. That is the attempt on the part of democrats to bring before the people a false issue. Our proposition is that you shall not deprive the Executive of this nation of the exercise of his right under the Constitution in the execution of the laws which he has taken an oath to see to their faithful execution—not that he shall exercise power arbitrarily, not that he shall outside of the law exercise power or use the Army as a posse or in any other way unnecessarily, but that you shall not prevent him, in pursuance of the law and the Constitution, from the protection of citizens in their rights guaranteed to them by the laws and the Constitution of our country. That is the position of the republican party.

Now, sir, let me see. I take the message of the President of the United States and I say that he announces before this country the doctrine upon which and by which the republican party stands, and I indorse every word of it; and to-day your bill, as I will attempt in a short time to demonstrate, has gone outside of the proposition of the President of the United States in reference to his views in the exercise of this power. The President says in his message of May 13, 1879:

> No intimidation or coercion should be allowed to control or influence citizens in the exercise of their right to vote, whether it appears in the shape of combinations of evil-disposed persons, or of armed bodies of the militia of a State, or of the military force of the United States.

There should be no intimidation or coercion at the polls, whether it be by evil-disposed persons, by the militia of a State, or by the armies of the United States. What does that mean? It means this, that every man who has a right to exercise the elective franchise as a citizen of the United States should, without molestation, be permitted to vote; that when he has voted that it should end; that he should be permitted to vote not a dozen times, not a hundred times with tissue ballots, but he should be permitted to cast his vote, and there he should stop. Further, that neither you nor I nor any one else should interfere with him to deprive him of that right or to coerce him to exercise that right in any particular way. The President means by this, that you shall not organize rifle-clubs to coerce a citizen; that you shall not have night-riders to coerce a citizen; that you shall not organize your ku-klux to coerce citizens; that you shall not organize a militia to coerce citizens; that your militia shall not be a cloak for the purpose of coercing citizens; that all should be left free without restraint to exercise this right which is vouchsafed to them under the Constitution of the United States and the constitutions of the different States. What further, sir? He means that the States should keep the militia from the polls where it is not warranted for the purpose of suppressing riot or tumult, or protecting the citizen, and we should keep the Army from the polls where it is not warranted for the purpose of protection and where it is intended to be used for any improper purpose. I agree to that. He says:

> The elections should be free from all forcible interference, and, as far as practicable, from all apprehensions of such interference. No soldiers, either of the Union or of the State militia, should be present at the polls to take the place or to perform the duties of the ordinary civil police force. There has been and will be no violation of this rule under orders from me during this administration.

Now, what is the meaning of that sentence? It is this: that the Army will not be used by him, and ought not to be by any other Executive, as an "ordinary civil police" to keep the peace at the polls. To that I agree. I say here in the presence of this Senate that I am opposed to the use of the Army as an "ordinary civil police" to keep the peace at the polls. What is an "ordinary civil police?" The ordinary civil police is well understood in the law. It is not the police force of the Army. There are two kinds of police. The Army might be called a police, the Army to-day is but a national police in time of peace. It is the police force in part of the nation for what purpose? To suppress riot, to repel invasion, to put down insurrection, to aid the civil authority in the execution of the law. It is the military police of the nation, so to speak. Hence when you use the language "police," it applies in full force. You do not use the language in this section of the bill "as a civil police;" you do not use the language "ordinary police" or "ordinary civil police," but the word "police" is employed, which covers the Army as a police, covers it in every capacity for which it may be used by the President of the United States for the purpose of protecting citizens at the polls or suppressing riots on the day of election. As was well said by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] the police has always been divided into administrative police and judiciary police, one for the prevention of crime and the other for the punishment of crime.

The Army of the United States in time of peace is the administrative police of the nation for what? For the purpose of preventing violations of the law, for the purpose of patrolling and guarding our border and preventing attacks upon our frontier people, and at all times to be used by the Executive under the authority of law. It is also the administrative police of the nation for the purpose of aiding the civil authorities in the enforcement of the law, for the purpose of aiding in preventing crimes. When crimes are committed then the judiciary police comes in for the purpose of punishing crime. The Army, as the military police, becomes an adjunct or aid to the civil even in the execution of its authority as a judiciary police when the civil or judiciary police cannot carry out the law for want of force to resist attempts to overawe it. This is the distinction, as I understand it, between the military police and the civil police of this nation.

The President of the United States said in plain language that the Army ought not to be used as an "ordinary civil police." That is to say, it ought not be used for the purpose of patrolling the streets with policemen's bludgeons for the purpose of arresting people in the streets, for the purpose of carrying out municipal regulations, for the purpose of carrying out the orders of mayors of cities or executing town ordinances. It ought not to be used on the day of an election in that position or as a substitute for the "ordinary civil police;" but when riot or bloodshed shall occur in city or town, or shall be threatened at the polls or elsewhere, where the civil police are not competent to suppress it or protect the citizens on the day of a national election, the President, under his oath to faithfully execute the laws, should not be restricted, if it should become necessary to resort to the use of the military arm of the service as a military police or administrative police for the purpose of executing the laws and preventing crime; he should, for the benefit of good government and in the interest of peace, be permitted to exercise all the power of the nation.

Sir, believing as I do in the exercise of all the powers of the Government when it becomes necessary for the purpose of executing the laws, for the purpose of preventing crime, or for the purpose of protecting the citizens of this nation, I say that any attempt to restrict this authority, either by positive law or by a negation of the laws as they now exist, is an abridgment of the rights, privileges, powers, and prerogatives of the Executive.

Let us see for a moment, then, whether or not this Army bill as it now stands differs with the Army bill recently vetoed, and in what particular, if any. The fifth section is as follows:

That no money appropriated in this act is appropriated or shall be paid for the subsistence, equipment, transportation, or compensation of any portion of the Army of the United States to be used as a police force to keep the peace at the polls at any election held within any State.

That is to say, the Army cannot be moved, or any part of it, on election day. Why? Because transportation is denied. No part of the Army shall go. Why? Because food and raiment are inhibited by the law. No part of the Army shall be subsisted, shall be moved, transported, or taken to any place where an election shall be held in any State as a police, not as a civil "police," not as an "ordinary civil police," but as a police—you may call it administrative police, judiciary police, or a military police—it shall not go as either on the day of an election; it cannot be used on that day, because the supplies are denied.

Oh, but we are told that it makes no difference about the supplies being denied for a day; that amounts to a very small thing; Congress only denies supplies for the day of an election or for two or three days; hence we can get around that. Let us see. I ask Senators to-day as reasonable men if you have a right by an act nullifying the laws of this country to deny food, raiment, and transportation to the Army for one day, have you not the right to deny them for a year? It is an admission of the right to do it; the admission of the power to do it; the admission of the propriety of doing it. If you can do it for one day, you can do it for a year; and you are only marching in the path that has been opened for you in this particular by your political adversaries. Why, then, I ask, if the President of the United States may admit the proposition that Congress can withhold supplies for one day and refuse him the power to exercise his prerogative for that one day, and he admits that proposition, does he not admit the proposition that it may be done with the same propriety for a whole year?

But, as was well said by the Senator from Wisconsin, the word "police" in this section is not the controlling word of the sentence; "to keep the peace at the polls" is the language that controls the sentence. In other words, the Army shall not be used, or any part of it, on the day of an election anywhere to keep the peace at the polls. You may protect the citizen, suppress riot, enforce law, prevent bloodshed, disperse mobs on every day in the year save one, and that is on an election day, the day above all others, in my judgment, when the authority should be given to do so. Suppose at an election in the city of Chicago, where I reside, one thousand armed men should be led to the polls and take possession, how then is the President of the United States, if he should be called upon by the governor of the State under the fourth section of article 4 of the Constitution, to comply with the request? If he does, he violates this law; for the law plainly intimates to him you shall not use the troops on that day at the polls.

But it is said he may do it. If he does, when you say supplies shall not be granted for that day or that time the denial of the supplies is a notice to him that he shall not use the troops at that time and at that place. If he does, and they cannot be used without being supplied, how are the supplies to be furnished? They may be furnished by citizens, it is said. Then you incur liability, because the citizens may apply to the Government for pay for the supplies thus furnished. The Government accepting supplies for the benefit of the Army but for one hour or for one day incurs a liability for the full amount of the value of those supplies. Then by incurring a liability the President violates a law of the United States, plain and imperative. If he does that act, he may be impeached for the violation of a plain provision of the statutes of the United States.

Sir, speaking honestly my sentiments and views, I would rather vote for a bill repealing the law out and out (which I would not do) than vote for a bill saying that the law shall not be executed. It is a manner of nullifying a law; it is the negation of a law, though not repealing it. For the purpose of putting the minds of some of our democratic friends at ease, because this whole question has been argued by them from their own stand-point, there has been much declamation against the Army, against the oppression, and tyranny in the use of the Army at the polls during an election, and much has been said about the exercise of the right of a free citizen; "tyranny" and "oppression" have been thrown in our teeth. Why? Because we assert the power, and not because we have the desire that it shall be used unnecessarily. But that the power exists, and we say you shall not deny that power if we can prevent it; and the very moment we say the troops will not be used except where it is necessary to put down a riot, prevent bloodshed, and for the purpose of protecting the citizens in the enjoyment of their rights where they are not otherwise protected either by State or by some other authority, it is said we desire to oppress the people, we desire to use this power for the purpose of preventing free elections. There is no such desire, and no foundation for the statement.

Now, Mr. President, I have said on this subject nearly all that I care to say. But there is one thing I want to call the attention of the Senate and my democratic friends to, and that is that their whole attempt at legislation during this session of Congress has been with a kind of bravado toward the Executive, a kind of defiant attitude, determined to coerce him into signing some law or other that shall to a certain extent abridge his powers and cut off his authority; not that they believed the Army will ever be used for the purpose of preventing any citizen of their States from properly exercising his rights under the law, but for the purpose of driving the republican party, as an attempt was made years ago to drive everybody before them, and make the President, with all others, bow to their behests and become willing tools or subservient instruments in their hands.

You denounce the President of the United States for first signing laws and then for refusing to sign laws; you denounce the republican party; you almost declared you would tear down the temple of liberty rather than submit unless certain things were done; you were going to repeal all of these laws. Why? Not because they were oppressive, but because they were passed during a time when you did not exercise your power and authority here as a party, and that, merely because you had no part or lot in the enactment of these laws, you wanted to obliterate them; and it seemed that you were determined that our statute-books should hold naught except that which was in accordance with your theories and your views and placed there by yourselves.

Why, Mr. President, from that side of the Chamber the republican party has been denounced in all the various forms that the English language is capable of. We have been told that our time had come, that we were oppressive. The year 1862 has been cited, the year 1863, the year 1864, and my friend, not now in his seat, from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] declaimed loudly about the loyalty of the State of Indiana. Of course a majority of the people of Indiana were loyal; many good soldiers from that State did their duty; but I want to say to him that while he was attempting to make it appear that some of our Senators had insinuated a want of valor in the troops of Indiana during the war with Mexico, he knows it well that there was in that State during the late war an organization in sympathy with the rebellion for the purpose of overturning the authorities of the State, and for the purpose of setting a "fire in the rear," if I may so speak, at least such has been the belief of the country, founded on seemingly good authority. I ask in all conscience and in all kindness with what kind of taste, with what kind of grace does it come from the lips of Senators on this floor to denounce the republican party for their conduct during this war, to denounce the republican party for the use of troops in 1864, to denounce the republican party as it was this morning denounced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] about the Freedman's Bank. That was put in operation here during the war, or shortly after. All these little taunts are thrust at us. Why, sir, many of the very men who do it went forth themselves and made the earth resound with the hoof of war in an attempt to destroy this Government, and with a flaming sword in one hand and a torch in the other they went forth trying to fire the temple of liberty; and yet they come here and talk to republicans about what they did in 1864, what they did at a time when a million of men were in arms against the Government, when everything was to be done and every power was to be exerted for the purpose of protecting this country and preserving it against men who attempted to destroy it; and yet we are to be told day by day about the wrongs that were committed by the republican party during this time.

These very men are every few days talking to us about stirring up strife. They say the republican party is trying to arouse the North against the South. If a republican happens to allude to the rebellion, if a Senator happens to speak of some battle or happens to speak of the Army in rebellion crossing the Potomac somewhere or invading a State, we are told we are trying to arouse northern feeling against southern men. We dare mention no wrong that was done by the party that stood against us without being called to account; but you gentlemen can stand up here and denounce the republican party from one day to another and it is all right. Now I say to you that this must stop, or else you will hear the history of this country every day in this Chamber and your own histories as well. I say this in no offensive sense, but it had as well be understood by all. I mean by that that as long as you continue your denunciation of men that stood by this country while you were trying to destroy it, just so long we will defy you and we will denounce your attempt against civil liberty and against this Government.

Our friend the distinguished "embassador" from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,]—I believe he recognizes himself only as an "embassador" here, and therefore will not object to the title he gives to himself as well as to all others on this floor—said:

Oh, but you say the South is solid. That is true. And you intimate to the North that we are solid against the Union. That is not true. There is not a word of truth in it. We are solid. Solid how? Solid against whom? Solid against the republican party. Why should we not be? Do you wonder? The past is enough to make us solid. But let that go.

"The past." What "past" is it that is enough to make the South solid? You have been solid, you were solid during the war, you are solid now. You are solid against the republican party, just as solid against the party that saved this country as you were against the Government, and just as determined to destroy the party that saved the country as you were to destroy the country when you were making war against the liberties of this people. And the distinguished "embassador" from Georgia the other day said to the Senate that he did not say that the democratic party saved the country, that he only said it helped to save it. Now I wish to read a word or two from his speech, in which I think he will find that he did not interpret it correctly in his explanation. Hear him:

> No, my good northern democratic brethren, you saved the country at last; you saved the Union in the hour of its peril; not the republican party. You who had showed devotion to your flag saved the Union, and now it is for you to go before your people and tell them that the solid North must never become a fact against the solid South. If so, disunion will be accomplished.

If the North ever becomes solid, says the distinguished "embassador," disunion will be accomplished; yet at the same time he acknowledges that the South is solid, and yet that does not accomplish disunion. The South was solid and it did not accomplish disunion; the South is solid and it does not accomplish disunion; but if the North ever becomes solid, then disunion is accomplished! That may be logical, but I cannot understand it. That is the logic of an "embassador," however. The distinguished "embassador" from Georgia says the democratic party saved the Union. Now, sir, the democratic party is on that side of the Chamber; how many of them during four years of war exerted themselves to save the Union? Now, let me give the distinguished "embassador" from Georgia a little history of the democracy of the North.

I say the republican party did save the Union; I say the democratic party did not save the Union. I say the democratic party as a party never aided to any great extent in saving the Union. Individuals of the democratic party did; individuals went into the Army and fought bravely and well, and I honor them for it, but the democratic party as a party never sympathized with the Union to any great extent; and the distinguished "embassador" from Georgia cannot name a solitary convention held in the Northern States where the democratic party adopted resolutions squarely in favor of the Union. He cannot show such a thing as a democratic State convention ever adopted a resolution during the whole war that did not declare that the war was a failure or that did not find fault with the manner of the prosecution of the war. Why, sir, every obstruction was thrown in the way that was possible, according to my reading and understanding. The democratic party in my own State as late as 1863, by a resolution introduced by a distinguished member of Congress, a democrat from that State now, declared the war a failure. So the democratic convention of the nation in 1864 declared the same thing, and you cannot show in one solitary instance that the democratic party as a party ever indorsed the prosecution of the war for the Union. So the distinguished "embassador" is not borne out by the history of the country.

When Senators continually point over to this side of the Chamber and speak of the wrongs that have been committed, I say to them, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to let by-gones be by-gones as far as we can; but it cannot be so as long as you yourselves are the irritators. You gentlemen who during the war indorsed all kinds of wrong, you gentlemen who indorsed acts that would make civilized mankind shudder, men who indorsed conduct in warfare that was not according to the civilization of the age, men who indorsed the attempts to disseminate small-pox and disease in the North and to fire northern cities, to tell us that we must stop talking about rebellion! And you censure and criticise republicans on this floor every day because of something that transpired during the war, and say we are trying to arouse the northern sentiment. I say to you unless you yourselves stop this you will have a solid North, and when the North becomes solid again, it will be solid to remain so.

Mr. President, I have digressed for a few moments in this line because I have had no other opportunity of saying just this much. I desired when I rose merely to discuss a single proposition, and I say now in conclusion I do not know what the President may do, or what he may not do in reference to this bill, but I am free to say, and I want the country to understand, that the only difference between this and a repeal positive of the laws, is that one was a proper way of legislating and the other is not. But the effect is the same; one repeals the law; the other nullifies the law and prevents its execution. The more honorable mode is the repeal. I would vote to-day as readily for the repeal of the law as I would vote for this section; and the man who votes for this section to-day must not explain to his constituents that it means nothing, that it amounts to nothing, that it is only for a day, that it does not stop the supplies of the Army but for a day; it means just as much as if it said you should not supply the Army for a year; the principle is the same; this bill as it stands to-day is just as pernicious as the repeal of the law would be. I would consider myself in voting for this section as backing down from what I have said when I opposed the repeal in the other bill, which was vetoed by the President.

I say to Senators on the opposite side of the Chamber that there is a way in which this country can have quiet; there is a way in which we can legislate as legislators without attempting to irritate one another or to excite the country. How shall we do it? If you want to let by-gones be by-gones, show it by your "walk and conversation." If you want to arouse the feelings of the North, continue to act as you have done; continue to denounce the North as tramps, as you have done; continue to denounce them as dishonest as you have done; continue to denounce them as vampires and oppressors; continue that, and you will not have the quiet that the country desires. Whenever you are willing to come forward and take an appropriate part of the burdens of this country; whenever you are willing to act fairly with the people of the Northern States, they will act fairly with you. Whenever you will concede rights to those people they will concede rights to you. Whenever you will treat them fairly they will treat you fairly; whenever you quit distressing the people in your country they will respect you. Whenever you desist from riot and bloodshed you will be more respected than you are now. Whenever you protect the poor man as you do the rich man, our people will respect you more. Whenever you protect the colored man as you do the white man, we will respect you more. Whenever you will quit insinuating that the men of wealth in your country are the only ones that have a right to legislate, the only ones that have a right to vote, the only ones that have a right to hold office, then we will respect your political principles more. We in the North believe that each and every citizen has a right to vote, each and every citizen has a right to hold office where he has not forfeited that right, if his constituents choose him; that each and every man stands upon the same broad platform; that all stand equally before the people, to be judged of by the people. We deny no right to one man that we do not deny to another; we give no right to one man that we do not give to another. Whenever you people of the South are willing to stand upon this platform and carry it out, protect all alike, then we say to you we are willing to meet you half way. We are willing then to say this country as a whole gives the same rights to one man as it does to another, and that the legislators are bound by that principle and are willing to carry it out. Until that time comes you cannot expect that the North will recognize you as standing upon the same platform in reference to the rights of the people, in reference to liberty, in reference to law, in reference to justice, as the people of the North, and until then you ought not to expect it.

Mr. President, for three months the majority have labored not to make laws that are beneficial, but have labored to repeal laws to restrict the powers of the Executive of the nation. You have labored to that end, and to none other. You have failed so far to do it. I hope you will still fail to accomplish it. So far as I am concerned, by my vote you certainly will fail; and I propose that when the amendments are offered which are proper, we will test your sincerity and see whether you desire that fair laws shall be enacted, that the executive department of the Government shall not be restricted within narrower limits than are intended by the Constitution of our country. This will be the test that will decide my action.

Mr. KIRKWOOD Mr. President, I propose, with the indulgence of the Senate, to consume a short time in discussing the question that I apprehend to be involved in the amendment under consideration. That amendment raises the question under what circumstances, if any, the Government of the United States can use its troops to keep the peace at the polls on the occasion of electing Representatives in Congress. That is the question; and that question, in my judgment, depends upon the answer to another question, which is this: Is there any valid law of Congress which on election day may be obstructed, may be hindered in its execution, may be resisted by force and violence at the polls? If that be so, then not only, in my judgment, can the Government of the United States use the Army to put down that resistance, but it is its bounden duty so to do. That we have a law on the statute-book regulating elections for Representatives in Congress no man will deny. We know that, if we knew it in no other way, from the efforts made at this session to repeal that law.

But it has been suggested that that law is not a constitutional law, and, therefore, not binding. I will examine that question briefly. If it is proper to call the position held by a Representative in Congress an office and him an officer, then I say that the office of Representative in Congress is an office of the United States and not of the State. The Representative is a United States officer and not a State officer. The Constitution of the United States creates the office. Until that instrument was formed there was no such office. The office is not created by the State from which the Representative comes; it is the creation of the United States. The Constitution of the United States says who may hold the office; the State constitution cannot say anything touching that question. The Constitution of the United States says who may vote for the officer, fixing a qualification, to which the State cannot add, and from which it cannot take. The Constitution of the United States prescribes how the compensation for the officer shall be ascertained, by the action of Congress and not by the action of the State from which he comes; and when the amount of his compensation has been ascertained, it is drawn from the Treasury of the United States and not from the treasury of the State. He has certain powers given to him, certain duties are imposed upon him. They all arise under the Constitution of the United States, and not under the constitution of the State. When he is elected he brings to the House in which he claims a seat a certificate from the governor of the State from which he comes, which certificate gives him a prima facie right, as it is termed; but whether he is entitled to hold it or not depends, not upon the action of his State, but upon the decision of the House of which he claims to be a member. Certain privileges are conferred upon him by the Constitution of the United States solely, not by the State from which he comes. When he has been elected and taken his seat he may be expelled from that seat without asking the leave or permission of the State from which he comes.

He is an officer of the United States, then, if it is proper to apply that term to the position. It seems to me that any one examining our Constitution and seeking to learn its meaning, having ascertained that much in regard to these officers, would naturally look into the same instrument to see whether or not there was any provision made there as to the manner in which these officers should be chosen. He would do that. Why? Because it is peculiarly appropriate, I think; because it seems to be in accordance with the eternal fitness of things that every government should determine the manner in which its own agents shall be selected. Looking at our Constitution, then, with that end in view, we find that there is a provision made there upon that subject; and that provision is substantially this: the States shall, in the first place, prescribe the times, places, and manner in which Representatives in Congress shall be elected. That the people who formed our Constitution said for themselves, but they said in addition that at any time the Congress representing the United States might make such regulations or might alter such as it found to exist.

Now, it seems to me that certain propositions are too plain for argument. One of them is this: Whatever power the States have on this subject is given to them by the Constitution of the United States, and whatever power the States have by that instrument is reserved to be exercised by the United States whenever the United States shall so choose to exercise it. There cannot be any dispute about this. Let me make an illustration: suppose that when we meet on the 1st day of December next we are here without rules for our government; we cannot transact business; we raise a Committee on Rules, and say by resolution that they shall prepare rules for the government of this body in order to the orderly transaction of its business; but the Senate may at any time make or alter such rules. Is not the power reserved to the Senate just as broad as the power conferred upon the committee? Must it not be so necessarily? And when the people of the United States wrote in their Constitution that the States might regulate the times, places, and manner of voting in these elections, but the Congress might at any time make or alter those regulations, they did precisely what I have supposed in the case of making rules for the Senate by a committee of the body.

If this be so, then it follows that the Congress of the United States has the right to place upon our statute-books laws regulating the manner of the election of Representatives in Congress. They have done so. Some fault is found with some of the details of that law. It is said in regard to the deputy marshals that we have too many of them. That may be true; but what remedy do our democratic statesmen propose? To abolish the office of deputy marshal; not to reduce the number but to abolish the office totally. It is said that the compensation of these officers is too high. That may be; but the remedy proposed, again by democratic statesmanship, is not to reduce the compensation, but to abolish the office. Some people think that our compensation here is too high. I do not believe it is; but I never heard the wildest reformer yet propose as a remedy that the office of Senator in Congress, if it be an office, should be abolished. It would be more difficult still, I think, to get the approval of that remedy than it would the approval of the remedy of a reduction of compensation.

Again, gentlemen say in regard to these deputy marshals that they are not men of good character. It may be; there may be bad and improper men among them; it would be strange if there were not. It has been said that bad men get in here sometimes. The old remedy comes back; and our democratic friends insist that the cure for the fact that some bad men have been selected is not to make precautions that better men may be selected in the future, but that the office shall be abolished. Is there not a dearth of statesmanship in our democratic friends when they have but the one remedy for all evils. I remember, (it has been so long since that I may have forgotten very much about it,) in reading the good old novel of Don Quixote, perhaps; there was a doctor in it, Dr. Sangrado, who had one cure for all diseases, and but one. It seems to me our democratic friends have been reading that book a little and have fallen into the ideas entertained by him.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It was in Gil Blas.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I had forgotten; I have been so busy for a great many years that I have not had the opportunity of indulging in general reading to the extent that I should like to have done.

Last Sunday I bought a copy of the New York Herald, and I propose to read a few extracts from an editorial contained in that paper:

> Within about a fortnight we have had to report on an average two cases a day either of assault by the police upon citizens in their houses or in the streets, or of the arraignment of policemen before justices on charges of assault or personal outrages of an even graver nature. Upon trivial differences within the limit of the rights of the people it is dangerous to exchange a word with a policeman.

This of course refers to the policemen of the city of New York.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. You are not reading that against us of the South now?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I will make the application after awhile. The article from which I quote proceeds:

> Not only is it perilous to bandy words with these guardians of the public peace, but the citizen who does not quietly submit to invasions of his domicile is in a fair way to get to the nearest hospital in a cart.
>
> In a tenement-house row an officer came upon the scene in a passage on the level of the street, presumably to pacify the row. He was saluted with unpleasant language from an upper window. Immediately his duty was forgotten. The dispute which had brought him to the scene became suddenly trivial in his eyes and unworthy attention. He mounted the stairs and clubbed the poor creature above, so that he now lies in a bad way with a leg in splints. But this person had been guilty of no breach of the peace and was in his own house. No act had been committed that would in any circumstance have justified his arrest. Only the dignity of the policeman had been offended, and that must be revenged at any cost. And that is a type of the dealings of the police with these people. The average policeman is simply a champion bully, ready to enforce with his club, not order, but the recognition of his personal supremacy on his beat.

Here is a little more from the same editorial:

> It is shown by the trial of the Manhattan Bank robbers that honesty is regarded as of so little account on the police that theft does not disqualify a man for holding a place. An officer is now in custody on the charge that he was an accomplice of those robbers, and if this is true it is the fourth robbery in which he is believed to have been concerned, as the police authorities know. He was a gambler before he went on the police, and as he was found out by one captain after another in his various exploits, what was done with him? He was removed each time to some other precinct where the captain did not know him.

Here is another extract:

> Some time ago a couple of detectives were caught in predatory operations also, and they were not dismissed either. They were made roundsmen.

I do not know what that term means.

Mr. CONKLING. Patrolmen, walking around.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. And it concludes:

> So that this is a part of the system.

And now for the application. If it be true that there is found occasionally upon a police force improper men, dishonest men, brutal men, is that a good cause for abolishing the police? Has it ever occurred to the authorities or the people of New York City to abolish the whole number of policemen in that city? That is the remedy our democratic friends insist upon in regard to the deputy marshals, that because some of them have been ascertained to be improper persons, therefore the whole body shall be abolished. But I do not think the good people of the city of New York, because bad men get upon the police of that city, would be willing to abolish the police force of the city. If the things that are alleged here in regard to the police of the city of New York be true, and if things equally as bad were proven to be true in regard to these deputy marshals, how the eloquence of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] would be heard in this Chamber denouncing the brutality of intrusting the keeping of the peace at the polls to such men. And yet it is precisely to such men as have charge of the preservation of the peace in the city of New York that the democrats desire to submit wholly the elections. This is outside of my line of argument, however.

A very pertinent question was asked by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] a few days ago. I do not see him in his seat, and yet I will refer to the matter, because it involves nothing but what can be referred to either in his presence or in his absence. He made the statement that until within a few years last past Congress had never exercised the power to regulate the manner in which these elections shall be held; and he asked the pertinent question why now it should be done. He was not entirely accurate I think in his statement. A good many years ago, how long I cannot remember, but before the republican party had an existence, Congress commenced the work of regulating the manner of the election of members of Congress. For many years, when I was a much younger man than I am now, some of the States of this Union elected their members of Congress by general ticket, and they continued in that practice until Congress, believing it to be a bad practice, remedied it by providing that the elections should be held by single districts and not by general ticket.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That was in 1842, I think.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I had forgotten the date, but it was long ago. But the question still recurs what reason was there why this custom that had prevailed so long should not be allowed to continue? It strikes me that there are two good and sufficient reasons why it should be so. There are in the city of New York about one-third as many people as the entire population of the original thirteen States at the time we achieved our independence. There are, I apprehend, in half a dozen of our large cities as great a number of people as the entire population of the old thirteen colonies was at that time. While this brings advantages, it brings disadvantages also with it. As wealth is concentrated in the hands of comparatively few in our large cities, and ease and luxury and all the accompaniments of wealth go with wealth, it also happens that vice grows as well. I do not pretend to give from official data what I am about to say, but I believe I am correct in saying that there are to-day in the city of New York more professional criminals—and by that I mean men who make their living by the commission of crime as their business—than the entire population of that city contained at the time our independence was achieved; and the same holds largely true as to all our large cities. This is a condition of affairs that did not exist when the custom that is so much honored now, about leaving the elections solely to the States, originated. In many localities in these large cities four-fifths of the voting population are men with whom no gentleman who hears me would trust either life or property if he thought either could be taken from him without detection. A different system is required, a different supervision is required, different care is required in dealing with such men than was required in dealing with the men who gave their votes at the time when our Government was formed. That is one reason.

Another reason is that, as a consequence of the civil war through which we passed, the war of the rebellion, some four million people who were formerly slaves are now free men. That has produced and must for years to come produce difficulty, trouble, trial, hardship in the communities where this great change has occurred. It could not be otherwise, unless we could change human nature, and we cannot do that. The men who were formerly masters will not consent, if by any means they can avoid it, to be ruled by the men who were formerly their slaves. This produces a condition of things there that does require supervision not merely by those who live there and of the master race, but by others as well; so that I contend there is good cause for saying to-day that the old system that obtained for so many years should be changed and a different and, we hope, a better system substituted for it.

But to come back, if I am correct in holding that Congress has the right to make an election law and that the laws on that subject upon our statute-book are constitutional, then the question arises, what power has Congress to enforce its own law? Must it depend upon some other power, some other authority, or must it rely upon its own power and its own authority to carry into effect and put down opposition and resistance to the laws of its own enactment? I have no doubt upon that subject, Mr. President. A government that cannot do that is an incomplete and an inefficient government, as much so as a human being who is born with one leg or with one arm, or who is born blind or mute or dumb, is an incomplete person. A government that has to rely upon something else than itself, upon some power other than its own to enforce its own law, is not a government; and if ours is such the sooner we abandon it and substitute for it something better, the better for it and for us.

Let me make myself understood now. There is a great deal of talk about the Government of the United States interfering in the States to keep the peace. Nobody claims that it has the right to do that ordinarily; but it is claimed that whenever a constitutional law is passed by Congress it goes of its own power, not by favor, not by permission from anybody, but of its own constitutional vigor it goes through the whole length and breadth of our land and attaches to and becomes part, so to speak, of every inch of our soil.

That is my theory. It attaches not only to the soil but to every man living upon it, unless by special provision he is a foreigner representing his own country here as an embassador, or in some such way is exempted from its operation. I care not where it may be, wherever that law of this Government goes the agents of this Government to enforce it have the right to go, again not by favor, not by permission, but because the law has gone before them and opened the way for them. They ask no permission of any man, or of any State, or of any power. They ask no power of any man, or of any State, or of any authority. They go by the same power and authority that the law itself goes, and when those engaged in the administration of the law, the power of this Government, civil and military, the power of forty-five millions of people stands with them, above them, below them, behind them, around them, to guard and protect them against any and all power that may oppose them in the lawful execution of that law.

Let me make the distinction. Two years ago it happened that in the city of Pittsburgh, in the State of Pennsylvania, there occurred a great riot. For many days, I do not know how many, all traffic and travel was suspended. Immense amounts of property were destroyed. People from the State in which I live beyond the Mississippi River wished to go to New York. They could not go there by that route. They had property being transported from one State to the other, but it could not reach its destination by that route, and the United States Government could not help them. Why? Because there was not what there should be, there was no law of Congress protecting interstate trade. I hope to see the day in my time here when we shall have such a law. Therefore the question whether our people should travel through Pennsylvania, or whether their goods should go through Pennsylvania, depended not upon the Government of the United States but upon the government of the State of Pennsylvania, and the Government of the United States in that regard could not interfere until called upon by the governor of the State of Pennsylvania to aid him in putting down the riot so as to let people again travel through the State and traffic again be carried on.

But while that is true, it is also true on the other hand that there were laws of the United States at that time that were obstructed and resisted; laws providing for the transportation of the mails were upon our statute-book. My belief is that just as soon as it became apparent to the President of the United States that the local authorities were insufficient to protect the mails of the United States in being carried over those roads, it was not only his privilege but it was his duty to see to it that the local authorities, the civil authorities of the Government being inefficient to protect the carrying of the mails of the United States and the enforcement of the United States laws for their protection—it was his business to see to it that the Army of the United States was sent there, and that every man found resisting the transmission of the mails in accordance with law, obstructing their transmission, should be swept out of the way.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MAXEY. I want to understand the proposition of the Senator from Iowa on this point. Does the Senator mean to say to the Senate that the United States could have sent an army to Pittsburgh without a legislative call if the Legislature of Pennsylvania were in session, or an executive call in the absence of the Legislature, under the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution, outside of that article, independent of that article? Does the Senator mean to say the Army could have been sent there independent of that?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Certainly I do.

Mr. MAXEY. I merely wanted to understand the Senator.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. If that is not true, then the question whether the laws of the United States shall be enforced depends not upon the Government of the United States but upon the government of Pennsylvania.

Mr. MAXEY. The point I wanted to make, I will state to the Senator from Iowa, was this: that the Federal Government has no power except that which is granted upon the face of the Constitution. The mode and manner in which a riot can be stopped in a State is laid down in the Constitution, and the point at which the power of the Federal Government can be brought into exercise to suppress a riot or an insurrection is laid down on the face of the Constitution in the fourth section of the fourth article, and nowhere else. That being the case, and the only case, in which the Federal troops can be called out upon a demand by the Legislature, if it be in session, or if it cannot be convened, then by the State executive, can the United States Government, ex mero motu, send its troops there without a call from the Legislature or the executive of the State when the Legislature is not in session?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Clearly in my judgment it can, and I have been trying to explain why I think so. I have said that if there had been no law of the United States resisted there, no violent, forcible opposition to the laws of the United States there, nothing but a breach of the peace of the State of Pennsylvania there, of course the Army could not be sent there until invited by the authorities of the State of Pennsylvania; but whenever in the State of Pennsylvania or in any other State (this is my theory, I do not pretend to speak for anybody other than myself; I have no authority to do so) the laws of the United States are resisted and overborne, then the Government of the United States has power to use the whole force of this nation to enforce them.

Mr. MAXEY. I want to understand the Senator. I do not interrupt him for any other purpose.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Of course not.

Mr. MAXEY. Does not the Constitution point out how the Government of the United States is to be advised of the fact that the suppression of an insurrection is beyond the power of a State to suppress it? Can the United States bring its strong hand down upon the State until the State calls for aid in the mode pointed out by the Constitution? That is the point upon which I want to understand the Senator.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The provision to which the Senator from Texas alludes is the provision for the protection of a State and the enforcement of the peace of the State. It has nothing to do with the laws of the United States; it has nothing to do with their enforcement or their execution. It is when the laws of the State of Pennsylvania cannot be enforced by the authority of the State of Pennsylvania that the State of Pennsylvania has the right to call upon the President of the United States to enforce her own laws in her own limits. It does not touch the question of the execution of the laws of the United States.

Mr. MAXEY. Then, if the Senator will pardon me, I understand his position to be, and I want to understand it, that the laws of the United States are required to be exercised within the limits of the State; that a law itself, in proprio vigore, goes along with it; and if it is necessary for the Army to enforce that law, that too goes along with it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Certainly it does go with that law.

Mr. MAXEY. There I differ with the Senator, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Take the case cited by the Senator from Virginia a few days ago, of an election in his State that caused some excitement and feeling in that State, I apprehend. It will illustrate my idea. As I said before, it is only my idea; it binds nobody but myself; it may be totally wrong, but I believe it to be right. In the spring of a certain year, I do not remember the year, an election was held in Petersburgh, Virginia. What year was that?

Mr. ALLISON. In 1876.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. In the spring of that year an election was held for local officers or State officers, I do not remember which.

Mr. WITHERS. For municipal officers merely.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The United States had nothing to do with that. It affected the State of Virginia only and solely. It was the business of the State of Virginia to maintain peace at the polls on the day of the election; but if the State of Virginia should be unable to maintain the peace on that day, if riot occurred, if the State laws were resisted, then Virginia had the right to call upon the President of the United States, to do what? To send troops there to aid Virginia in enforcing her own laws in her own limits. But afterward, during the same year, there was an election to occur there at which there was a member of Congress to be elected, and then the law of the United States prescribing rules for the election of members of Congress was in force at that place in Virginia just as much as at the preceding spring the laws of the State in regard to the election of municipal officers had been in force there. When the President was informed, upon information on which he relied, that there was danger that the Federal laws were then to be resisted there, he did a wise and a prudent thing in sending troops, not to go to the polls, but in case a collision occurred for them to be there in case the State could not enforce the law and keep the peace, to see to it that the United States power was there to enforce the United States law there as well as every place else.

I wish to say a few words more on this subject, Mr. President. When I first read this bill before its passage in the other House, I said in consultation or rather in conversation with some of my colleagues from my State in the House that I thought the section of the bill upon which this debate proceeds was a mere excrescence on the bill itself, an impertinence, so to speak, meaning no disrespect to those who favor the section. It was just as senseless, in my judgment, as if it had provided that no part of the appropriation should be used to pay the Army if the Army were used as a professional base-ball club or a traveling circus or a Pinafore company; because I had never heard it claimed by any one, democrat or republican, that it was intended by the Government of the United States to send men to the polls to take the place of police officers, bailiffs, and constables there.

Let me illustrate again my meaning, sir. We have in the State in which I live courts of the United States; we have doorkeepers and bailiffs, and I do not know what other officers to execute the mandates of the courts, marshals among others. I never understood anybody to claim that we ought to turn these men out of office and place an armed soldier carrying a musket with a bayonet at the door to act as doorkeeper, and another beside the judges on the bench as their bailiff, and other armed soldiers all through the building to do the duties ordinarily performed by marshals and their deputies. I never understood that to be claimed by any one, but I did understand it to be claimed that if an armed force of rioters should go into the courthouse in the State of Iowa, and imperil the execution of the laws of the United States there so as to interfere with the orderly administration of justice by the United States officers, and the civil authorities there were not sufficient to put down that violence, then the President could call from San Francisco or New York, or elsewhere, wherever there may be a regiment or a company of troops, all the armed force necessary to see to it that peace and law and good order shall be maintained about the building, and that the men who are charged there with the enforcement and execution of the laws of the United States, just as everywhere else where they are so charged, shall be allowed to proceed in an orderly and a quiet way to do it, and that all the men who are disposed to obstruct must get out of the way.

Mr. President, I come to the main cause of my troubling the Senate upon this occasion, a thing that I very seldom do. I want to find out what our democratic friends mean by this bill. I have repeated here what I said to my colleagues in the other House. I was bound to do so. The respect of those gentlemen is of value to me, and my own respect is of more value to me than their respect, and having said it to them I was bound to let any man who chooses to inquire about it know that I had done so. Now I want to know just precisely what is the meaning of this section. It is claimed by some gentlemen, it was believed by myself, that the only meaning of it was, that when election day comes around the President shall not surround any of the polls in the city of New York, for example, with armed soldiers, so that the men who go there to exercise the right to vote shall not be compelled to pass through files of armed soldiers. I supposed that to be the meaning of it, and aside from its impertinence I saw no harm in it, because no man ever claimed that troops could be used for that purpose, so far as my knowledge went, or that they should be used to make the arrests ordinarily made by policemen there. No man ever claimed that. It was only when disturbance and violence occurred and the peace officers could not put it down that the United States with its armed soldiers in aid of the civil officers should put down that disturbance and violence on the day when members of Congress were being elected, under the laws of the United States.

Now I say, in all kindness and all frankness, it is not for the Senate of the United States to pass a law the meaning of which is shown to be doubtful. Am I right? Is it a becoming thing in this body, said to be the most dignified, deliberative body in the world—ah, well we will continue to say so—is it becoming in this body, when the fact is brought to its attention, that upon the face of a bill pending before it for action uncertainty, doubt, dispute exists as to what is the true meaning of that bill, that it shall not be made clear? Is it just to ourselves that we should allow that doubt to continue? Is it just to other departments of the Government that we should allow that doubt to continue? Is it just to the people of this country that we should allow that doubt to continue and perhaps cause further strife and confusion and bitterness through the length and breadth of our land? Does it not become us as honest men, as intelligent men, does it not become us as Senators, to remove all doubt as to what the meaning of this thing is, and say whether it means that the troops shall not go to the polls on election day to exercise the duties commonly performed by ordinary policemen, or whether it is intended to say that the United States troops shall not go there, when the ordinary civil power is insufficient to protect the people at the polls, to furnish that protection?

That is one question to be determined by the Senate, Mr. President, and if Senators will not inform us by speeches of what they understand this language to mean, we, on this side, have the privilege of testing them in the way of amendments, and I apprehend that unless they pursue the policy we did a night or two ago and fail to vote, we shall get to know just what they mean before this bill is finally passed.

There is another matter I propose to notice, and I shall be very brief. At various times, when political excitement ran somewhat high during the session, I had made up my mind that I would make a political speech. I was saved the necessity of doing so by having it done by gentlemen much abler than myself to do it. But there is one thing to which I wish to allude in a single remark. Much has been said here about the desire of the republican party to revive the bitter feelings engendered by the war for political purposes in the North. It has been said by gentlemen, not from the South perhaps as much as by gentlemen from the North, upon the other side of the Chamber, that the people of the North, the republicans of the North especially, hate the people of the South. Mr. President, that is not true. They do not either hate them or fear them. I speak the latter word in the worse sense of the term. They wish the prosperity of the people of the South as well as they do of any other section of our country. They wish that prosperity because the people of the South are part of our great family, and if you will not believe that we wish you prosperity for that reason, then believe it for a worse, lower, more selfish reason. We have common sense enough to know that your prosperity is the prosperity of the country of which we are a part. Give us credit for selfishness at least, if for nothing else but that. We do desire your prosperity, and we know, we think we know, that that is to be obtained on the sole condition of peace, quiet, and good order among you.

There has been within the last three months considerable feeling, and there is to-day in the North, more than there was six months ago. In my judgment we on this side of the Chamber are not responsible for it. The people of Iowa (and I can speak for them, I think, having had a long acquaintance with them) love the Union of these States. They sacrificed much to perpetuate it. It is with us not merely a matter of sentiment but a matter of necessity. We raise a large surplus of produce that must go abroad, and I tell you we do not intend to ask any man's leave to go abroad with it if we can help it. We want to go through New York. We are perfectly willing to go there and shake hands with that people and deal with them, but we do not ask their permission to go through New York to Liverpool with our produce. The good city of New Orleans is at the mouth of the Mississippi River. We send some—I wish we sent more—of our products abroad through that city; and I say to the Senators from the State of Louisiana, we do not intend to ask anybody's permission to go down the Mississippi River and out of the mouth of that river just where we please. They foolishly attempted to obstruct the navigation of that river a few years ago, and we wrestled with them about it for a long time until we got it cleared out, and we intend to keep it open. We want to go to China. We do not want to ask the permission of men living on the Pacific slope whether we may go through their country to go there.

We are bound, as I said, not only by sentiment but by necessity, to the maintenance of this Union; but we have doubts and fears and distrust in regard to its perpetuity since we had the struggle for its perpetuation. Senators say (and I am bound to take their statements as true) that they are now as warmly attached to this Union as we are. I cannot dispute that question with them; but the preservation of this Union depends somewhat upon the strength of this Government. The complaint I have to make, and the complaint that is working its way all through the northern country, is that there is a steady and persistent effort in every direction and in every way to weaken this Government, to tear off a power here, a power there, and a power elsewhere, one by one, session after session, year after year, until you would leave it incapable of its own preservation.

We passed a law, assented to by myself with much distrust, a year ago containing the posse comitatus clause. I said nothing about it, because gentlemen to whose judgment I am in the habit of deferring here thought it best to let it go. I wish it were back again. Bills have been laid upon our desks here that we shall have to act upon some day, taking, as I understand, from the courts of the United States the power to declare whether or not the officers of the United States in the execution of their duties have violated the laws. An effort is being made during this extra session to deprive the people of the United States of the power of supervising the election of their Representatives at the other end of the Capitol. This bill is here to-day either meaning nothing or meaning that in the conduct and management of the election of officers of the United States the people of the United States shall have nothing to do, traveling surely, slowly, sapping one by one as we think the powers necessary to enable this Government to maintain itself.

During the pendency of the yellow-fever bill, so called, I went to the desk of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to look at a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and in looking through it I found what I wish to read to the Senate. It expresses much better than I can, much more clearly than I can, my opinion, and it comes from a source that carries with it infinitely more power and authority than anything I can say. I will read the concluding paragraph in the opinion of Chief-Justice Marshall in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden:

Powerful and ingenious minds, taking, as postulates, that the powers expressly granted to the government of the Union are to be contracted by construction into the narrowest possible compass and that the original powers of the States are retained, if any possible construction will retain them, may, by a course of well-digested but refined and metaphysical reasoning founded on these premises, explain away the Constitution of our country and leave it a magnificent structure, indeed, to look at, but totally unfit for use. They may so entangle and perplex the understanding as to obscure principles which were before thought quite plain and induce doubts where, if the mind were to pursue its own course, none would be perceived. In such a case it is peculiarly necessary to recur to safe and fundamental principles to sustain those principles, and when sustained to make them the tests of the arguments to be examined.—9 Wheaton's Reports, 222.

The people of our Northern States are afraid that that process is going on to-day. They are afraid that the results of that process will be precisely such as are herein written and that I have read. It is because of that feeling, because they fear that in the future the time may come that that which has cost them so much to maintain may be lost. I tell you kindly and frankly they intend to see to it carefully, earnestly, prudently, that that result shall not follow. And now when our democratic friends—I hate to use the term in this Chamber—when our friends on the other side of the Chamber shall have explained by their votes, if they will not explain otherwise, whether this section 6 that was, and section 5 that is now, is a mere excrescence, a mere wart, so to speak, on this bill, a senseless impertinence, meaning no offense to any one—when they shall have explained to us by their votes whether that is the case, or whether it means that much larger and greater thing, that in no case shall the Government of the United States have power to enforce election laws anywhere and everywhere in the limits of our country, I shall be prepared to cast my vote.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I rise to say a few words only. First of all, I want to express to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] the great gratification I have felt in listening to his speech. He has made an able, a dignified, and an excellent speech, worthy of a Senator anywhere and in any age. If all the speeches made on this floor were made in the same spirit and with the same clearness and patriotic temper which the Senator has exhibited, I think that what he intimated as doubtful would never be doubtful again, and that is, whether this is a dignified body. But I do not agree to all the doctrines of the Senator, and I want to call his attention, for he is an able lawyer—my friend shakes his head; yes, he is a good lawyer; I know from the way he talks; he cannot deceive me on that subject—I want to call his attention to the fact that he has made one mistake in the fundamental proposition on which he set out. Whether and to what extent it might change the conclusions to which he arrived is another question, and I will not now discuss it. I shall deal with the Senator with the exact fairness that he himself so elegantly exhibited. In speaking of the power to prescribe the times, places, and manner of electing Representatives and Senators, he spoke of it as a power delegated to the States with a reservation to Congress. I wish to say, what my distinguished friend will recognize, that it is very dangerous for a lawyer, a constitutional lawyer, or anybody else, to talk about the term "reserved powers" as applicable to the Federal Government. The General Government has no reserved power. There is no such thing as a reserved power in the Congress of the United States or in the General Government. My friend may not have used the term in the sense of an original reserved power, but he will see the danger; for that word has a technical and constitutional meaning, and when he spoke of this power to prescribe the times, places, and manner of electing Senators and Representatives, and thereby passing election laws, as a power delegated to the States but reserved to the General Government, he has evidently made a mistake, and I think it is a material mistake, as he will see if he will reflect a moment.

I will say to my friend that clearly this power to regulate the elections of members of Congress is not a reserved power anywhere. It is not a reserved power in the States; because, as the Senator correctly said, until the Constitution was framed, the States themselves did not possess the power, and that far he is right; and until the Constitution was framed neither did Congress possess the power. The Congress had no existence until the Constitution was framed and ratified. Therefore, in literal truth, so far as this particular power is concerned, it is a delegated power altogether; it is nothing but a delegated power. I want to call my friend's attention to that; for he will see the force of it. This power to prescribe the times, places, and manner of electing Senators and Representatives to Congress is not delegated to the States, nor is it delegated to the United States in one sense; but the language is peculiar:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof.

I have noticed a great many arguments, which I am not going to stop to criticise, which confound the government of a State with the State. There is a vast difference between the government of a State and the Legislature of a State and a State; a distinction, by the way, which ought to be kept always in mind in reading the speeches of Mr. Webster. Here the people of the United States were framing this Constitution, which was nothing but a proposition until it was adopted by the people through the States, each State acting for itself, as Mr. Webster and Mr. Madison both conceded. In other words, the same authority which created the State constitution for a State, created this Constitution for the Federal Government, except that in the States it was created by the people of one State and in this case it was created by the people of all the States. Mark you the difference again; not by all the people of the States, but by the people of all the States, is the language of Mr. Webster and the language of constitutional law.

Then the people of all the States in framing the Constitution delegated the power to prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives primarily, to use the forcible language of Mr. Madison, to the Legislature of the State, each State through its Legislature for itself, and ultimately to the Congress. You see the difference between this and delegating it to the State and reserving it to the Congress. The analogy which my friend gave would mislead. He says the Senate delegates to a committee power to make rules for the government of this body, but declares that the Senate shall have power to make or alter those rules; and asks, is not there a power reserved in the Senate over the rules as made by a committee? Unquestionably. But, mark you, Congress did not delegate to the States or the Legislatures of the States the power to hold elections for Representatives. That power did not come from Congress; it did not come from the General Government; it comes from the people who framed both. It was placed here by the people of the States as a delegated power both to the State Legislatures and the Congress; a reserved power to neither, a reserved power in neither, but a power delegated primarily to the State Legislatures and ultimately to the Federal Legislature.

Now, then, by all the rules of law you must construe this power according to the intent and meaning of those who delegated it. How is it delegated? It is delegated in the Constitution by the people through the Constitution. It is delegated primarily to the Legislatures of the States. The language is:

The times, places and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof.

That is the delegation by the people of the United States through the Constitution to the Legislature of the State; and Mr. Madison says that is the primary power, and very correctly; but there is not a reserved power, there is an ultimate power—mark the difference between primary and ultimate always—an ultimate power, delegated by the people through the Constitution in the Congress of the United States to make or alter those regulations, and that is a right Congress possesses as an ultimate power.

Why was it thus made primarily a power in the State Legislature? Why was it delegated primarily to the State Legislature and only ultimately to the Congress? For the very plain reason that the framers of the Constitution thought it better, as Mr. Madison correctly says, and as all the writers upon constitutional law have agreed, that it should be left primarily with the States. Why did you delegate, then, the ultimate power to the General Government or to the Congress? The reason is given and it is just as explicit as the other. It is because the States in the future might for some reason be unwilling or unable to execute the primary power. As Mr. Madison correctly says, and as my friend argues with great force on another branch of the argument (every word of which I want to say to him I indorse) it was important that this Government should have the ultimate power lodged in itself of providing for those elections in order to preserve and to continue its own existence. That is right.

Therefore the ultimate power is with the Congress; the primary power is with the States. The reason is that it was most proper to leave the election to the State, but it might become necessary that the power should be exercised by the General Government, and therefore, and for those reasons expressly, it was so delegated.

My friend will ask, is not Congress to be the judge of when it shall exercise the ultimate power? Unquestionably; it must be put upon its good faith and it must judge and it is the only judge, I grant, of when the time has arrived to exercise the ultimate power to make or alter the times, places, and manner of holding the elections. Congress is the judge; I admit it. In my judgment, the time does not now exist when this ultimate power ought to be exercised by the Congress, because I know of no inability on the part of any Legislature of any State in the Union to exercise this power in good faith. I think the States are able to exercise this power; I think the States are willing to exercise this power; and I think, with the framers of the Constitution, that having been delegated primarily to the States, because it was best under the character of our Government that they should have it, it is best they should continue it. That is my judgment.

I say to my friend, therefore, and that is the criticism I make, that it is wrong to talk about this power as a reserved power to the Congress and a delegated power to the States. It is a delegated power to both, because it is an office created by the Constitution. It did not exist in the States before the formation of the Constitution, for they had no such thing as a Representative in Congress except by the Constitution. The Senator is perfectly right about that. But it is a delegated power to both, primarily to the Legislatures of the States, ultimately to Congress, which Congress must be the judge of as to the times and manner of exercising that ultimate power. Congress has exercised it partially on several occasions. The history of its exercise is very interesting. In 1842 Congress thought it best that it should have a uniform system of electing Representatives to the other House, and that it should be by the district system. So there have been some other changes made. Congress may make or alter the regulations prescribed by the States; it may make its own regulations or alter those prescribed by the States. Congress made a few alterations, but never sought to take control of the elections until 1870, and it is this control we denounce as unwise and unnecessary.

Then I simply repeat that I think these election laws ought to be repealed, because I think that in the present condition of the country the States being both able and willing to exercise this power, and it having been by the Constitution primarily delegated to them, there is no necessity for Congress to interfere to exercise the ultimate power.

Mr. CONKLING. At that point may I understand the Senator?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand the Senator that this being in each case a delegated power, Congress becomes the judge of the time when it shall exercise its part of the delegation.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Not a part.

Mr. CONKLING. Sir?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I say the word "part" I do not like; but go on.

Mr. CONKLING. The power delegated to it?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Yes; the ultimate power.

Mr. CONKLING. The ultimate power, as the Senator likes to call it?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Yes, the ultimate power.

Mr. CONKLING. Congress is the judge of the exercise of that power. It has judged it; it has exerted the power; the statutes are on the statute-book; and here stands the Senator and here I stand in the presence of those statutes. Now the Senator says that he thinks those statutes should be repealed. He and others in the two Houses have attempted to repeal them, have failed because they were unable to get the concurrence of the law-making power so as to effect the repeal. Shall I now understand the Senator, as the next step in his process of reasoning, that he, because he thinks the laws ought to perish or be repealed, finding them on the statute-book, and having failed to secure their repeal, will so vote as to nullify them, to negative them, to paralyze them, to prevent their execution?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I understand your question perfectly.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to hear the Senator's answer.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will say to the Senator from New York that I do not wish to go into an argument. I understand his question, and I decline to go into it for two reasons. In the first place, I did not get up to make an argument. I simply got up to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to one great mistake that I thought he made in his constitutional argument so far; and for another reason, that the bill to which the Senator alludes is not before us. But I say to the Senator from New York frankly, as I try to answer everything frankly as a general rule, that while the laws are on the statute-book they ought to be supported, but there may be laws in the execution of which more damage would be done to the country by supporting them or enforcing them than by not doing so. I will say to the Senator from New York frankly that if I believed that the failure to provide money to enforce these election laws would result in preventing the election of members to the other House, would impair the efficiency and fairness of those elections in any degree, I would go with him; but as those laws are upon the statute-book they are very unnecessary, and I think the States will elect their Representatives to Congress better without those laws and without this appropriation than with it. I am willing to leave it to the States, knowing that the object of the Constitution will be thereby perfectly accomplished.

Mr. CONKLING. May I interpose for one moment?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do not want to get into an argument.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not want to get into an argument either; but the Senator rose as I understood him to reply to the Senator from Iowa, to correct some mistakes into which that Senator had fallen. Now, if the Senator from Georgia will allow me, understanding as I do so far his remarks, I should be glad to understand him on this point exactly. Shall I understand the Senator to claim for himself the right, to argue or imply the right of a man as an individual or as an individual legislator, to decide for himself upon his individual judgment which laws shall be supported, what part of a law shall be supported, to go behind the fact that the laws stand upon the statute-book and himself as a matter of independent judgment or preference or taste discriminate between those which he will nullify and those which he will support?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator will understand, I do not pretend to nullify any law.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not use that word any more than another.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That is the word the Senator used. In talking on these constitutional questions we ought to be very exact in the use of words.

Mr. CONKLING. "To withhold support" from them; I change the word.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will state to the Senator that I will exercise the power of a Senator of the United States, or, if the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] will have it so, embassador—there is but little in it, but that is what he calls it—I shall exercise the power of a Senator of the United States from the State of Georgia on this question precisely as I would any other. I look upon the State laws upon the subject of these elections, and upon the Federal laws both, as intended to secure peaceable and fair elections of members to the other House. That is the object, that is the purpose of both laws. Now, I think the purpose will be better accomplished and therefore the law itself better observed by leaving it to the States than by the General Government interfering. I think, although the law is upon the statute-books, when the object is completely accomplished, and better accomplished without appropriating money to execute it than by appropriating money to execute it, it is my duty as a Senator not to appropriate it, I say frankly. But I say to the Senator if the election of Representatives in the other House depended upon these laws, if the fairness and efficiency of those elections depended upon these Federal laws, I should feel that I had failed in my constitutional duty if I were not to appropriate the money to execute them; but when I believe the object of those laws will be better accomplished by leaving the matter where it always was left until 1870, and that so far from doing damage to the public good the public good will be benefited, then I say it is wise to husband the resources of the people and not expend their money unnecessarily or injuriously. Now, I have answered that question.

I want to say one more thing to my friend from Iowa, for it does me good to listen to him; and the Senator must pardon me. The Senator has no idea with what gratification in every sense I listen to such speeches as he has made. The Senator said that he wanted to live in a country where he had a right to carry his produce from Iowa to foreign countries without asking the favor of New York or of Louisiana, or of any other State or people. I respond to that sentiment; the Senator is right. He said, and said forcibly, that his people were in favor of the Union, not simply as a sentiment but as a necessity. That is true; and therefore he thought we ought to credit him with sincerity when he took the position he did, that he should maintain the Union at all hazards in all its powers. I concur with him; I respond to every sentiment; but he said to us of the South in the same connection, with a great deal of meaning, and we receive it as such, for there was not an unkind word in that Senator's speech, that we must remember that the peace must be preserved and all citizens must enjoy their rights in peace under the Union. I am not using his exact language. We admit that peace must be preserved. We ought not to live in the Union unless we are willing that peace shall be preserved; we are unfit to be members of any union either with Iowa or any other State if we are unwilling to preserve the peace. Now I ask the Senator, and I put it to his good sense, is it not the interest of the southern people to keep the peace? Do not their own interests and welfare demand it?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Undoubtedly. Is it not the interest of the southern people to deal justly with their own citizens? Does he not know that our own industrial energies, our prosperity, our society itself, that the protection and safety of all our rights would be endangered by war and a disturbance of the peace, by denying to any their political and civil rights under the Constitution and laws and forcing the necessity of Federal interference? Does not the Senator know that? Now, I ask that Senator to take that thought with him home to his constituents, ponder it well, and weigh these charges against us in the light of that great natural truth. Does he believe that we are guilty of the wanton outrages, the reckless disturbances of the public peace that the newspapers and individuals interested in misrepresenting us charge upon the country? We are just as much interested and more interested in preserving the peace in the South than the gentleman is interested in having the right to carry his produce to market; and would I believe any slanderer who would come and tell me that the Senator from Iowa, or the people of Iowa, were trying to destroy and impair their own egress to the sea with their products? Yet that would be just as reasonable as a thousand and one slanders that these walls echo every day against the people of the South in relation to their temper and purpose about keeping the peace and the treatment of their own citizens.

Another remark I want to make to the Senator and I am done; and my apology is the interest I felt in the sensible and strong speech that he made—yes, I will add patriotic speech, patriotic from beginning to end. He says the people of the North are alarmed for fear there is a purpose over here to take away from the Federal Government inch by inch the powers that have been conferred upon it, with a view of weakening it; and he read a most admirable extract from the decision of Chief-Justice Marshall on that very subject. I weigh well every word the Senator said, but I want to remind him that it is true that from the day Chief-Justice Marshall made that decision until now the tendency with a large portion of the people has been to an enlargement of the powers of the Federal Government. Here even in this very case upon which the Senator made his speech, he is seeking to exercise as a reserved power in Congress what by the Constitution was given to it only as an ultimate power; he is seeking to take away from the States a power which by the Constitution was primarily lodged in the States, and to exercise it solely by the Government that only had it as an ultimate power. How are we weakening the Government by repealing these election laws? Was there such a law in the days of Chief-Justice Marshall? Was there such a law in the early history of this Government? No. How are we weakening the Federal Government by taking away the Army from the polls? Was there such a law in the early history of the Government? Was there such a law previous to 1865? No, sir.
